CANDID CRITICISM BY A LIBERAL CHURCHMAN.

In a series of articles which appeared in recent numbers of this Journal we discussed the views of the Rev. J. G. ROGERS on "Church Parties and Systems in the Nineteenth Century." Mr. ROGERS regards the whole matter from the point of view of a political Nonconformist. In an interesting paper in the December number of Macmillan's Magazine, read at a meeting of clergy, we have nearly the same subject considered from the point of view of a Liberal Churchman. The writer, the Rev. W. BENHAM, reviews in a brief but suggestive manner the Church controversies of the last fifty years. Evidently he tries to be impartial, and to keep clear as much as possible of narrow party feeling. He begins with the appearance of the "Tracts for the Times," which began in 1833, and agrees with Mr. ROGERS in attributing the Tractarian movement to the zeal of a small party of Churchmen to uphold the dignity and apostolic authority of the Church and to counteract the recent efforts of political Liberalism. The originators of the movement did not anticipate what have since proved to be its results. When told that they were leading a movement which would land them in the Church of Rome, the charge was passionately denied by NEWMAN himself—the chief writer of the "Tracts." "He has told us," says Mr. BENHAM, "in his religious autobiography, how he resented such an opinion himself, how he told those who expressed it to him that they were to go on boldly, for they would find a clear line of demarcation presently. But when in Tract 90 he laid down the principle that a man may hold all Roman doctrine, and yet remain in the communion of the Church of England, four Oxford tutors made their famous protest." Hereupon the Tracts were stopped, on the recommendation of the Bishop. The secession of so many of the clergy to the Church of Rome—amongst them NEWMAN—a secession which has not entirely ceased even at the present time, abundantly justified the apprehensions entertained. Mr. BENHAM notices next the part which Bishop BLOMFIELD took in the Tractarian movement. He was opposed to its doctrinal tendencies, because he saw the danger of them, but he wished to see daily matins restored, more frequent communion, the surplice in the pulpit at the morning service, and the offertory. This was really the beginning of a new controversy, one which has been carried on with much bitterness; but the change has become an established one in the Church.

Passing by the Hampden case as undeserving of particular notice, Mr. BENHAM refers next to Mr. MAURICE, and what he says is not without interest to Unitarians.

In 1853 Mr. MAURICE was expelled from the chairs of Ecclesiastical and Modern History at King's College, London, because he expressed a guarded and solemn hope that "there is an abyss of love deeper than the abyss of death." After thirty years how does this matter stand? "What MAURICE expressed as a hope," says Mr. BENHAM, "has become the settled conviction of probably a majority of the English clergy. Dr. FARRAR expressed that conviction in a somewhat rough and hard way. Dr. PUSEY's answer, written in a very different tone, comes practically to the same thing. MAURICE never stood higher with the lay members of the Church than in the years that followed. His calm meekness and quiet confidence in GOD disarmed even the bitterest foes, and when he died in the faith and love of CHRIST, in 1872, not a voice but spoke lovingly and reverentially of him."

The publication of "Essays and Reviews" and the controversy which arose in consequence come next for notice. That book helped to bring prominently before the public two great questions which had been steadily rising, and now forced themselves to the front among religious discussions. The one was Biblical criticism on historical bases, the other was scientific discovery. "Little fuss," says Mr. BENHAM, "was made over the book until the appearance of two review articles. One was in the Westminster, and it declared that the writers were sceptics and had no right to remain in the Church of England. The other was in the Quarterly, from the pen of Bishop WILBERFORCE." At once public attention was aroused. A furious clamour was raised against the work. Prosecutions were commenced against two of the writers, but the charges, at first numbering over twenty, dwindled down to two, and these the House of Lords dismissed. More than ten thousand clerical signatures were attached to a solemn protest, and Bishop THIRLWALL quietly remarked that if a decimal point were placed before the number the value of the document would be exactly expressed. And now, after twenty years have passed by, what do we see? We think it may be said with confidence that the main ideas of the book have won their way to acceptance with a large and increasing number of the clergy. The book itself may be nearly forgotten, as Mr. BENHAM says, but it was not written in vain. It has contributed to liberalise the thought of many minds, both in the Church and out of it.

Then comes Bishop COLENSO's elaborate work on the Pentateuch, which appeared—that is, the first instalment—in 1862. Mr. BENHAM thinks the Bishop of Capetown acted the part of an honest man, but asks significantly, "Was it that of a wise one?" He points out that there were three courses open to the clergy; first, to admit that the Bishop was in the right to some extent, but still unfair and one-sided. The second was to attempt to disprove the Bishop's calculations. On this point Mr. BENHAM asks pointedly, "Have they succeeded? Let the minister speak who has met with a satisfactory refutation. Ask any intelligent layman who has gone into the matter what he thinks about it." There was a third course, and this unhappily was taken by a great number of English clergy, namely, to rage and howl and sign protests; to declare that they would hold no communion with the apostate; to express the hope that he might die the death of ARIUS sooner than be allowed to enter his cathedral again. They did not reflect how, in all this, they were alienating the intelligent English laity from them. "Who," Mr. BENHAM asks, "is one penny the worse for Bishop GREY's sentence of deposition? It was an attempt to suppress by force what hundreds and thousands were reading and trying to get to the bottom of, and his attempt was hopeless." In this case, again, what is the actual result? Is it not that the foremost Biblical scholars have been led to conclusions more or less in accordance with Bishop COLENSO's?

In the concluding part of his paper Mr. BENHAM gives timely and serious warnings to the clergy. "Now," he says, "we are in the midst of the Ritualistic quarrel." He reminds them that "the question which the country looks to them to settle is not whether the Church of England shall dress up her ministers in certain clothes; but whether she can persuade the present and future generations to believe in GOD. You cannot blink the fact," he adds, "that unbelief is increasing among cultured, thoughtful men. Has the Church of England any mission to bring them back? This is the question of questions which we have to face." And here he speaks out plainly on the doctrine of Biblical infallibility. "Rest assured that the old Evangelical belief in an infallible Book will not do it. The Book is not infallible. It is the word of life to those who receive it honestly and faithfully; but to enforce it on the 'all or none' principle, with arguments drawn from PALEY or LOCKE, is absolutely out of the question."

As regards Church sermons, Mr. BENHAM believes that their quality, judging by those that are published in the present day, has greatly fallen off. There are a few noble exceptions, but modern preaching is for the most part either controversial or it is clap-trap, founded on queer texts, or running into buffoonery. "I find one sermon on the text 'The Snuffers,' to prove that Christians should be like snuffers; another on Judges vii. 13 proves that the cake there means the Holy Eucharist. But the most wonderful is a sermon for Michaelmas day, in which the writer gives distinctions of character between CHERUBIM, SERAPHIM, MICHAEL, RAPHAEL, GABRIEL, and between the ministry of Angels, Archangels, Powers, Principalities, Dominions, &c. I very much fear if we had to sit through a sermon with all this nonsense we should ejaculate MILTON'S line—

'The hungry sheep look up and are not fed.'

Bibliolatry (says Mr. Benham, in conclusion) has been the bane of Protestant theology. It is breaking down under the criticism which has found a mixture of untrustworthy elements in the sacred narrative. But that discovery will not shake the reverence of thoughtful men towards God's revelation. The downfall of literary superstition, if your own innermost faith stands fast, will enable you to preach the spiritual freedom of man and the internal evidence of God, who has power to turn each conscience into a mirror of Himself, and each life into a witness of His glory. Idolatry of "the Church" has degraded the Church almost to the condition of a great female goddess. That, too, is breaking down among Englishmen, as the goddess has shrunk down more and more into a shadowy and indefinable form, which Romanists jeer at and Dissenters reject. Yet, if you will go below the letter, regarding it as the evidence of a great spiritual unity, comprising all who love the Lord in sincerity, the outward form will have its true and even priceless value as a symbol of that Divine truth. The outcry against scientific investigations has probably almost exhausted itself, except among very bucolical persons indeed, so thorough and careful have the inquirers been. One hears, indeed, sometimes that Professors A and B are "dogmatical and overbearing," but I will merely put it to you in passing, "Don't you think the clergy are the same now and then?" I, at any rate, have always found the natural philosophers the most gentle of men, modest and patient learners in God's great school, who think no labour too great if only they can win the truth for which they yearn.

Our author finishes his candid criticism by telling his hearers that if the Church of England is to become the Church of the people the clergy must aspire to be learners as well as teachers, not lords over God's heritage, but shepherds of the flock, in reality as well as in name. Such, then, are the sentiments to which a Liberal Churchman gives utterance at a meeting of his clerical brethren. The paper is interesting as affording a fresh indication of the juster views and truer appreciation of their work, antics, and position which are finding expression with increasing frequency from the lips and in the writings of a section of the clergy with whom are associated the best hopes of the future of the English Church.

SUNDAY CLOSING.

THE movement for stopping the sale of intoxicating liquors on Sunday is the most generally approved and successful of the various efforts now being made for checking intemperance. Indeed, there seems no reason why beer and spirits should form an exception to the general custom of the country, and should alone be retailed on Sunday. They are not a necessity of life, like bread and meat. They will not spoil by keeping, for arrangements could readily be made by publicans for bottling them in any quantity at small cost. They are not wanted hot, like tea or coffee, which are not often to be obtained on Sunday. And if the public-house needs to be kept open for social purposes, why are the newsroom, the Mechanics' Institute, &c., to be closed? There is a manifest and gross inconsistency in the rule that closes innocent places of recreation, such as museums, picture galleries, and the like, which would be advantageous to people of all ranks, ages, and sexes, and opens to a few male adults, under plea of a social glass, the opportunity and means of intoxication. For whose benefit is this exception made to the general law? It can hardly be for the benefit of the publicans. The harassed and overworked publican is subject to the calls of business during longer hours than any other tradesman. He must be ready to give hot coffee, with a nip of spirit in it, to the workman, as he trudges to the mill at half-past five in the morning; and he is fortunate if he can close his doors before eleven o'clock at night. He would be willing enough to enjoy Sunday's rest if his neighbour across the way would only close his doors, too; but just as a surly grocer, who will earn the hardest penny by keeping his shop open till eight o'clock, may check the early closing movement in a whole country town, so may a single publican stand in the way of a wholesome reform. Those who have been strong-minded enough to close on Sunday are ready to testify to the comfort and happiness it has added to their lives; and there are instances to show that their resolution has been followed by undiminished, nay, increased prosperity.

Are the public-houses opened in deference to the wishes of the public? The Association for Stopping the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors on Sunday has canvassed about five hundred places upon this question, and by papers left at something like a million houses has ascertained that 756,846 are in favour of Sunday closing, while only 89,417 are against it, and 55,814 remained neutral. We should strongly oppose any tyranny of the majority over the minority where true liberty was at stake; but is there any question of conscience and principle concerned in this matter of social Sunday drinking?—surely falsely called social, when it takes a man from the place he ought to occupy most of all, on Sunday, in the bosom of his family. The movement is against the public-house and beershop trade, and not against the inn for the convenience of travellers. The visitor at an inn would not, we imagine, be debarred from his usual comforts. The minister or doctor, who has ridden or driven to distant duty, would find a stable open for his horse. Even the excursionist, who has walked or ridden three miles from home, would be able to obtain rest, and shelter, and refreshment. Thus all fair demands for accommodation would be provided for.

The movement has had such success that we can appeal to the results of experience. The Forbes Mackenzie Act provided for Sunday closing in Scotland in 1854. The diminution in the sale of spirits was most marked. In the seven years ending with 1852 the annual consumption averaged nearly seven million gallons; while in the seven years 1855-1861 the average fell to little more than five millions. In England and Wales, on the contrary, the average of the latter seven years exceeded that of the former by 25 per cent. The increase of population and prosperity has, it is true, told in Scotland, and in the years 1874-6 the sale was nearly equal to that in 1850-2; but the true meaning of these figures will only be understood when compared with the fact that in the corresponding periods the consumption in England and Wales had risen from twenty-nine millions to forty-nine million gallons, or nearly 70 per cent. The police returns in Edinburgh attest the value of the change in another way. Comparing the averages of 1852-3 with those of 1872-3 we find the total number of drunk and incapable cases fell from 6,047 to 1,923; the number arrested for drunkenness between eight o'clock on Sunday morning and eight o'clock on Monday morning decreased from 367 to 53; and the number arrested for drunkenness on Monday was 234 instead of 752.

Similar results have attended the passing of the Sunday Closing Act in Ireland, which is remarkable at this time of disturbance. The value of the spirits and beer consumed in Ireland in 1878, during scarcely three months of which year the Act was in operation, amounted to almost eleven millions sterling. In 1879 there was a diminished consumption to the amount of a million and a half sterling; and in the first half-year of 1880 a considerable additional decrease is shown by the Excise returns to have taken place in the consumption of beer and spirits. There was also a manifest diminution in the number of arrests for drunkenness, with few exceptions, throughout the whole of the country; and Dr. HANCOCK says:—"The figures (of offences disposed of summarily) show a decrease for the first time in six years, and of a very large amount—12,889. Of this decrease no less than 8,702 was in punishable drunkenness. This may fairly be ascribed to the passing of the Sunday Closing Act, which was in operation during the whole year. In 1878, when it was in operation for a quarter of a year only, there was a reduction in these convictions of 3,180. The rest of the decrease arose in offences intimately connected with the cessation of drunkenness—such as 3,204 in assaults, and 356 in cruelty to animals." There is a marked diminution in the Sunday arrests for drunkenness. In the year 1877-8, before the passing of the Act, there was a total of 4,553 arrests in certain districts. In the year 1879-80 the number in the same districts had fallen to 1,840, of which 728 were in the counties in which are the five cities exempted from the provisions of the Act. It is too soon to look for results in Wales, but we know that that country was greatly desirous for the passing of the Act; and, saving the little difficulty in adjusting the time at which its provisions should come into operation, we have no reason to suppose that the results are anything but satisfactory.

Even in England there has been of late years a reduction in the number of hours during which the sale of beer and spirits is allowed on Sunday. The people have accepted the change; and so far from there being any desire to return to the old system, there is evidence of a widespread wish for further restrictions on the sale. We have already expressed our opinion in favour of Sunday closing in England, with a reservation in favour of the bonâ fide traveller and excursionist, and have little doubt that beneficial results would attend the change in England, similar to those which are reported in Scotland and Ireland. The Central Association for Stopping the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors on Sunday, to whose report and tracts we are indebted for the figures we have given, has its offices in Brown street, Manchester, and carries on an active campaign. During the year 1880 it held 161 public meetings; sent deputations to about fifty conferences and assemblies; canvassed nearly 120 towns; numbers nearly 5,000 petitions to Parliament; and helped to secure the passing of a resolution in favour of their scheme by the House of Commons on June 25, 1880. The work is still going on, and is well worth the support and assistance, not only of the teetotallers, but of all—and the number includes nearly the whole population—who wish to check the monster evil of intemperance, and to make Sunday a day of rest, for religious observances and innocent recreation.

THE DEATH-ROLL OF 1881.

BY THE REV. WILLIAM BINNS.

On Sunday evening the Rev. W. Binns delivered his annual address in the Charing-cross Unitarian Church, Birkenhead, on "The Death-Roll of the Closing Year." He estimated the following characters:—

1. A. BLANQUI, 75.—This remarkable French Revolutionist belonged to an extreme class, of which we have no specimens in England, and even the theories of the Irish Land Leaguers were milksop things to his fierce soul. No kind of government possible in modern civilisation satisfied him. No King, no Lords, no Commons, no nothing would come nearest to his ideal. Half of his life was passed in prison, and three times he was sentenced to death. I cannot say he was taken away before his time, for I hope that the time of such as he to rule the destinies of France will never come. That he should be discontented under Louis Philippe and the Empire I can understand and approve, but that he should go on plotting and rebelling after the Republic is established is another thing, for the Republic was clearly the expressed will of the great majority of the people of France. Blanqui appealed to the intolerant minority faction, and desired to force on a sort of Socialism which nobody wanted but impracticables such as himself. When the law was against him, he denied its authority; when liberty was against him, he denied the competence of people to judge for themselves. He had a strong will, and a judgment and conscience which set up his own will as the sole arbiter of right and wrong, and persuaded him that he was justified in adopting any method to compel people to be saved just in his way. He had no religion, but he was cast in the mould of bigots. Nominally he hated tyranny, but practically he aspired to play the part of a tyrant. Under other circumstances he would have been a chief inquisitor or a Chauvinist emperor. As it was he was out of tune with the age, and the best that can be said of him is that he was an honest destructionist, crazy to pull down and careless to build up. He was a firebrand to consume; and when he ended by burning himself out, France was better off with his darkness than with his lurid light.

2. E. A. SOTHERN, 55.—Few actors in our own generation have won more deserved fame. He created several characters for the stage which will live long in the pleasant memory of all playgoers. The most noted—"Lord Dundreary"—is a representative of the weak-headed and kind-hearted aristocracy. I do not know whether it is true to life; but if it be, then the aristocracy is travelling to oblivion by express train. "David Garrick" is a nobler conception. Mr. Sothern made an enormous fortune, but the way in which he finally disposed of it compels me to suspect that he was something too much of an actor in relation to the domestic affections. The stage acting was fine; the other acting does not command my admiration.

3. ANNA MARIA HALL, 88.—Mrs. S. C. Hall was a charming authoress and a sweet-natured woman, who had the good fortune to be united to a congenial husband, with whom she laboured in common during more than half a century. Most of her stories are forgotten. In her time of productive activity in the work of fiction we had not been initiated into the sensational bigamies and murders of Miss Braddon, or the loose rhapsodies of Ouida, or the psychological subtleties of George Eliot. She was a simple-hearted member of the good old school of Englishwomen, who believed in mothers and daughters, wives and husbands, and plainsaying moralities. Her stories were never great, but if they raised no wonder they raised no blush. A faster generation left her behind. She ministered, however, to culture in the pages of the Art Journal. She and her husband in later years joined the Spiritualists. Spiritualism is an innocent kind of faith, or, shall I say, of superstition. Its votaries generally come out of two opposing camps. Sometimes they flee to it for refuge from the dreary unbeliefs of Atheism, and sometimes from the drearier beliefs of orthodoxy. In Mrs. S. C. Hall's case it was a refuge from the latter; and whether it be true or false it is preferable to the two extremes against which it protests. What I specially like about her is her comradeship with her husband. She was a true helpmate. There was no contest as to who should rule. They were equal partners in the family firm. They were Mr. and Mrs. S. C. Hall, which is as it should be, neither the husband eclipsing the wife nor the wife eclipsing the husband, and neither of them wanting to eclipse the other.

4. THOMAS CARLYLE, 85.—A man who has contributed to make the century memorable. He was an inspirer to multitudes of young souls who date their second birth from reading his "Sartor Resartus." The advocate of silence and the denouncer of palaver, he yet wrote some forty volumes; but we can well pardon the practical inconsistency between his advice and his conduct, for all his volumes will repay a reading right through. He is the best English introduction to Goethe, Schiller, and the literary wealth of Germany. His is the truest picture that we have of Oliver Cromwell, with the warts visible on the face, but the great soul shining there and making itself distinctly audible in the broken speech. Carlyle towards the close of his days was a less man than the Carlyle of youth and prime. Like Ruskin, he had always a devout belief in God, and a passionate earnestness of piety runs through all his works—I mean a piety towards God—but, like Ruskin, he arrived at believing too much in himself and too little in his fellows. This narrowed him. He became intolerant. The world seemed going to perdition, and he spent his strength in eloquently describing the process. However, these vagaries are small in comparison with his vast services in other ways. Jove sometimes nods, and angels are said to have lapsed into lunacy and insurrection. We have to remember this both in the case of the Carlyle who has gone and of the Ruskin who remains. "Sartor Resartus," "Past and Present," "Heroes and Hero-worship," and the "Miscellaneous Essays" are an everlasting monument. If we read them we rejoice to become his disciples—not always to share his opinions, but to be kindled into enthusiasm by his love of reality and his hatred of shams. He is his own best cure. A little of him may make us prate infallibly; more of him brings us round to common sense again. I see that a Carlyle Society has been established. There is something disproportionate to the exhaustless nature of things in these petty coteries; still here there is a good excuse, for Carlyle means history, literature, philosophy, and religion as well as setting a stout heart to the solution of the practical problems of the day. His own solution was seldom sound. Nevertheless, he saw the problems. He was not frightened to look at them, and he did not try to hide them under a veil of vague words. Carlyle was a fighter—a genuine servant of the Lord of Hosts. Like the sun he had spots, and neither few nor small. It would be false history to deny them, and hypercritical to lament over them at large. The sun can afford spots, and after all it gives sunshine. I should be thankful for another gift from Providence equal to the brave warrior of the spirit whose body sleeps in the quiet churchyard of Ecclefechan, and for the spots also. Better them, with their surrounding oceans of fire and light and glory, than the darkness palpable of the common-place, or the misleading mists of insincerity. Every bit of Carlyle's nature was reality. There was gold in him—no gilt on him.

5. LORD BEACONSFIELD, 76.—Was there gold in him, or was he mere outside gilt? There was sterling gold—the gold of genius, statesmanship, and patriotism, the gold of Jewish grit and persistency of character, more lasting than the Anglo-Saxon, capable of fighting against greater odds than the Scotch. I grant the gold, though I seldom like the coinage to pass current. For the genius was erratic, and prone to flash out with meteoric radiance, dazzling for the moment, but providing little steady light. In Lord Beaconsfield's novels there is enough literary genius to handsomely equip a score of popular romances, but from "Coningsby" to "Endymion" we seek in vain for any guiding principle fit to guide our lives by, and find nothing better than personal ambition. The statesmanship consisted in the acute management of men and nations by means of their foibles, and was accompanied by a curious incredulity as to noble motives. It was Bolingbroke's statesmanship and not Burke's; brilliant, of course, as Bolingbroke's was, but fraught with disasters and prolific in blunders for which the brilliance could not compensate. The patriotism was stainless in intention. Lord Beaconsfield loved England in the fashion of "God Save the Queen," with a chorus of "Rule Britannia." This was at once his virtue and his failing. It made him national, and it hindered him from being cosmopolitan. The external honour and pomp of England were too much with him. Everyday Englishmen like this patriotism, and so they liked them. He ministered to their love of sensational display in trumpets and fireworks. He fed them with the sweets they were crying for. They were pleasant to the taste in his own mouth. He judged the rest by himself, and in the main he judged them rightly. For even our other patriots dare not be really cosmopolitan, notwithstanding their talk. I think their patriotism is often wiser than his was, but it is not a whit more genuine. It could not be, and the thorough-going enthusiasm of humanity terrifies all our politicians alike. Eloquent phrases are words, and the practical application of admitted principles is postponed to more convenient seasons. The grit and persistency of character of Lord Beaconsfield remind me of sturdy Arctic voyagers, and the scarce adventurers who have blotted the word impossible out of their vocabulary. He conquered the disadvantages of birth, fortune, and education. He is the only example in modern times of a Prime Minister without university training. He was the son of a successful bookmaker; he was a Jew; he broke down ignominiously in his maiden speech in Parliament. Yet personal industry did for him what universities do for others. The obscurity of his birth increases the lustre of his achievements. He conquered the prejudices against his Jewish race, and rose reanimated from his early failures. With every planet in his horoscope frowning upon him, he compelled fortune to his will, and the child of an outcast people became the leader of the proudest aristocracies. He had no parallel. Every other politician of mark has had something to start with—either high birth, or large wealth, or a distinguished career either at Oxford or Cambridge. Lord Beaconsfield had less than none of these. He had simply himself against the world. The genius might be erratic, the statesmanship might be the clever management of men and nations, the patriotism might be narrow and showy; yet genius, statesmanship, and patriotism were all there, and they, combined with his grit and persistency of character, have made for him an enduring name. When he has faded into forgetfulness as a politician, history will still tell his story in an admiring strain as that of one of the most remarkable men of the nineteenth century.

6. WILLIAM MORLEY PUNSHON, 57.—The most eloquent of Wesleyan preachers, a piler up of magnificent Ciceronian sentences; a man mighty to quicken conscience and to save souls. He kept in the well-worn theological ruts, and troubled not himself with the new-fangled speculations that are now tempting brave men to go out on to the open moorlands where the wind blows fresh and strong. Only brave men dare go there—and even they, if they have not wisdom and self-control, will fare badly. For the masses, and for a long time to come yet, the old ruts must serve; and while godly-minded walk there, and scatter blessings as they go, it is not for us to complain. We cannot hurry the march of Providence. The old ruts will be abandoned at last. In the meantime, there is a picturesqueness about them, and men like William Morley Punshon make them half-lovable, and tempt us to fancy the road so many tread may be better than we think it is. There is no perfect road.

7. EDWARD MIALI, 72.—The never-disheartened champion of the liberation of religion from state patronage and control, a prophet of the good time sure to come, and visibly drawing nearer from day to day. Men of Edward Miall's stamp are men with faith in religion. They dare to trust it to the winds of heaven and the human heart. Once give way to the terror-stricken dream that religion cannot stand by its own native strength, and we may ring its death knell and write its epitaph. And this the epitaph—"Here lies religion, once a thickly-scattered wild flower, then made a hothouse plant, then quickly dying through being over-pampered, and losing its fragrance long before it lost its colour."

8. JOHN CUMMING, 70.—A prophet whose prophecies never came to pass, lost in the Apocalypse and Daniel, deserted in his old age, and pensioned when the pension came too late to be of service; yet an able man, and doubtless a believing man, though always mistaken, and worthy of a better cause and a better fate.

9. MAXIMILIAN PAUL EMILE LITTRÉ, 80.—Auguste Comte's great disciple, and the most eminent of European positivists. He was wise enough to hold aloof from the later developments of Positivism, the idolatry of Madame Clotilde de Vaux, the make-belief of religious worship, and the theatrical attitudinising of prayer, with nothing and nobody to pray to. Littré held that metaphysics and theology were unknowable, and useless, if they could be known. Therefore he devoted himself to the service of mankind in practical things. Science was the only providence, and material civilisation the only heaven. Still they carried with them a generous culture, and insisted on the domination of the moral nature and the affections. This was Comte's early doctrine, at which Littré stopped. It seems strange that Positivists should believe so much in humanity and yet ignore metaphysics and theology, when, if there be any one fact plainly written on the history of thousands of years, it is the fact that wherever man is found they are found along with him, and he blooms fairest when he yields to their inspiration. But perhaps they have brought rejection on themselves by their dogmatism. They pretended to know absolutely when God more or less permits happy guessing, and to possess already the complete truth when the necessary limitations of finite existence make it at once our infirmity and our glory to be everlasting seekers after truth, and to rise on "stepping-stones of our dead selves to higher things." And yet Positivist dogmatism is quite equal to that of metaphysics and theology in a different way, and is as arrogant in denying as the Westminster Confession and the Thirty-nine Articles are in asserting. But Littré's positivism, like that of Comte's, is fated to furnish materials for some new chapter in some new "Curiosities of Literature" written by some new Isaac Disraeli. His French dictionary is his title to fame. It is said that he died after receiving extreme unction and professing the faith of the Church of Rome. In this revolution there is nothing to surprise us. Men who deny all are prone to swing round and believe all, and vice versa. To wander over the world of thought and select the grains of wheat out of the heaps of chaff is the work we are required all to do. It is easier far, and saves trouble, to throw in our lot with blind faith or blind indifference—"Many are called, but few are chosen," for few are earnest enough to make God's choice of them for the highest vocation a possible thing. Littré had the intellect to construct a free and philosophical religion for himself, but, Frenchman-like, he made up his mind early, and concluded religion a blunder, and thought about it no more. Then, in old age, youthful emotions returned upon him with overpowering force, and he died a Roman Catholic in second childhood, because in his manhood he allowed the germs of religion to decay. If religion is to flourish it must grow from the twin roots of the intellect and the emotions, and they must be cultivated side by side. This cultivation may not perhaps end in contentment with any of the popular dogmas, but it will make an end of the positivism and agnosticism which ignore, and the atheism which denies, the fundamental human instincts; without arrogating over-familiarity with His ways, it will cling to God; and without making an ordinance survey of the new land into which we enter after death, it will hold fast to nature's prophecy of immortal life.

10. THE EMPEROR ALEXANDER OF RUSSIA, 63.—As a rule I feel no interest in hereditary rulers. We do not want them or have them in the House of Commons, amongst bishops, popes, judges, magistrates, and railway and bank directors. They remain only in the spheres of the lords and Royalty, and there they are tending to dissolution. But on two or three occasions there have been exceptions in England to the general uninterestingness of the species, and the Emperor Alexander was an exception in Russia. Coming to the throne towards the close of the Crimean war, and after the death of the fierce and headstrong Nicholas, he signalled his accession by reforms worthy of the genius of an Alfred the Great, and promised to become a second Peter in power and influence, with more than Peter's zeal for the public good. This emancipation of the serfs stamps him as the greatest and wisest benefactor that the Russian people ever had. His educational schemes, had they been persisted in, would have placed Russia on a level with the rest of Europe. But the evil habits of many centuries of misgovernment cannot be got rid of in a generation, as we are now ourselves experiencing in Ireland. We inherit the consequences of our forefathers' sins as well as of their virtues. Alexander's popular sympathies set the nobles against him. Then he trembled at his boldness, and harked back in education, though he stood firm in the emancipation of the serfs. In the meantime Nihilism spread, and he fancied himself obliged to use harsher means of repression than he would have been inclined to earlier. The usual results followed. Coercion begat bitter discontent, and dynamite put him out of the way. He was a martyr. Louis XVI. and Charles I. were at least slain according to constitutional forms, and it would be a waste of pity to commiserate them; but Alexander lived and served his country, and died for it. They who slew him slew the guardian deity of the people, and all for what? To wear heavier chains, to alienate themselves from the healthier life of the West, and to provide a fresh excuse for the slavery from which he had set them free. Alexander of Macedon was called great. Alexander of Russia really was great, and the epithet will be justly awarded to him in after times.

11. ARTHUR PENRHYN STANLEY, 65.—The news of Dean Stanley's death reached me on a sunny July morning as I was wandering through Caen, indulging in waking dreams of William the Conqueror, and it darkened for me the rest of the day, and many days following. He was a pupil and biographer of Dr. Arnold, and the broadest representative of the Broad Church. It is hard to tell what his breadth failed to include. It included all the Nonconformists, from the Scotch Presbyterians at one end, who stand by the old standards, to the Unitarians at the other end, who are the descendants of the English Presbyterians, and have no standard, save the inward light ever brightening to the perfect day. It included Bishops Colenso and Wilberforce, Max Müller and George Grote, and John Stuart Mill, men who took all on trust, and men who investigated all. Naturally, therefore, his own theology was hazy, and perhaps no worse for its haziness. He had, however, a sound test for reverence and sympathy. If men were true to themselves they were true to God, and differences were simply God's methods to bring about at last a richer unity. His theory of the Church of England was a mystery to me. The Church seems to me to be fenced by high walls within narrow limits. To Dean Stanley there were practically no walls and no limits. I cannot understand this position, but I call him a man of transparent soul, though not a clear thinker; at once a courtier and a saint, the courtier sometimes getting the mastery, the saint often getting it, and the total result is a marvellous inconsistency. But, granted his theory, then his own practice was consistent enough. The insuperable objection to his theory in my eyes is that the Creeds and Articles of the Church of England are clearly meant to teach dogmatic theology of the Reformation type, partly Calvinistic and partly Lutheran, and his contention that all theology is an open question has no foothold there, though it has a firm foothold in the primary granite of fact. To this position, generous and illogical as it was, he was faithful. He would countenance no shape of persecution. Other Broad Churchmen draw a line. Mr. Llewellyn Davies, for instance, will not use the Athanasian Creed, and violates the law thirteen times a year; but he is willing to let Mr. Green stay in Lancaster Gaol because Mr. Green violates the law in minor ceremonial things. Dean Stanley's theory is unworkable, and I am not sorry. It was suggested in embryo by the Latitudinarians of the seventeenth century, and had often had supporters, but, to the credit of human nature, has always broken down, for it authorises men to use words in a non-natural sense, as Mr. Matthew Arnold thinks it legitimate to deny that God is a person, and in the next breath to assert three persons in the Divine Trinity. Let words have the contradictory meanings in commerce and life which Dean Stanley allowed them in theology, and we should not know whether we were standing on our heads or heels. As the range of human experience extends, theology requires new interpretations to adapt its ideas to new facts. The old language becomes misleading. We might as well ask astronomers to subscribe to the Ptolemaic system as ask modern students to subscribe to the formulas of the Tudors and Stuarts. Best of all is it to ask for no subscription whatever, but to leave laity and clergy to the free play of thought, and to the quest of truth without any let, hindrance, prepossession, or foregone conclusion. This places theology where literature and science are. Mr. Stopford Brooke said that on liberty and manhood here and there we take our stand. But, apart from this theory of accommodation, which people will indignantly reject in proportion as they have any earnest religious belief; and granting the sweetness and sincerity of its last and greatest champion, Dean Stanley has left an evergreen remembrance of himself. His life was unostentatious, his piety genuine, his charity unbounded. His histories are perfections of picturesque narratives, and as Dean of Westminster he has added a new sanctity to Westminster Abbey. Nominally, he belonged to the Church of England; practically, he was a saint of the church universal, but not a philosopher thereof.

12. HENRY MATHER JACKSON, 49.—An honoured townsman of our own, an able lawyer, an honest politician, and the promise of an admirable judge, cut off just as he reached the bench, and shorn of the opportunity of showing how he would have adorned it.

13. GEORGE BORROW, 78.—An adventurous traveller, a gipsy wanderer, and the author of the "Bible in Spain," and other books of intense interest for lovers of out-of-the-way phases of life.

14. EDWARD JOHN TRELAWNEY, 88.—The friend of Byron and Shelley, not a poet, but a man who could appreciate poets. Fierce in talk, warm in heart, worse in his bark than in his bite. Trelawney was the last representative of a school famous before we were born; a wild and boisterous character, with splendid capacities, that ran to seed for want of a suitable sphere. Had he lived in the times of Queen Elizabeth he would have been an equal companion of Raleigh and Drake.

15. PRESIDENT GARFIELD, 50.—He worked his way from a log hut to the White House. His piety was the gift of nature; his large learning was self-gained. He enriched his mind by the glad-punching of his body. He was a politician with a conscience, and a patriot above party. The one foul blot on the constitution of the United States is the habit of changing officials all round when a new president is elected, and rewarding party wire-pullers with Government posts. So the official circles are largely nests of corruption; judges can be bought, and it is whispered that presidents have been bribed. Of all all-mighty things, so-called, the worst all-mightiness is the almighty dollar. President Garfield determined to inaugurate an era of purity, and sacrificed his life as the price. It was a costly price to pay; but if the end be gained, the end will be worth the price.

16. ALEXANDER MACDONALD, 50.—A self-made working-man, member of Parliament, and an honest advocate of trades unions, who was able to see both sides of a question.

17. JOHN M'HALE, 89.—This vigorous old Roman Catholic archbishop was called the Lion of Tuam. He was too independent-minded for the Ultramontane rulers of the Church, and was practically superseded in the administration of his diocese long before he died. He was a zealous Irish patriot, who hated insurrectionary agitations, and if he could not work within the limits of the law would fold his arms and hold on, and wait for better times, or would wield a trenchant pen and help the better times to come. He was a Roman Churchman who endeared religion to the peasantry, and illustrated in his own life the superiority of conduct over creed. Perhaps he was too much of a lion, roared too loudly, and used his claws sometimes when he might have been content with roaring. Yet he felt strongly; his Celtic blood boiled on slight provocation; he saw things through the distorting medium of his excited emotions, and fought with spectres which he mistook for friends. He is not the first man who has done it, nor will he be the last; but he was a real man, notwithstanding the cross of the lion in him; and though he was against most of the things I hold dear, I prefer a reality against me to a sham on my own side. The reality stirs me up to do my best, and by the sham I am betrayed. From all people who mean more than they say, from all who mean less than they say, from all who seem any way different from what they are, from all shams, good Lord deliver us. When the blessed sunshine of reality breaks universally on the world, then another advent of the Christ of God will draw nigh.

DR. WILLIAMS'S TRUST.—XX.

[CONTRIBUTED BY W. D. JEREMY, ESQ.]

92. RICHARD COOKE, Esq. (1771-88).—Some-time Treasurer of the Presbyterian Board (1771-84).

93. GEORGE BROUGH, Esq. (1772-85).—A member of the Presbyterian Board (1772-85).

94. REV. ABRAHAM REES, D.D., F.R.S. (1774-1825)—well known by the Cyclopædia which bears his name. From the article "Penry" therein, written by himself, we learn that he traced his descent in the maternal line from John Penry, or Ap-Henry, the Puritan martyr who suffered for Nonconformity in the Elizabethan period. His father, the Rev. Lewis Rees, was an Independent minister at Llanbrynmaer, Montgomeryshire. There, in the year 1743, Abraham Rees was born. At the age of sixteen he entered Hoxton Academy, then presided over by Dr. David Jennings, author of "Jewish Antiquities;" and such were the abilities, industry, and attainments of the young student, especially in mathematics and natural philosophy, that at the age of nineteen, before the completion of his course, he was appointed assistant tutor, and soon after elected resident tutor, which office he held, having Dr. Kippis for a colleague, until the dissolution of the college, in 1784 or 1785. For the next ten years (1785-95) he was one of the tutors of the Hackney College. He was thus for thirty-three years engaged in educating students for the Christian ministry. To his professorial duties he added literary work of no small magnitude. A new edition of Chambers's "Cyclopædia" (first published in 1727) being required, he was selected by the publishers to be the editor, and the work issued from the press in four huge folio volumes between the years 1781 and 1786. About that time he was elected a Fellow of the Royal Society, and the degree of D.D. was conferred on him by the University of Edinburgh, on the proposal of the Principal, Dr. Robertson, the historian. Dr. Rees's next literary work was a gigantic undertaking—his own new Cyclopædia, which came out in parts between the years 1803 and 1820, and was completed in forty-five quarto volumes. In the meantime he also published four volumes of "Practical Sermons." All these labours were combined with the duties of his profession as a minister, which he performed uninterruptedly for fifty-seven years, first as pastor of St. Thomas's Southwark (1768-83), and then of the Old Jewry congregation (1784-1825). Honorary Secretary of the Presbyterian Board for nearly half a century, he was for a long period the acknowledged head of "The United Body of the Three Denominations In and Around the Cities of London and Westminster," as well as of the "Presbyterian body" itself. He died June 9, 1825, in his eighty-third year. A portrait of him by Opie was presented to the Library, in compliance with directions contained in his will. Dr. Rees was an Arian of the school of Dr. Richard Price, but he lived to see Unitarianism, as taught by Priestley and Belsham, very generally adopted by the English Presbyterians, who thus became more widely separated than before from the other two denominations. Dr. Rees's influence greatly helped to keep the three together during his life, and they continued for some time to assemble for their purposes at Redcross-street Library as their head quarters. His death weakened the bond of union, and a few years later an open rupture occurred, followed by litigation, with regard to chapels and trusts, engendering hostile feelings, which have but recently died out.

95. REV. NATHANIEL WHITE (1774-83).—One of Doddridge's pupils. Assistant Minister at the Old Jewry (1766-74), and afterwards sole pastor (1774-83). A member of the Presbyterian Board (1773-83). He died March 3, 1773, in his seventy-fourth year.

96. ALEXANDER CHAMPION, Esq. (1774-94).—A member of the Presbyterian Board, 1772.

97. REV. RICE HARRIS, D.D. (1775-93).—Minister of Hanover-street Chapel, Long Acre. A member of the Presbyterian Board (1772-95).

98. REV. THOMAS TAYLER (1771-1831).—Born in 1735 near Kidderminster. Admitted, in 1751, a pupil of Dr. Doddridge, who died soon after at Lisbon. One of the first students at the Daventry Academy (1752). Elected Assistant Tutor in 1757; Assistant Minister at Carter-lane, London (1767-78), as colleague to Mr. Picard. Pastor from 1778 to 1816, when he resigned his office from advanced age and infirmities. He published a volume of sermons in 1803. He was a Trustee of Coward's Fund, and a member of the Presbyterian Board (1778-1831). He died Oct. 23, 1831, at the age of nine-six years. The late Rev. John Scott Porter, who was one of his successors at Carter-lane, says, in a letter to the Christian Life for Nov. 3, 1877, that Mr. Tayler had an almost filial respect for Dr. Doddridge, and paid to him an affecting tribute by renovating in a handsome style, and solely at his own expense, the Doctor's Tomb in the English Cemetery at Lisbon.

99. REV. ROGER FLEXMAN, D.D. (1778-86).—Minister of Jamaica-row Chapel, Rotherhithe, from 1747 until its dissolution in 1783. He resigned the Trust in 1786, on being appointed Librarian, which office he held at Dr. Williams's Library until 1792. He died in 1795, aged eighty-seven years. He was the compiler of the eighth, ninth, tenth, and eleventh volumes of the "General Index of the Journals of the House of Commons," comprising the years 1660-97.

100. NATHANIEL POLHILL, Esq. (1778-83).—Chairman of the Dissenting Deputies (1779-82).

101. REV. RICHARD JONES (1778-1800).—A pupil of Dr. Doddridge, Minister of Crosby-square Chapel, from 1765 to 1769, when the lease having expired the Society was dissolved. Librarian at Dr. Williams's Library from 1767 to 1770. Minister at Hanover Chapel, Peckham, from 1770 to 1800. He died 30th September, 1800, in his seventy-third year.

102. MATTHEW TOWGOOD, Esq. (1780-91).—Banker, son of the Rev. Micaiah Towgood, of Exeter. A member of the Presbyterian Board (1773-1791).

103. JOHN WARREN, Esq. (1781-1804).—Grandson of the Rev. John Warren, of Coventry, and also grandson of the Rev. Edward Picard, of Carter-lane, Treasurer of the Presbyterian Board (1784-1802), father of the late Thomas Picard Warren, Esq.

104.—REV. JOHN WILLIAMS, LL.D. (1782-90).—Librarian at Redcross-street from 1777 to 1782, when, on retiring, he was elected a Trustee. There is a portrait of him at the Library.

105. EDWARD JEFFRIES, Esq. (1783-1802).—Treasurer of St. Thomas's Hospital; a member of the Presbyterian Board as a representative of St. Thomas's Chapel, Southwark (1790-1800); Chairman of the Dissenting Deputies (1785-1802).

ST. PAUL'S BELLS.—Ten thousand people assembled near St. Paul's Cathedral, at twelve o'clock on Saturday night, to hear the new peal of bells of the Cathedral ring "the Old Year out and the New Year in." "Great Paul," the name by which the monstrous bell for St. Paul's Cathedral is to be known, is now ready for conveyance from Loughborough to London. The weight of the bell is a little over 17½ tons, or 4½ tons heavier than "Big Ben" at Westminster. The perpendicular height of the bell from the lip to the top of the canons is 8ft. 10in., so that a man could stand underneath it with an open umbrella. The diameter from edge to edge is 9ft. 6½in., and the thickness at the middle of the sound-bow 8½in. The total cost will be about £3,000. When tested the volume of sound was extraordinarily great, and the vibration was very remarkable.

It is intended to memorialise the Crown to issue a Royal Commission to inquire into, and report on, the state of Westminster School.

Occasional Notes.

A NEW heresy hunt, we learn from the Echo, has been started in Scotland. Considering the bold and original method in which theological subjects are treated in Dr. Walter Smith's poems, it is not at all surprising that he has at length come into collision with the ultra-orthodox party. During the discussion on the Robertson Smith case Dr. Walter Smith was one of the Professor's staunchest supporters; and very recently the Professor was elected an office-bearer in Dr. Walter Smith's church. It so happens that every office-bearer on his election has to sign the Confession of Faith, and it is becoming increasingly difficult to find men of thought and culture willing to pin their faith to a musty document drawn up by Presbyterian theologians two centuries and a quarter ago. Dr. Walter Smith got over the difficulty by publicly explaining in his church that "the adherence of the office-bearers to the questions was in so far as they agreed with Holy Scripture, because the supreme rule of faith with them, as with all Protestant Churches, was not any confessional creed, but the Scripture itself. These confessions were subordinate standards, and were simply received in as far as they agreed with the Holy Scripture." At the Edinburgh Free Presbytery last week Dr. Smith was called to account for his action, which he stoutly defended, observing that in the chapter on creation the Confession of Faith appeared at least to say that God created the world out of nothing, and that it reached its present state of completeness from nothing, in the space of six days, while the Scripture was not pledged to any such position as that. The Presbytery, however, on the motion of Sir Henry Moncreiff, resolved that answers to the questions put cannot be accepted on such a footing as propounded by Dr. Walter Smith, and referred the matter to a committee with a view to further action. If the Edinburgh Free Presbytery persists in its course, says the Echo, it will not be long before the churches will have their choice of office-bearers limited to the most illiterate of the members. Perhaps this is slightly over-stated, as some of the educated men of the Nonconformist denominations, both in England and Scotland, are among the most rigidly Orthodox.

THE REV. EDMUND S. FFOULKES, vicar of St. Mary's, Oxford, and one of the candidates for the Bodleian Librarianship, contributes to Macmillan's Magazine a paper on "English Church Courts and Primitive Ritual," in the course of which he gives the following account of his fifteen years' experience as priest in the Church of Rome:—"The system," he says, "I had found on full experience to be completely delusive; just as full of blemishes, and distortions, and corruptions as our forefathers had painted it ages ago; falsifying, in fact, almost every pretension it affected itself, or its proselytisers claimed for it; with unity largely dependent on tyranny for its maintenance, and a blind to any amount of heartburnings and internecine strife behind the scenes; with moral appearances largely dependent on secrecy, and truth played fast and loose with in every possible way for palliating, advancing, or saving the system. All these discoveries made me rejoice over the unrighteous act that set me free, and enabled me to return to my old home, a wiser, but not by any means a sadder man. I had known Rome now, once for all."

An extraordinary account comes from Aberdeen of Ritualistic proceedings in the East Parish Church there. For some time past complaints have been made in the local press of the sweeping changes in doctrine and worship effected by the minister. The Virgin Mary, it was said, had been referred to in a most unusual way, so as to scandalise good Protestants, brass bands had performed in the church, and candles had actually been fixed on either side of the pulpit. Some of the complaints seem to have been the product of exaggeration, the Christian World says, but certainly the account given by the Aberdeen Free Press of a special Christmas service for children held in the East Church tells of "a new departure" in Presbyterian worship. The service took place in a small chapel fitted up in "Collinson's aisle," and those attending it had placed in their hands a "Christmas office for children." This seems to have been almost entirely derived from Anglican sources, including a number of forms familiar to readers of the Prayer-book, a version of the Litany, and the Magnificat. The prayers were intoned after the most improved fashion; and the children gave evidence that they had been thoroughly drilled in the responses. A brass band was to have assisted at the service, but in deference to the scruples of some its aid was dispensed with. An indignant Aberdonian writes to the newspapers asking if there be no Jenny Geddes who will rise up and 'protest against "this miserable mincing of the Anglican service."

THE REV. M. J. SAVAGE, of the Church of the Unity, Boston, U.S., gave in his sermon on Dec. 18 a statement of Mr. O. B. Frothingham's so-called changed views of Religion and Radicalism, which have been the subject of recent discussion. This statement Mr. Frothingham himself has endorsed as substantially correct in every particular. Mr. Savage gave the following outline of Mr. Frothingham's views:—"1. Mr. Frothingham does not regard any science that deserves the name as tending toward Materialism. 2. He would not limit free thought on any subject or in any direction. 3. He is not in the least inclined to go back to any past church statement of creed. 4. While he is in no sympathy with destruction for its own sake, he thinks the work of destruction for the sake of higher and better building has not yet gone half far enough. I asked him if he would now blot out anything he has written and published. 'Not one single word,' was his answer; 'I would only supplement here and there with additional statements.' I asked especially about 'The Cradle of the Christ,' which would, perhaps, be called his most destructive piece of criticism. He said:—"I would make no change in it. It is now impossible to get at the historical Jesus. We have no materials. Jesus and the Christ I regard as two distinct and separate things.' Now, then, for his change. To put it in my phrase, I should say he has come to be a more pronounced Theist. The point towards which his thoughts converge is the mode of communication between the Divine mind and the human. To quote his own words in conversation, he said:—"For many years I have been inclined to try to prove that everything comes out of the earth from below; that religion is purely earthly in its origin; something made by man in his effort to perfect himself, to use Mr. Abbot's phrase; and I have not, as I now think, taken enough account of the working in the world of a Divine mind, a power above man, working on and through him to lift and lead; and in his own use of that term he looks for larger 'revelations' of God and truth in the future. 'I hope,' said he, 'that new light will break out, not of God's word in the sense of a book, but of God's universe.' The new light, he thinks, will come, not by studying old creeds or standards or Bibles, but by looking forward for new manifestations through normal methods in the human soul." The sermon concluded as follows:—"Meantime, after a life of exceptional toil, he has certainly earned the right to rest and wait. If he is not entirely satisfied with his life-work, what man of any lofty ideas is satisfied? If he questions some of his past methods, and feels that he overlooked and did not sufficiently emphasise some of the many sides of the infinite truth, let that man who has grasped the whole universe be the one to find fault with him. Ceasing to speak when they have delivered their message, and waiting for 'more light,' instead of plunging recklessly forward when the way is not clear, hoping in the future, and trusting that the power that has unrolled the panorama of the past has more and grander still to reveal—is not this the attitude of all reverent, noble, believing souls? Let us leave Mr. Frothingham, then, on the furthest verge of his advance, not taking one step backward, but only facing the east, waiting for a new and brighter rising of the ever old and ever new sun of righteousness and of life, feeling sure that, like the fabled statue of Memnon at Thebes when the first rays smile upon his forehead, the music of his old-time utterance will respond to the appeals."

SOME very curious particulars, we learn from the Disciple, have been published with regard to the Congregational Church at Chumleigh, Devon. It dates from 1633, and originated in Archbishop Laud driving the Rev. Mr. Shaw from the parish church, and friends clustering around the ejected minister and building the present chapel. Mr. John Bowring, an ancestor of the late Sir John Bowring, gave the land, and the family continued connected with the chapel for more than a century. The Rev. Mr. Stuckey, one of Oliver Cromwell's chaplains, and an ancestor of the present Sir George Stuckey, Bart., erected the building. Although the chapel has been somewhat altered, the pulpit is the original one, and so is the clock, which has the peculiarity of having a wooden wheel. Sir Risdon Bennett is the great, great grandson of one of the ministers, the Rev. Risdon Darracott; and Sir Joseph Hooker, of Kew, the distinguished botanist, is the great, great grandson of another minister, the Rev. Joseph Hooker.

AN accomplished scholar—the Rev. E. M. Geldart, M.A., of Croydon—sends us the following attempt to improve on Dr. Willan's version of "Abide with me," published in the Inquirer of the 24th Dec. :—

Siste precor ! rapidis terras nox ingruit umbris :
Vesper adest : ne me desere ; siste precor !
Dum sociis expers frustra solatia quaero,
Tu desperanti, spes mea sola, mane.

Deficit imminente die lux parvula vitæ ;
Gaudia tabescent : transit inane decus.
Omnia mutantur sensim labentibus annis :
Nescia mutari, tu mea vita, mane.

Nec tantum vidisse satis vocemque per aures
Vix hausisse semel : ni remanere velis.
Tamquam discipulo solitus facilisque magister
Sic mihi, nec raptim præteriturus ades.

Neu gravis advenias regum rex ipse, sed almus :
Ales in auxilium, plenus amore, Deus.
Tristitia lacrimas, votis cor mite remittas :
Huc ades ut maneas, suavis amice reûm.

Saepe benigna tuens spectabas faustus ab alto
Me juvenem, quamvis saepe rebellis eram.
Heu quoties ego te, tu men on deseris unquam ;
Semper et extremo tempore fidus ades.

Prætereunte die sine te solamina nulla
Uno consilio præsidioque meo.
Quis nisi tu solus mihi tela retorquet Averni ?
Per tempestates, perque serena, mane.

Auspice te cuivis obsistam interritus hosti :
Tecum cura levis, lacrima dulcis erit.
Quo tibi Mors stimuli ? tibi quo victoria Lethe ?
Numine caelesti vindice victor ero.

Tu præteende crucem morienti ante ora ; tenebris
Fulgentem mediis pande per astra viam.
Sol novus exoritur ; fugitant spectacula mundi :
Mecum seu vivo, seu pereunte, mane.

THE Jewish Chronicle has an article on "Sabbath Schools"—that is Saturday Schools—which would delight the heart of Mr. I. M. Wade and our friends in Norfolk-street. It appears that the Jewish schools are increasing in number, and that religious classes are in course of formation in connection with the various Metropolitan Synagogues. Our Jewish contemporary affirms that much remains to be done in this direction, and refuses to be satisfied until—unconsciously imitating Mr. Wade—"every Jewish congregation has followed the example set by a few. The following passage, mutatis mutandis, applies to our own position:—"It is impossible to exaggerate the important influence that Sabbath schools must exercise on the future of Judaism. Never, perhaps, has religion, generally, stood in such danger as it does to-day. A great wave of scepticism is rolling over whole countries, sweeping away old faiths and undermining the very foundation of religious belief. Besides suffering from the spread of infidelity in common with all religions, Judaism has foes peculiar to itself. There is prejudice, prejudice against our race and our faith, which makes the young and ignorant hesitate before publicly proclaiming themselves Jews. There are the claims of the world ever bidding our coreligionists give up their faith, with the self-denial and self-sacrifice it imposes, and holding out pecuniary prizes as the reward of a neglect of their religious observances. It becomes, then, one of the most important questions of the day, how we are effectively to guard our children against these dangers. It is not enough that they are sent regularly to the synagogue, and that in their homes they see performed the ceremonies that their forefathers have practised through so many generations. These safeguards, powerful as they may be, are not sufficient. The services in our synagogue do not, we are afraid, do much towards touching children's hearts; the prayers are said in a language with which they are only imperfectly acquainted; the sermons are written for the parents, and the more youthful auditors can seldom understand much of them; and although in some synagogues special children's sermons, we are glad to say, are sometimes given, these are but occasional, and can be but the accessories, not the staple, of religious education. Public worship was clearly considered by the Rabbins subordinate to religious instruction when they declared that the teaching of children might not be interrupted even for the purpose of rebuilding the Temple."

THE intelligence of the death of Mr. Ralph Bernal Osborne has been received with widespread regret. The political career of Mr. Osborne extended over a generation; for between 1841 and 1874 he represented in successive Parliaments Wycombe, Middlesex, Dover, Liskeard, Nottingham, and Waterford. In the Aberdeen and first Palmerston Administrations he filled the office of Secretary to the Admiralty. There are very few sitting in the House of Commons now who lived through the scenes in which Mr. Bernal Osborne sparkled, and fewer still who had taken their seats when he approached the table to be sworn in as member for Wycombe. In a very interesting obituary memoir in the Daily News of Thursday we are told that "theological speculation of a somewhat advanced kind had a curious fascination for him," and in illustration of this we remember being told by one of his intimate friends many years ago that he was a diligent and sympathising reader of the Inquirer at the Reform Club.

IN his speech at the Liverpool Reform Club banquet on Wednesday night Lord Derby referred as follows to the Bradlaugh question :—

There is another question connected with the constitution of the House of Commons which has already occupied more time and caused more bad feeling than its importance deserves—I mean the question of Parliamentary oaths. For my part, I utterly disbelieve in the value of political oaths. I don't see that they ever caused any man in public life to do or to abstain from doing anything that he would have left undone or that he would have done if oaths had never existed. But they are a custom all over the world, and they do no particular harm. If we are to have any legislation on the subject, the simplest plan would be to allow anybody to substitute an affirmation for an oath, without assigning his reason. But it is not a very urgent question, and I should hope that, if Mr. Bradlaugh again offers to take the oath, as he did last year, there will be no further attempt to prevent him. It is quite new doctrine that we are to inquire into the orthodoxy or to question the sincerity of those who consent to go through the accustomed forms. If that is to be done to one member, it should be done to others. Suppose a member to have published something that makes it doubtful whether he believes in a Deity, is the House to say, "The oath you consent to take is not enough; we must be satisfied that you are not taking it as a mere formality. We claim the right to question you as to your belief." Why, in the darkest times, as people would call them now, an inquiry of that kind has never been attempted, and it is surely rather late to begin. I cannot but think that the House will see the matter so; that the chance majority of last year will be reversed, and that a question which is important on account of the principle involved, though not very much so otherwise, will be settled and put out of the way.

This is sound, strong sense, and we wish we could believe that this view would prevail in the House of Commons. For our own part we should go further than either Lord Derby or the House, and sweep away the whole system of oaths without substituting affirmations of any kind.

ON another page our valued contributor, Mr. W. D. Jeremy, M.A., resumes his complete list with biographical sketches of the Trustees of Dr. Williams's Library, one of the oldest and most important of Nonconformist institutions. We have reason to hope that these valuable articles, which have been interrupted by unavoidable professional engagements, will be continued through the year, and on their completion will, we trust, be published in book form, with some further account of the history of the Trust, so as to be a permanent record of this noble institution.

AN anecdote of Lord Justice Lush, given in the Christian World, may not be without interest. One Sunday, on the occasion of the assizes being held in Manchester, Sir Robert quietly walked into Dr. Maclaren's chapel, and seated himself in the nearest pew. After a few minutes, in came a Manchester man, the real owner. Indignant at finding a stranger in his pew, he requested the latter to walk out, which he did, finding accommodation elsewhere. The service over, Dr. Maclaren sent to the Judge to come into the vestry, and, while chatting together, the very individual who had expelled the Judge from his pew entered. Dr. Maclaren, ignorant of what had occurred, introduced him to Sir Robert. "I have already seen Mr. So-and-So," replied Sir Robert, quietly, "and I have no wish to see him again."

Punch this week has the following tribute to the Premier:—

"PUNCH" TO THE PREMIER.

(Mr. Gladstone completed his seventy-second year on the 29th December.)

Seventy-two years old, friend Willy, seventy-two years old!

But never a sign that your heart's getting chilly, a hint that your fancy grows cold.

You can smite in the fight like a younker—can talk, as of old, for three hours by the clock,

Though your voice may not be quite so silvery, Willy, your hair such a raven-hued shock.

They whom the gods love die young, friend Willy; so said your favourite Greeks;

They whom the gods love never grow old is the moral your history speaks.

Happier, later Tithonus, friend Willy, a wiser Aurora's your friend,

Your Youth's warm and bright in her light, friend Willy—and so may it be to the end!

THE Publishers' Circular, issued by Messrs. Sampson Low and Co., brings with it the customary table of books issued during the past twelve months. Most of our readers saw a paragraph in the newspapers not long ago to the effect that the production of books was not on the increase, as might naturally be expected from the greater number of readers which every day must bring with it, due to the spread of education and the steady growth of population. The slight lessening of the number of publications, that is, books, is ascribed by the statisticians to the enormous development of the periodical press, whether in magazines, weeklies, or the morning paper. The decrease, so far, is very slight. There are about three hundred books less recorded this year than during the last, exactly one for each working day. The analytical table is divided into fourteen classes, and also into new books and new editions.

A Plain View of the Claims of the Orthodox Catholic Church as Opposed to all other Christian Denominations. By J. J. Overbeck, D.D. London: Trübner. 1882.

Even the learning and zeal of Dr. Overbeck will not induce many religious Rationalists to seek a solution of the problems of the soul from the decrees of Councils and the writings of ancient bishops. We gladly admit we would rather be under dead bishops than living bishops, for we know the worst of the departed, whereas a living bishop is an untold quantity; as an Irishman said of the good Bishop Jebb, "Sure he seems meek and gentle as a child, but who can tell but that there may be a power of mischief in him?" England for thirty years under all the old patriarchs would be a happier country than England for three months under the Bishop of Rome. The early bishops had not imbibed a tradition of Ecclesiasticism; they brought to the Church the teachings of philosophy, and had no defined theory of Infallibility, either Biblical or Episcopal, and they often wrote wise words, as St. Gregory Nazianzen, in one of his epistles, saying to his friend, "I never yet saw a Council of bishops come to a good end. I salute them afar off, since I know how troublesome they are: I never more will sit in those assemblies of cranes and geese." The sentiment approves itself to our prudence when we remember that at the Council of Nicea the Bishop of Myra struck Arius so as to break his jaw; at the second Council of Ephesus the Patriarch of Alexandria threw down the Bishop of Constantinople, trampling upon him until he had succeeded in stamping him to death. At the Council of Chalcedon, the most dignified of the seven Ecumenical Councils, when Theodoret, the Bishop of Kars, renowned for his virtues, his learning, and his theological writings, took his place amongst the Fathers, we are informed by the historian Eusebius that he was overwhelmed by shouts of abuse and execration, in which tumult of noise and personal insult the most reverend the Bishops of Egypt, Illyria, and Palestine made themselves specially conspicuous. Such outbreaks of human passion do not compare favourably with the Hindoo tradition regarding the three vast Councils of the Buddhist religion held B.C. 543, 443, and 309, but it is questionable whether Christ would not have denounced more vigorously the strategical schemes and organised hypocrisy of the Vatican Council with its systematised suppression of real liberty under the guise of an unreal and inoperative discussion, than the rude human passions displayed in the Ecumenical Councils in a manner not easy to reconcile with the supposed overruling presence of the Spirit of God; a presence displayed "miraculously" in the Council of Nicea by the selection of the Canonical Books of Scripture, alighting upon the top of the Holy Table, the Apocryphal remaining below, and two dead bishops coming at night to append their signatures to the decrees, whilst the Holy Spirit, the Paraclete, by a mysterious manifestation raised the number of the Fathers from 318 to 319.

To us an Ecclesiastical Council is a limitation; when we appeal, it will be to a Council of Humanity; to the consensus of the competent. Believing in evolution, development, progress, growth, our appeal would be to independent students of the latest as well as the consecutive experiences of life and fact. For the ordinary purposes of our moral and spiritual guidance we can adequately satisfy requirements by opening our minds and hearts to receive the best we can grasp. Piety and virtue need the aid of all inspiring traditions, but we test those traditions of goodness and wisdom by our reason and conscience, not by a patristic creed. We cannot yield to Dr. Overbeck's logic, and descend from our higher and wider outlook to intrench ourselves within the council chambers of Nicea, Constantinople, Ephesus, and Chalcedon; but we have much to learn from Dr. Overbeck's profound and accurate ecclesiastical knowledge, and we learn from him gladly because we know the noble disinterestedness of his career, the integrity of his character, and the chivalric spirit with which he has for years been sacrificing his laborious leisure to the attainment of a task difficult to the combined energies of hundreds of the powerful, but stupendous when resting on the enthusiasm and zeal of one otherwise hard-worked student. Whoever has perused the pages of the "Orthodox Catholic Review" since its commencement, in the year 1867, will appreciate the single-hearted earnestness of a foreigner who, aided only by his learning and his virtue, has been striving to induce the Eastern patriarchs to organise in England an episcopal Church in full communion with the "Holy Eastern Orthodox Church."

It is often said by intelligent Unitarians, "there is no standpoint between Unitarianism and Romanism." Those who thus speak mean that if the natural and human means provided by God are insufficient, and a supernatural teaching authority be deemed a Divine condition, then there can be but one such authority deserving the consideration of trunants from the army of Free Thought. Dr. Overbeck proves most successfully the fallacy of that opinion. He adduces irrefragable arguments against the claims of the Papal Church; and if we ignore one hundred and fifty years of Primitive Christianity, and accept the premises that Christ was a Divine being, that he established and organised a miraculously guided hierarchy to be preservers and propagators of a revealed body of doctrine and of supernatural rites divinely instituted, the question arises, "Which is the present representative of those Bishops who triumphed at Nicea, Constantinople, Ephesus, and Chalcedon?"

Dr. Overbeck proves clearly that it is not the Papal Church or the Anglican Church, or any of those non-Episcopal bodies, which, though approaching nearer to Early Christianity, cannot be regarded as in harmony with the Christianity which produced the creeds and the canons of the Church. If the clergymen, the ladies, and the laymen, who fancy that they enrol themselves under the banner of Athanasius, Basil, Ephrem, Cyril, Gregory, and Chrysostom, when they submit to the modern Papacy, would carefully study this "Plain View" by Dr. Overbeck, they would perceive why the Eastern Patriarchs declared, in 1848, that the "Papal Church is the chief heresy of the latter days, which flourishes now as its predecessor, Arianism, flourished before it in the earlier ages, and which, like Arianism, shall, in like manner, be cast down, and vanish away." He shows how Rome has manufactured doctrines in theology and morals; has introduced innovations and adulterations into each of the Seven Sacraments, has promoted laxity by the invention of Probabilism, Indulgences, and Obligatory Celibacy; has destroyed the peace of families, and the independence of States by sacramental direction; has crushed mental, spiritual, and political liberty beneath a monarchical despotism founded upon a fraud. Whoever desires to realise the audacity of the deceit whereby the claims of the Papacy were established upon falsified decretals, falsified capitularies, and falsified extracts, may beneficially consult the second volume of the "Orthodox Catholic Review," page 195, where it will be found that even a Roman Catholic historian, speaking of the Isidore decretals, acknowledges that "a more audacious, impudent, solemn, and persevering untruth has never been put forth, and for so many centuries been triumphant."

There are some minds always restless, until they have found some one to obey; always apprehending God's displeasure, until they can submit to an authority claiming with some show of reason a Divine sanction. Dr. Overbeck firmly believes that he has found such an authority in the undivided Church of the Seven Ecumenical Councils, A.D. 325 to 787. We do not admit the Divine authority of those Councils; but an unprejudiced student of Dr. Overbeck's facts must, it seems to us, admit that the ecclesiastical Christianity of those four centuries now nowhere exists, either doctrinally or sacramentally, outside the pale of the "Eastern Orthodox Church." We do not believe in the Sacramental system, in the Nicene dogmas, and in a supernatural ecclesiastical system based upon a miraculous revelation; but it would be for the happiness of nations and of families, and for the moral benefit of individuals, if persons holding that system of faith could be brought by Dr. Overbeck to see that their spiritual adhesion is due to the Patriarchs of the East, not to the Pope of Rome.

We are convinced that "Orthodox Christianity" cannot prove its credentials, and therefore it is to us only a great human historical corporation. We are not much affected by the knowledge that the Episcopal Churches of Rome and of England are alike separated from the faith and discipline of the age of the Œcumenical Councils, but we are profoundly interested in the consideration whether the ecclesiastical sacramental form of Christianity, to which probably for a long period of time many millions will continue to be subject, should be represented by the freer spirit of the Greek Church, or by the dangerous and injurious despotism of the Papacy. The Church of England, from our point of view, greatly superior to either, will, until its inevitable disestablishment, retain the allegiance of those who have a general belief in a Miraculous and Trinitarian Christianity, and who happily are content to be governed by a legislature which all of us control. When ceasing to have legal claims upon the land, it is emancipated from State control, we may expect to see it divide into two episcopal bodies, the one evangelical, the other sacramental. The evangelical section will co-operate in many respects with the various Evangelical Churches; the sacramental section will, doubtless, seek from the Eastern Patriarchs that ecclesiastical fellowship which cannot be granted until the Anglican orders have been rendered valid, and the Anglican dogmas conformed to those of the "Holy Orthodox Church of the East." At present the Church of England has some claims upon our sympathy, because it is sectionally latitudinarian, is governed by us, and is excommunicated alike by all the Greek and Latin Churches. Our sympathy is lessening year by year, as Ritualistic clergymen keep by continued evasion of the spirit of National Protestantism which instituted it, dragging their congregations into a servile imitation of modern Romanism. At present the Church of England is only a national compromise under the joint legislation of all of us, of all forms of belief. The time draws near when there will be in England, as in France and Italy, Prime Ministers not even nominally belonging to any Episcopal Church, and then those Anglicans who really believe in the truth of Patristic Christianity will gladly renounce the conveniences of an Establishment to escape the bondage to all religionists which must always be the essential feature of a "National Church." At present, however, the Anglican Church is out of court; though Trinitarian it is alike heretical and unorthodox, according to modern Rome, and, according to the Eastern faith of one thousand five hundred and fifty-six years; whereas, according to us, all of the Trinitarian Churches have alike lost hold of the earlier Christianity, which was probably a compound of what we can now describe as Socinianism, Congregationalism, Swedenborgianism, and the Quakerism of George Fox.

It were to be hoped that those who continue Trinitarians might happily rest satisfied with the gentle cultured semi-Rationalistic latitudinarianism of the Church of England, or of the best sections of English Evangelical Nonconformity, thus carrying on a line of national piety possessing many claims upon our affection and gratitude; but such a position is (as proved by Dr. Overbeck) impossible to those who believe the Sacramental system and the Patristic faith alike essential to salvation.

There is such a growing tendency amongst Anglicans to blacken Protestantism and to palliate Romanism that we turn with a sense of quickened veracity to indictments of the Papacy based upon unexaggerated facts.

Cardinal Manning says:—"We may be sure that whatsoever is prevalent in the Church under the eye of its public authority, practised by the people, and not censured by its pastors, is at least conformable to faith and innocent as to morals. Whosoever rises up to condemn such practices and opinions thereby convicts himself of the private spirit which is the root of heresy." Alongside of this statement Dr. Overbeck gives an inscription which is prominently placed near the altar on the walls of the Church of SS. Pudens and Pudenciana, said to be the oldest church of Rome, "those who visit this church obtain on every day an indulgence of three thousand years and the remission of the third part of their sins." Inscriptions at other altars under the eye of the supreme Pontiff declare that "whenever a Mass is celebrated at this altar a soul is liberated from purgatory." Inscriptions in other churches promise plenary indulgences to persons going round certain images on their knees, or receiving a minute fragment of blessed cloth to wear on the breast and back. Books widely circulated for the guidance of penitents inform them that contrition is not needed, but that whatever their guilt attrition suffices, namely, the rejection of sin solely through the motive of fear; and that according to the now approved doctrine of "Probabilism," a person may in moral action acquiesce in the opinion of any writer of authority, even though such opinion be not the more probable.

If the "Holy Orthodox Church" has remained stationary through ages, at least it has not degenerated into the superstitions and moral errors of which these may be accounted specimens; it has never received the creeds absurdly called "The Apostles" and the "Athanasian;" it has never opposed the circulation of the Scriptures in the vernacular; it has never adopted the personal form of absolution enjoined in the Roman ritual, and in the visitation of the sick of the Church of England; their clergy have not sought the imposition of tithes; their prelates have never assumed the haughty air of lordly and anti-national demagogues peculiar to Latin Christianity.

So long as the belief of millions demands the possession of a patristic, sacramental, episcopal, Trinitarian, and ancient system, the lovers of mankind must hope that such believers may possess it in its least injurious form, under circumstances the least calculated to be detrimental to the individual, to the family, to society, to freedom, and to the State. Two illustrious brothers in England, Francis and John Henry Newman, have respectively embraced, the former what we believe to be the highest form of truth, the latter what appears to us the most injurious of the sects of wide influence. How happy would it have been if the "reaction" in England conducted by him had escaped contact with the papacy, and landed its adherents on the more ancient and less corrupted shores of the Greek "orthodoxy!"

The Nineteenth Century. Kegan Paul and Trench. The Contemporary Review. Strahan and Co.

The Nineteenth Century opens with a fine poem, full of classical allusion, by Matthew Arnold, on "Westminster Abbey: July 25th, 1881," the day of Dean Stanley's funeral. The poem has some rather abstruse references to the origin and early history of the Abbey, but the last four stanzas have universal interest, although two words will certainly puzzle non-classical readers.

And truly, he who here
Hath run his bright career,
And served men nobly, and acceptance found,
And borne to light and right his witness high,
What can he better crave than then to die,
And wait the issue sleeping underground?
Why should he pray to range
Down the long age of truth that ripens slow
And break his heart with all the baffling change
And all the tedious tossing to and fro?
For this and that way swings
The flux of mortal things,
Though moving only to one far-off goal.
— What had our Arthur gain'd, to stop and see,
After light's term, a term of ecceity,
A Church once large, and then grown strait in soul?
To live and see arise,
Alternating with wisdom's too short reign,
Folly revived, re-furbish'd sophistries,
And pululating rites externe and vain?
Ay me! 'Tis deaf, that ear
Which joy'd my voice to hear!
Yet would I not disturb thee from thy tomb,
Here sleeping in thine Abbey's friendly shade,
And the rough waves of life for ever laid.
I would not break thy rest, nor change thy doom,
Even as my father, thou,
Even as that loved, that well-recorded friend,
Hast thy commission done; ye both may now
Wait for the heaven to work, the let to end.
And thou, O Abbey grey,
Predestined to the ray
By this dear soul e'er thy precinct shed!
Fear not but that thy light once more shall burn,
One day thine immemorial gleam return,
Though sunk is now this bright, this gracious head!
— Let but the light appear
And thy transfigured walls be touch'd with flame,
Our Arthur will again be present here,
Again from lip to lip will pass his name.

There are two other theological articles in this

Review; the one entitled "The Agnostic at Church," an inconclusive plea by Louis Greg for going to Church as an example to others, and for the sake of influence without believing in a single iota of its creeds; and the other "Mythology among the Hottentots," a philological Essay full of curious learning, by Professor Max Müller. The former article is a practical illustration of what has often struck us, that the unbelieving, or rather nothingarian children of Unitarians soon lapse into the fashionable Church, and become, like Mathew Arnold himself, fanatical upholders of a National Establishment, with all their master's lofty disdain for earnest and conscientious, however unenlightened and uninteresting, Dissenters.

The Contemporary has not a single distinctively theological article, but Dr. Donaldson's address "On Some Defects in the Educational Organisation of Scotland" is valuable not only for its exposure of some of the admitted defects of the rapidly improving Universities of that country, and its advocacy of a higher standard of education, but for its thorough liberalism of tone in regard to existing theological controversies. We must quote in full a striking passage on the hindrances to the free study of theology in the Scotch Churches:—

Sometimes there are special obstructions to the attainment of eminence in some departments of thought. There is, for instance, a general impression that we have fallen behind in the study of theology, and that our country does not exercise that influence on theological thought and inquiry that it would be desirable it should. One symptom of this consciousness of weakness showed itself in an earnest desire to establish lectureships, and several important lectureships have been established. But the lectures have not attracted much attention in the literary or theological world of England or the Continent. Many of them have not attracted much attention even in Scotland. Most of them have added almost nothing of permanent value or permanent suggestion to theological thought, and the one or two that dealt ably and scientifically with their subjects have not received the attention which their great merits deserve, most probably because they were delivered in Scotland. And here, again, with the new educational impulse, a revolution has taken place. The Scotch theologian of past days dwelt largely on the doctrines of election, and the mode of Divine existence, and atonement, and similar dogmas. Most of these were doctrines not to be found expressly stated in Scripture. Almost all the terms of dogma are foreign to Scripture. Trinity, persons of the Trinity, Atonement, retributive justice, and a host of other theological terms are unknown to the Christian writings of the first two centuries, and the theologian acknowledged this. It was his business not merely to interpret Scripture but to make inferences from it, to work out the meagre statements of Scripture into dogmatic formulas, and to rationalise the whole into a closely-compacted and self-consistent scheme of theology. This work of the theologian has become somewhat antiquated, though it lingers amongst us. The theologian of the present day must first of all be an interpreter, and then he must be an historical investigator. He must know thoroughly the languages in which the Scriptures were written; he must cultivate the critical faculty, so as to weigh evidence in determining the dates and authorship of books, and the genuineness or spuriousness of certain suspected portions. And then he must be master of the languages in which the history of theology is to be investigated. There are thus certain acquisitions with which old theologians might have to some extent dispensed, but which are absolutely necessary to the modern. But besides these there is another and absolutely indispensable requisite for a successful theological inquiry—freedom of thought. If theological study is fettered by restrictions and penalties, successful inquiry into theological subjects is an impossibility. And I may add a third condition. It is necessary that there should be a sufficient number of competent readers. Many even of those who have mastered the means of conducting investigations feel no impulse to push their investigations beyond what their duty presents. They do not wish to add to human knowledge. They have other and more congenial work to accomplish in this world. But the cultivated man, and especially the cultivated minister, ought to be eager to appropriate every new truth that is revealed, and to master every important investigation that is made. And where there exists such a body of men on the outlook for mere knowledge and greater insight, it is certain that there will grow out of their midst some who will open up new vistas and push their investigations beyond the limit already reached, to the awakening of thought and the benefit of mankind. But I doubt whether there will be much extension of knowledge where there is not a considerable number of earnest and capable sympathisers.

These, then, seem to me to be the three conditions of an original theological literature—adequate preparations for the work, freedom of inquiry, and a considerable body of competent judges of the worth of the investigation. I am afraid Scotland falls short in each of these three requisites. I have already discussed the means which we possess for preparing the scientific theologian, and I doubt whether the other two can exist without these.

It would have been interesting to inquire how freedom of thought arises and grows, if time had permitted. But, at any rate, all will acknowledge that there can be no real freedom of thought, unless where there is a consciousness of the weakness and one-sidedness of the human mind and the infinity of truth. But such a consciousness can be produced only by much through reading and thought, and thus knowledge is essential to it. Ignorance and bigotry are continually associated, though knowledge does not always cast out bigotry. Be that as it may, he would be a bold man who could affirm that we have much freedom of thought in our churches.

Nearly all this applies with equal force to the condition of theological thought or want of thought in England, while the subsequent remarks on the Robertson-Smith case find their parallel in the persecution of Bishop Colenso and the Essayists and Reviewers by High Churchmen and Low Churchmen for once in brotherly alliance. Would that they had succeeded in their object and driven them all out, with Dean Stanley, Professor Jowett and all their aiders and abettors!

Returning to the Nineteenth Century we find under the heading of Politics three articles, two of them bearing on the threatening Parliamentary deadlock. The first of these is first "The Crisis of Parliamentary Government," in which Mr. Frederick Harrison proposes very considerable modifications in parliamentary procedure such as the cloture or, as he prefers to call it in plain English, the power to close debate, and legislation by carefully selected Committees. The second article on the same subject is on "The Machinery of Elective Government," by Professor Goldwin Smith, who directs his argument chiefly against the existence of a second chamber, party government, and direct election of the central legislature by the people at large, and proposes instead a single central assembly elected by the members of local assemblies, and itself electing the executive. We regret to read the Professor's bitter diatribe against female suffrage; and we are pleased to note his exposure of that gigantic sham the ballot, with the expression of the conviction that "probably the balance of advantage is on the side of allowing a man to give free expression to his real sentiments, whatever they may be; the result is then trustworthy, and the general action of the voters as citizens will be in accordance with their votes." The third political article is a criticism of "Morley's Life of Cobden," by A. J. Balfour, M.P., written from the Conservative and disparaging point of view. It is evident that party-spirit prevents even so able a man as Mr. Balfour from duly appreciating the simplicity of Cobden's character and the splendid service he rendered his country; while the Conservative party have never forgotten or forgiven that he charged the Protectionists with "stupidity," and, what is worse, proved his charge.

The remaining articles in the Nineteenth Century, on which we cannot now dwell, are "Canada's Highway to the Pacific," a very interesting account by H. Stafford Northcote, M.P., of the condition and prospects of British Columbia, our remotest colony in the North-West; "The Biologists on Vivisection," a reply by R.H. Hutton to the three papers by Sir James Paget, Dr. Wilks, and Professor Owen in the preceding number; "The Sicily of Thucydides and Theocritus," a delightful sketch full of picturesque description and classical allusion, by Alex. A. Knox; and "The Oldest Epic of Christendom," a fine, scholarly piece of literary criticism on the Song of Roland, by Agnes Lambert.

Returning to the Contemporary, Mr. John Rae's elaborate account of "Christian Socialists in Germany" is the most valuable in the present number, and we shall make it the subject of extended comment on another page. "Peasant Proprietors in France" is a lively sketch by Lady Verney of the condition of the rural population in the south-eastern and least fertile part of France. The writer draws from her own limited experience unfavourable conclusions of the most sweeping kind, which are contradicted by the prosperous condition of peasant proprietors in Belgium, Switzerland, and some of the northern districts of France itself. Passing on to a kindred subject, in a vigorous paper on "The Irish Landlords," the Rev. J. F. Mahaffy, one of their compatriots, tells them some home truths, and exposes their general incompetence, folly, and ignorance, while, of course, he repudiates all sympathy with the party of violence and lawlessness by whom they are assailed and often defrauded. Mr. Alfred Austen continues his literary discussion of "Old and New Canons of Poetical Criticism," ornamented with copious extracts from Wordsworth's "Excursion." The five remaining articles are "The Value of Egypt to Great Britain," by Lieut.-Colonel Osborn, who advocates a neutrality assured by a European guarantee, with a European prince ruling in a spirit of Western enlightenment; "Married Women in Factories," in which Professor Stanley Jevons shows from the evidence of various local reports that the employment of child-bearing women leads to great abuses and ought to be checked by legislation; "Zululand after the War," in which F. E. Colenso advocates the restoration of Cetewayo; "The City of London; its Population and Position," an elaborate comparison of the night and day censuses of London, by Mr. Alderman Cotton, M.P., whose object is to oppose "any attempt to reform or to enlarge the scope of the Corporation of London," and finally "Our Industrial Schools," in which Mr. Alfred Hill, judiciously avoiding the recent personal controversy, maintains that "notwithstanding shortcomings more or less unavoidable in all human institutions, our Industrial Schools have conferred, and are conferring, great benefit upon the nation." This is no doubt quite true; and Mr. Hill himself allows that more efficient inspection, especially by ladies, would be the means of detecting and obviating abuses and shortcomings. The Industrial Schools established and superintended by Mary Carpenter—to whom a due meed of praise is given—were free from even the slightest suspicion of abuses and shortcomings.

The two numbers, it will be seen, are, as usual, full of variety and interest, and many of the articles are even more than usually readable.

Literary Notes.

THE death is announced of Julius Bahnsen, the German philosopher, a pupil of Schopenhauer.

A MONOGRAPH on the Dial, the magazine edited nearly half a century ago by Emerson, Ripley, and Margaret Fuller, is now being prepared by Mr. G. W. Cooke, the recent biographer of Emerson. Copies of the Dial are now exceedingly rare, especially of the fifth and fourteenth numbers.

MESSRS. LONGMANS are now about to bring out two volumes, by Dr. Bain, of Aberdeen, on the Mills, father and son. The volume on James Mill is an exhaustive biography; that on John Stuart Mill is a full criticism of his writings and character, coupled with personal recollections and some important family documents.

CANON W. N. MOLESWORTH, whose valuable "History of England from the Year 1830" has met with much appreciation, has now in the Press a "History of the Anglican Church from 1660 to 1860."

MR. JOHN HEYWOOD, of Manchester, intends to publish immediately new editions of "Lancashire Legends, Traditions, Sports," &c., and "Lancashire Folk-lore," illustrative of the Superstitious Beliefs and Local Customs of the People of the County Palatine. Both these volumes, which were edited by the late John Harland, F.S.A., and the late T. T. Wilkinson, F.R.A.S., have for a long period been out of print and scarce.

RELIGIOUS journalism in Scotland is about to receive an accession in the shape of a new weekly, to be called the Christian Leader. Its projectors promise to combine "the vivacity of the best secular newspaper" with a distinctly religious purpose.

THE last two months have been remarkable for the sale of two fine libraries, in addition to that of the Sunderland Library. The January number of the "Bibliographer" contains a full account of the Sunderland, Crawford, and Daniel Gurney sales. A series of articles on "Popular Anniversaries" is commenced in the same periodical.

THE first edition of the birthday book designed by the Princess Beatrice is already exhausted. A second edition is in preparation, but cannot be ready before early in February, in consequence of the time required for the large number of different printings.

MR. ANDREW CARNEGIE has offered to the city of Pittsburg the sum of £50,000 sterling for a free library, on the one condition that the city shall appropriate £3,000 per annum to its maintenance. Mr. Carnegie is a native of Dunfermline in Scotland.

MR. MILLET, a brother of the late distinguished artist, is the originator of an idea for using thin panels of natural woods for the covers of books—veneers, such as have long been used for furniture and wall decorations. These veneers are cut so thin that over one hundred are needed to make a pile an inch high.

A NEW Turkish and French dictionary is now being compiled at Constantinople by Murif Pacha and Constantinidi Effendi. Having been engaged in the Foreign Office both are familiar with the numerous words which have been adopted recently as representative of Western ideas.

CARMEN NATALE.

MDCCCLXXXII.

Another page of life turned o'er,
With all that we have written there;
Days past, returning nevermore,
And clang of bells upon the air.
The Old Year to his rest departs,
What future will the New Year bring?
And so we cry, with eager hearts,
"The King is dead—long live the King!"

What guerdon can the Future give
Will put the buried Past to shame?
Will higher aspirations live,
And all mankind have nobler aim?
Will Freedom reap with ampler sheaves
The harvest of the days to be,
And Plenty beneath each man's eaves
Smile out from shining sea to sea?
Will Peace be with us in the land,
And no grim Terror walk the night,
And those our brethren understand
How fain we are to do them right?
And while at wrongs that erst have been
The tear-drop of contrition starts,
Saint George's wavelets roll between
Our hearths, but sunder not our hearts.

May England in the year that lies Before her, keep her ancient might,
And wheresoe'er her banner flies
Be strong to battle for the right.
A great inheritance we hold,
'Tis ours to guard it with all care,
Nor let the lust of power or gold
Deface the blazon that we bear.
The music from the steeple fills
The air with echoes near and far,
Day dawns upon a thousand hills,
And swiftly pales the morning star.
And still, come weal or come there woe,
Whate'er its horoscope appear,
Firm hand to friend, firm face to foe,
Best welcome in the glad New Year.—Punch.

THE DEAN STANLEY MEMORIAL.—A meeting of the General Committee for the Dean Stanley Memorial was held on Tuesday afternoon, in the College Hall, Westminster Abbey, the Prince of Wales in the chair. It was announced that the sum of £3,350 14s. 6d. had been already subscribed. It was resolved that the execution of the recumbent figure, to be placed in Henry VII's Chapel, should be entrusted to Mr. Boehm, A.R.A., Mr. Pearson, R.A., the architect of the Abbey, being consulted as to the tomb upon which the figure is to rest. An executive sub-committee of twenty-one persons was appointed.

HOSPITAL SUNDAY IN NEW YORK.—The custom of collecting money in churches on one day in the year in aid of hospitals, which was introduced into New York from London, is gaining ground on the other side of the Atlantic. Hospital Sunday in New York was held on Christmas Day, and the collection amounted to 44,000 dollars. In 1879, when the movement was first started, the amount realised was only 26,000 dols.

THE RELIGIOUS CENSUS.

The Spectator writes:—The return of a man's nominal religion is not only an essential part of a religious census, it is the most important, if not the only important, part. The motive of recording figures of this kind may be presumed to be the inflicting of preliminary encouragement or discouragement upon the forces of each side. From the point of view of pure partisanship it is, of course, immaterial whether the facts to which the figures bear testimony have much or little to do with the matter in hand. But to politicians it is not so. Whatever may be their opinion as to the theological value of an Established Church they will not wish to see an existing Established Church pulled down under a misapprehension. Nor will they wish to see a serious attempt to pull it down begun under a misapprehension. If the people of England are determined to make an end of the Established Church, they must, of course, do so. But it is not expedient that they should make an end of it in the false belief that, numerically speaking, it is of no importance, or that any section of them should waste public time and temper in trying to do while they are still a minority what can only be done when they have become a majority. From this point of view a religious census which deals with attendance is valueless, as compared with a religious census which deals with profession. An Established Church, as such, is a political institution; and the object of a religious census is to ascertain what proportion of the population wish well to this political institution. For a man to be not merely a member, but an ardent supporter, of the Church, it is not in the least necessary that he should be a regular, or even an occasional, attendant upon its services. Judged by the test which the Dissenters wish to apply, Lord Eldon would have been a very bad Churchman. Yet those who, on this hypothesis, had assumed that he need not be taken into account in estimating the forces of the Establishment would have been very much in the wrong, and there are probably many at the present time who in this respect at least resemble Lord Eldon. It is a mistake to mix up religious enthusiasm, the habit of devotion, or a taste for sermons, with the question of an Established Church. These are quantities which occur on both sides of the equation, and may consequently be omitted without affecting the result. When possessed by a supporter of the Established Church, they add to his zeal in the defence of the existing order of things; when possessed by an enemy to the Established Church, they add to his desire to pull down the existing order of things. It is quite possible that the motive which makes a man a lover of the Established Church may be dislike or suspicion of religious enthusiasm. He may wish to see the existing order of things maintained, because he regards it as a bulwark against Ultramontanist or Puritanism. A man of this temper will probably be a very unfrequent attendant at public worship, and the Dissenting method of collecting religious statistics would not enumerate him at all. But as a politician dealing with a political institution he has every right to be enumerated. He, and such as he, will be among the adversaries with whom the Dissenters will have to reckon, whenever the campaign against the Established Church is begun in earnest. A census which arranges men according to their professions is certain to include him, whereas a census which arranges men according to their attendance at church or chapel will be likely to leave him out. By all means let us know how many people went to church or chapel on a particular Sunday, but do not omit to note the far more important fact how many people on that same day returned themselves as Churchmen or Dissenters.

THE CHURCHES AND THE CLERGY.

The Echo writes.—The Churches fail to realise, even in the most inadequate manner, the idea of fraternity. They are beneficent in their action, it is true, but there is a wide difference between fraternity and beneficence. The brotherhood enjoined by the New Testament is not of a mere conventional character; it is instinct with reality and thoroughness. Between the brotherhood of the Apostolic Churches and the isolation of the members of our modern congregations, in which the "dearly beloved brethren" with which the parson commences the service sounds something like a mockery, there is a most painful contrast. Unquestionably in our great towns a man will find the idea of fraternity far more fully developed in a Lodge of Freemasons or Good Templars than in a Christian Congregation. It was the fraternal idea which won for Christianity its splendid triumphs in the Apostolic age; it is the same idea which gives so much popularity to the modern organisations we have just mentioned. There are not a few of our crowded churches and chapels, too, which are mere preaching shops. The influence of the minister begins and ends with his spoken words in the pulpit. The great majority of the congregation know him as a preacher only; he does not attempt to exercise the more potent charm of personal intercourse upon his hearers. He and they are strangers and foreigners, not fellow-citizens of a spiritual kingdom. To jutter such unwelcome truths is to provoke resentment; for the members of the clerical profession, who are licensed censors of others, as a rule are the most sensitive to adverse criticism when the tables are turned.

There is yet another consideration which the clergy would do well to ponder. This is the democratic age, in which even a territorial aristocracy has found it necessary to descend from its eminence to patronise working men's clubs, and to compete with Liberal politicians in social legislative projects. An active and earnest minority of the clergy have had the sagacity to recognise this fact and to act accordingly; but the prevailing bias is still in an opposite direction. They have a splendid vantage-ground, if they only know how to use it; but unfortunately too many seem wholly unable to make use of golden opportunities. Where one Bishop like Dr. Fraser is imbued with popular sympathies, and, consequently, whenever he preaches in a pulpit on a Sunday, preaches also from three or four great Lancashire daily papers on Monday morning, there are a hundred Church dignitaries who drone dull platitudes on Sunday in church or cathedral and find no after echo. In vain St. Paul reiterates the grand old truth that godliness has first of all a promise of the life that now is; his words fall unheeded upon their unwilling ears. The world still moves forward while their eyes are longingly cast backward. Whenever a living man speaks to living men with words full of faith, and sympathy, and spiritual power, he is sure to strike a responsive chord.

THE POPE AT ROME.

The Pall Mall Gazette writes:—A chapel stands in the Appian Way which is known by the name of "Domine, quo vadis?" It owes its name to one of those legends which, although not always recognised as authentic, nevertheless do so much to surround with romantic interest the events of the early Church. St. Peter, so the legend runs, when a prisoner in Rome, made his escape from his gaolers, and was hastening to a place of safety, when he met his divine Master on the spot where the chapel now stands. "Domine, quo vadis?"—"Master, where goest Thou?" asked the Apostle. "I go to Rome," was the reply, "to be crucified anew, since thou hast not the courage to face martyrdom." Humiliated and repentant, St. Peter returned to Rome, re-entered his dungeon, and calmly awaited the time of his crucifixion. No crucifixion awaits Leo XIII. in the palace-prison of the Vatican; but chafing at the loss of the temporal sovereignty, and resenting his inability to smite with the sword of the civil power those who make mock of his spiritual attributes, the successor of St. Peter threatens to fly from the Eternal City. According to M. H. G. Montferrier, who writes from Rome to the Journal des Débats, all the preparations for his departure are complete. The inventory of the treasures of the Vatican is drawn up in readiness for transmission to the Ambassadors accredited to the Holy See. The Pope says his trials are becoming every day more unbearable. But if there is progression in evil, its term has not yet been reached, and the Pope may go farther and fare worse. The recent policy of his party has not been calculated to remove the troubles of which he complains. Ever since the clericals, without the cognisance and against the wishes of the Pope, converted the ceremony of the removal of Pío Nono's remains into a political demonstration, feeling has been rising higher on both sides. But from the first to the last nothing has been done to molest the Pope. As it was at the beginning so it has been to the end. All that the Pope could allege in his address to the cardinals on Christmas Eve was that the ceremony of the canonisation was shorn of its pomp and splendour; that "some of those at Rome" ridiculed the ceremony and the saints; and, lastly, that the pilgrims were exposed to "the violence of the populace." But no violence was used to speak of, and what there was the pilgrims brought upon themselves by denouncing Italy in the hearing of Italians. If the Pope has no worse grievances than these to complain of he has but slight claim upon our sympathies. The fact that he regards as indispensable to the free exercise of his spiritual authority the power to suppress free speech and gag the press—for in no other way can these "insults" be prevented—is not calculated to evoke much enthusiasm in favour of the restoration of his temporal dominions. He would have a much better chance of securing a real independence if he were to send his supporters to the polls at the next general election in Italy, and to make terms with a clerically inclined Parliament on the basis of the status quo, ameliorated by a large increase of the annual grant from the Italian Exchequer.

REVISION PARODIED.

The New York Independent has the following parody for every word and sentence in which it quotes the authority of the New Revision:—

Forasmuch as certain prudent men, even forty men save one, have taken in hand to communicate unto us the New Testament in careful and honourable English, for our edification, I am minded and my will willeth to be made a disciple unto it, and to be taught of them to write unreproveably. I repent myself that I have so long observed the commandments of my former masters, and the ensamples of them which were supposed to know how that our tongue ought to be used; but, and if my life be spared that I might learn, I have set my hope on this, that I shall straightway cease to make such havoc of the words and the grammar as I did aforetime, and shall do righteousness, and haply shall commend myself unto the judgment of the many, which are an hungred after excellency of speech. Howbeit I am thoroughly convicted in regard of this, that I shall have a hard season in learning, and must needs be holden up and holpen of my fellows, if I am to succeed, and show myself meet for the work which is before my face.

It is evident, to speak after the flesh, that it is waxing sore hard to read the Bible, whiles it is being saved from being made too common, and is become before the rest of the books in deepness; and that whensoever it shall have passed through revisions and revisions, good for us were it rather that it had never been written, except, peradventure, we shall be able to fill up the measure of our want of understanding through many ancient authorities (now in Hades), and some modern foolish ones, which ought, ought, I say, yea verily contrariwise, God forbid.

Now, therefore, seeing that we have an exceeding comely and seemly Testament, let us read out from thence and let us have peace; and let us not set ourselves to find fault with it, neither complain concerning them which have spoiled it of so much that ought not to have been purloined from it, lest we shall make it manifest that we think of ourselves more highly than we ought to think, and men think that we do not so think as to think soberly; but, through our overmuch confidence, by stinking we shall stink in the presence of the very chiefest scholars, of whom we rejoice, but toward whom we count to be of good courage.

For this cause I wrote on this wise. If I have caused grief to any, may his tears be put into tear-skins and his eyes be wiped with the handkerchief of his hands. But sufficient to you is this epistle.

A POSITIVIST SERVICE.

The Pall Mall Gazette gives the following account of a New Year's service at the Positive Church of Humanity:—

At eight o'clock on New Year's Eve a little company of men and women assembled to celebrate the Festival of all the Dead in the Church of Humanity. It was so dark that it was difficult to read the inscription on the signboard which swings above the door of the Temple of Sociolatriy, in Chapel-street. The interior of the Church of Humanity, from the walls of which thirteen busts of the typical heroes of the race looked down in dusty contemplation upon almost exactly twice that number of living representatives of the Great Being who sat below, was in impressive contrast to the rush and roar of Lamb's Conduit-street, flaring with the glare of many ginpallaces, and thronged with a hurrying noisy crowd doing the last night's marketing of the departing year. In the congregation both sexes were represented—the women slightly predominating. Dr. Congreve began with the invocation: "In the name of Humanity! Love our Principle; Order the Basis; Progress the End. Live for others—Live openly." Then, opening the Bible, he read from the fifth-third chapter of Isaiah of One who was despised and rejected of men, a Man of Sorrows and acquainted with grief, who was wounded for our transgressions, who was bruised for our iniquities, and with whose stripes we are healed. As the familiar words fell upon the ear, and the eye rested on the picture of the Madonna with the infant Christ above the head of the reader, it might have been supposed to be a Christian church, where it not for the grim visage of Cæsar that frowned from the wall above and the glass-covered bust of Comte which occupied the position of honour below. After some more music came the prayer for the Festival of the Dead. Dr. Congreve then proceeded with his address.

The dead, who were the rulers of the living, with an indispensable and inevitable sway, deserved, he said, the solemn commemoration of their subjects. Catholicism had happily introduced the custom. Positivism universalised and systematised it. In the worship of the future, when the Comtist calendar is adopted by all mankind, this day will stand out more prominently, a day apart, not included in any week or month, left over exclusively for this natural and beautiful consecration. All living beings die, but man alone cares for his dead. This care represents surviving influence, and on these foundations, has grown up the dominion of the dead, which is supreme over our life. Death, one of the laws of life, and necessary for the mobility of humanity, would in the future be painless to those who die, and fraught with but little suffering to those who are left. As death is the end of life, why should life all labour be? Life as at present organised was that of the beast of burden. In the future it would be that of the rational servant of humanity. While Positivists deliberately accept death as the close of direct personal existence, they claimed to preserve and to elevate all the higher notions connected with the Christian conception of the immortality of the individual soul. Life to us also is a discipline, a preparation, an unbroken service, the putting on of a new man by victory over our lower selves, not in the interest of ourselves but of others. No visible crown of glory awaits us, no sentient existence in another world; but we have a crown of rejoicing in knowing that we pass on to others all the good of our lives, and thereby secure our continuous existence in the lives of others. Death cannot be an evil, for it is universal. We mourn for those whom we have loved and lost, but while we mourn we honour. They live with us in our memory; they are a part of our lives; we move as in their presence, we feel their support in all our difficulties. Remaining in intimate communion with us, continuing their work, and acting on the inspiration of their example, we prolong their existence, and secure their not having lived in vain. Therein have we a resource which experience will prove to be beyond expectation great. Dr. Congreve concluded by reading a hymn, beginning with the invocation, "Come, thou holy Paraclete," and after addressing Humanity as "Mother of the Poor," of "Comforters the best," from whom comes "every holy deed and thought," concluded with the prayer "Be we Thine eternally."

Then again the small congregation stood up, and Dr. Congreve offered up a prayer of praise to "Holy Humanity" for all the blessings accumulated by the past, but in particular for Augustus Comte, "who has interpreted and justified thy Past," and prayed that "day by day, in all humility and singleness of heart, we may magnify thee, and attain for ourselves, and help others to attain, the great blessings which only communion with thee can give—Union, Unity, Continuity." And all the people said, Amen. Then Dr. Congreve pronounced the benediction—"The Faith of Humanity, the Hope of Humanity, the Love of Humanity, bring you comfort and teach you sympathy, give you peace in yourselves and peace with others, now and for ever!" And again all the people said, Amen. After some solemn music the little company dispersed in silence, and the service was over.

LEONARDO DA VINCI.—A prize of £200 is offered by the Institute of Science and Art of Milan for the best life of Leonardo da Vinci. The time allowed is four years. It can be written in Latin, English, Italian, French, or German.

It is proposed to collect at the Laurentian Library, in a room which will be built for the purpose, all the MSS. of Dante which are to be found in the libraries at Florence (belonging to the Government). They number about three hundred.

THE COMING CONFERENCE.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—A "Well Wisher," &c., in your issue of the 31st ult. complains of place and time fixed by the Committee for the meeting of the proposed Conference. Both have been decided upon after very mature deliberation by the Committee. Ready means of communication bring Liverpool within a day's journey from Wales, Scotland, and Ireland, as well as from most places in England. From Ireland the Committee has already received thanks for the choice made.

As to the date: Autumn is already full of conferences, the British Association for the Advancement of Science, the National Association for the Promotion of Social Science, the Provincial Gathering of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. Whitsuntide is occupied by our London Gatherings. In summer the Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire meets, so we are driven into the spring, and a meeting held then in Liverpool is far less likely to interfere with the London meetings of our associations than it would do in autumn with the Provincial gathering.

It is not possible to meet every objection or every wish of our many friends, but may I suggest that it would be more helpful to us if those objections and wishes were sent to the Committee for its careful consideration before being sent to the public press, where they are apt to be misconstrued into hostile criticism instead of friendly counsel?

S. ALFRED STEINTHAL, one of the Secretaries of the Committee.

The Limes, Nelson-street, Manchester, Jan. 2.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—Permit me to add my protest to that of your correspondent of last week against the time and place of the National Conference of Unitarian and other Churches. The selection of Liverpool will, as you have pointed out, prevent nearly all the ministers of the South and West of England from attending. Two or three ministers in London who are officially bound to go, or have special connection with the North, will probably be the only representatives of the ministerial body in the South; while it is quite beyond the reach of probability that Maidstone, Brighton, Southampton, Portsmouth, Bridport, Exeter, Plymouth, and the numerous smaller congregations in the neighbourhood of those flourishing towns will be represented by a single minister or layman. Had Birmingham, the geographical centre of England, been selected, the North and the South would be equally convenience, and, with the metropolis, would no doubt be largely represented. The practical result of the present unfortunate arrangement will be that the Conference instead of being really national will be simply a "provincial assembly," comprising representatives of the local churches, who, under that well known designation, already have an annual meeting in June in one of the towns of Lancashire or Cheshire. Moreover, Liverpool is "up in a corner" in more senses than one, as it has never acted very cordially with the Manchester and the West Riding districts, or thrown itself with any active zeal into the wider denominational movement of which the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, out of which the proposed Conference has sprung, is the chief representative. If it were desirable to go so far north surely Manchester, the real centre and head-quarters of the denomination, should have been the place selected.

The time appointed is as unfortunate as the place. It is only six weeks before the annual meeting of the Unitarian Association in London. If the Conference is a success, as we all hoped it would be, it will take all the life out of our May meetings, as few will incur the expense of going from a considerable distance to both meetings; while the religious services, papers, and discussions of the meetings at Liverpool in April will forestall all the interest of the meetings in London at Whitsuntide. The Conference obviously should have been held in the autumn, not later than the middle or end of October, and in place of the usual Autumnal Provincial Meeting of the Unitarian Association. That date would have been sufficiently removed from the Whitsuntide anniversaries, and there would have been no clashing of interests, and no exhaustive demands upon the zeal of those who wish to attend both meetings.

According to present appearances, the arrangements seem to be made without due consideration.

Is it too late to alter them? Were the experienced officials and committee of the Unitarian Association taken into counsel? A MINISTER.

THE BRIBERS.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—In your paper of Dec. 31, page 858, under the head of "Occasional Notes," I read some remarks respecting the Macclesfield and Sandwich bribers. I am pained to read them in your usually kind and thoughtful paper. May I ask if the writer has ever read the thirty-first verse of the twelfth chapter of St. Mark? Had he seen as I have the unhappy children of the prisoners crying bitterly for their parents and wondering why they did not return home I think he would have paused. The sentence passed by Ezechus and his learned brothers seems very uncalled for, and writing as a magistrate I fail to see it tempered with the slightest mercy. May their Christmas firesides have been as happy as those of the prisoners and their families have been miserable in the extreme!

The Home Secretary has also hardened his heart against us, probably acting from some higher authority.

CHARLES BROCKLEHURST.

The Fence, Macclesfield, Jan. 2.

[We do not wish to press hardly upon men who are suffering the just penalty of their misconduct, but it is an obvious remark that the same appeal might be made on behalf of the unhappy children of other notorious criminals.—Ed. of Inq.]

BRIXTON.—A well-attended drawing-room meeting, with which was combined the annual meeting of the subscribers and friends of the Brixton branch of the Charity Organisation Society, was held on Saturday last at Raleigh Hall, Brixton-rise, the residence of Mr. Alex. McArthur, M.P., the President of the Society. Mr. McArthur presided, and delivered an interesting address, expressing his thorough approval of the objects of the Society, and presenting a donation of ten guineas in addition to his annual subscription. The Rev. E. Lookyer, curate of St. Saviour's, read the report of the Committee, which was a satisfactory document, and the Rev. E. P. Barrett (Baptist), on behalf of the Treasurer, Mr. C. P. Mason, absent in Italy, read the financial statement. The Revs. J. Worthington and T. L. Marshall, Dr. Bernays and Mr. James Stiff, of the London School Board, took part in the proceedings, which were very harmonious, and our friend Mr. C. Corkran and Mr. Loch, deputation from the Central Society, delivered admirable addresses, explanatory of the objects of the Society.

THE RELIGIOUS CENSUS.—Hitherto the census of church and chapel attendance has been confined mainly to large centres of population. Keen's Bath Journal has struck out a new course, and gives religious statistics respecting the small towns and villages surrounding that city. In the six towns of Bradford-on-Avon, Chippenham, Corsham, Frome, Milksham, and Shepton-Mallet the attendance at public worship was: Church of England—morning, 5,312; afternoon, 1,478; evening, 4,743. Nonconformists—morning, 6,003; afternoon, 1,160; evening, 7,472. In seventy villages around Bath, with a population of 59,990, the attendance was—Church of England—morning, 9,295; afternoon, 3,395; evening, 8,246. Nonconformist, morning, 5,668; afternoon, 2,987; evening, 9,004.—Census-taking is proceeding in Scotland. A return of the church attendance in Paisley shows that at the Established Churches the attendance was 3,823; Free Church, 2,726; United Presbyterian, 2,636; Baptists, 619; Roman Catholic, 1,480, and other denominations, 1,009. Kirkcaldy, with a population of 27,000, has twenty-five churches, providing 15,670 sittings. The average attendance was 6,739, rather more than a third of whom attend the Established churches. The Dundee Advertiser has followed up the religious census of that borough by a return from several of the neighbouring towns, viz.:—Perth, Arbroath, Montrose, Forfar, Brechin, Blairgowrie and Rattray, Kirriemuir, Coupar Angus, St. Andrew's, Cupar Fife, Broughty Ferry and Newport. It appears from this return that 30 per cent. of the aggregate population of these towns were at service on Sabbath morning. The Established churches were attended by 11 per cent. and the non-Established churches by 19 per cent. of the population in the towns. If we include Dundee, the attendance at the Established churches was 22,156; at all other places of worship, 45,559. In other words, the Established churches were attended by 17 per cent. of the population, and the non-Established churches by 36 per cent.

Religious Intelligence.

SOUTHPORT: TESTIMONIAL TO THE REV. T. HOLLAND, B.A.

On Friday afternoon, Dec. 30, a large number of ladies and gentlemen met in the Mayor's Parlour, Town Hall, for the purpose of presenting the Rev. T. Holland, B.A., who, for many years has been minister of the Unitarian Chapel, Portland-street, with a handsome testimonial in recognition of the great services he has rendered to the various institutions in the town. Mr. JOHN ATKINSON was voted to the chair.

Mr. W. FROANE then read the following:—"Testimonial to the Rev. T. Holland, B.A. At a meeting called by circular, and held in the Mayor's Parlour on Tuesday, the 27th September, the following resolutions were adopted:—The meeting having heard with much regret that the Rev. Thomas Holland is about to leave Southport, deem it right that his services in the cause of the charitable and philanthropic institutions of the town should receive a suitable acknowledgment, and that acknowledgment should take the form of a piece of plate and an illuminated address." "That the chairmen of the various institutions, with treasurers and honorary secretaries, form a committee to raise subscriptions, draw up an address, and to select such testimonial as may be thought suitable, in conformity with the wishes of the meeting." The Rev. Canon Clarke was appointed honorary secretary, and T. C. Riley, Esq., treasurer. The total sum subscribed amounted to £73 17s. 6d., but we can hardly tell you that this is the treasurer's account, for there are some amounts that have not yet come in. The committee of selection afterwards met and consulted with Mr. Holland as to what he would prefer, as he had intimated that a piece of plate would be but little use to him. The articles chosen are a handsome gilt timepiece, with two side pieces to match; one of Penlington's very best gold watches, with chain, and the following books:—Nine volumes of the 'History of Latin Christianity,' by Dean Milman; 'History of the Eastern Church,' by Dean Stanley; 'History of Canterbury Cathedral,' by Dean Stanley; and the 'History of Westminster Abbey,' by Dean Stanley. The inscriptions for the timepiece and watch, and also the illuminated address, were kindly drawn up by the Rev. Canon Clarke and Prebendary Cross, and the selection of the various articles was made by Mr. T. C. Riley and Mr. Froane. The cost of the gold watch and chain was £28, and the drawing-room clock and side pieces £33 6s. 6d."

The CHAIRMAN then read the address, which has been beautifully illuminated and executed by Mr. Marples, of Liverpool. It is as follows:—"We, the undersigned, beg to mark your departure from amongst us by a few words of kindly appreciation. For many years most of us have been intimately associated with you in the management of several of the important charitable and literary institutions of this town, more especially the Convalescent Hospital, the Infirmary, the Free Library, and the Savings Bank. We gladly bear grateful testimony to the geniality and assiduity which characterised the discharge of duties generously undertaken and ably fulfilled. Deeply regretting the severance of this connection, we avail ourselves of the opportunity which it presents to ask your acceptance of the accompanying memorials of our esteem. May we hope that they will serve to remind you of pleasant hours spent together in the past, as well as to assure you of our deep and earnest interest in your future welfare." Here follow the names of the unmentioned ladies and gentlemen:—B. S. Clarke, D.D., vicar of Christ Church, Southport, hon. canon of Liverpool; Thomas H. Cross, vicar of St. Andrew's, Southport, and prebendary of Clonfert; John Atkinson, J.P., chairman of the Provident Society; W. Froane, chairman of the Convalescent Hospital; Thomas L. Watson, chairman of the Infirmary; Richard Nicholson, J.P., chairman of the Atkinson Free Library, and many others.

The CHAIRMAN said that having sat for a considerable time—a period comprising five years—as colleague with Mr. Holland on the board of the Convalescent Hospital, on the board of the Infirmary, and on the board of the Provident Society, he could speak of the constant attendance he gave to, and the deep feeling and excellent manner with which he undertook and discharged all the duties falling upon a member of any of them; and he could not but think that they gave to him that degree of pleasure which it was intended should be given to parties interested in such a noble and just cause. With respect to the testimonial, he remarked that they hoped it would be a memento for many years of Mr. Holland's life, to remind him of the time which he had spent on boards of local societies here. It also struck him (the chairman) that it would recall to him the reminder that—

Time, like the tide, its motions keep,
'Till we shall launch that boundless deep
In which no ages roll.

They had felt with deep regret the loss of their friend the Rev. Thomas Holland, and he might say, with their bard, that, "We could have better spared a better man"—(applause).

The Rev. Canon CLARKE, D.D., said he felt it a very high honour and a very great pleasure to be the medium to convey these gifts to his excellent friend the Rev. Thomas Holland. It was a pleasing thing to be able to meet with a number of persons, such as those assembled there that day, on common grounds of humanity. They held various views, religious and political, and some of them held them very strongly; but there was nothing to hinder them from recognising good qualities in their fellowmen, although they did not see eye to eye in all things. It was a pleasure to him to work with men who were earnest in doing good, whatever might be their religious or political creeds; and he had had for years the great pleasure of working for various institutions in Southport in connection with Mr. Holland. From the first day he met him he found he was a regular worker, and one who was determined to do his duties to the best of his abilities. Mr. Holland had done admirable work in connection with all those institutions that had been mentioned by Mr. Atkinson, and he deeply regretted that he was leaving Southport. They would miss him at their boards, where he had been a kind, courteous, active worker. He would always feel the deepest interest in Mr. Holland's future, always be glad to hear that he was enjoying health and happiness, and he hoped that his lot would be cast in as pleasant a place as that in which they had been passed during those many years—(applause). He could not tell them of the pleasure he had in presenting Mr. Holland with the memorials of their respect and esteem for him. He hoped he would live long to wear the watch and chain, and also to view these very beautiful gifts, whenever he pleased to have them in house; that his wife and family would be spared long to him, and that they would have the pleasure of seeing in the memorials the respect and esteem in which the husband and father had been held by many in Southport—(cheers). He then handed to Mr. Holland the watch and chain, which the reverend gentleman received amid applause.

The Rev. Prebendary Cross endorsed all that had been said by Canon Clarke with respect to the Rev. Thomas Holland. The ability and perseverance with which he had discharged all the duties which he had so largely placed upon his own shoulders was much to be admired. Wherever Mr. Holland's lot might be cast, he hoped that he would bring to bear upon similar duties the same amount of large-heartedness and the same amount of ability which he had displayed in Southport—(applause).

The Rev. THOMAS HOLLAND on rising to acknowledge the testimonial was much applauded. He remarked that it would be but false modesty on his part if he was not to say that he was touched to the very heart for the kindness he had that day received from them. It had been to him the greatest pleasure to work for the various charities, and to bear such burdens as they might put upon his shoulders, and to strive to bear them well. The words that had been spoken had been such as to make him feel that they were more than he possibly deserved, but they expressed the kindness, goodwill, and generous large-heartedness of his very excellent friends, the Rev. Canon Clarke and the Rev. Prebendary Cross, and no doubt as well as of those present. Ever since he met Canon Clarke he had found in him a very excellent friend, one who possessed good sense and a sound mind, and one whom it was a pleasure to be with in any cause of charity in this town. He should like to say the same about his excellent friend Prebendary Cross. Southport was pre-eminently fortunate in having two such leading clergymen as they were. They were two gentlemen of great powers of mind, and were always ready to work with their fellow-men for the good of mankind. He had to return his hearty thanks to all his fellow-workers in Southport on those various boards and committees for the great kindness they had always bestowed upon him, and for the great courtesy they had shown him, as well as for the trust and confidence they had given to him. Since he had been connected with the Convalescent Hospital he had become, year by year, more attached to the work which was being carried on by the institution. They had also in the town an infirmary, which, in its working, was likewise well known to many of them. He should go away with more regret from Southport, did he not know the character of the men who managed that institution, and the good work that they especially carried on. There was another institution in the town—the Atkinson Free Library. He had had great pleasure in working on the committee of that society. Thanks to Mr. Atkinson—(applause)—it had a noble home; and it was also beginning to have a really respectable library. The institution had also a committee who knew well how to carry it on. With respect to the Provident Society, it had for its guidance their excellent friend Mr. John Atkinson—(cheers). It was likewise well officered, and was carrying on its work effectually and well. He had not been able to give much labour to the Provident Society, the three institutions he had named having taken up a great deal of his time. But he felt that he could leave the work of that society in the hands of the men who were conducting it. There was also another institution in the town over which Mr. John Atkinson presided—he referred to the Children's Sanitarium—which was carrying on a similar work, and doing it effectually and well. It was a pleasure to him to have been a subscriber to it for some years past. When he left Southport he asked them not to think that he would forget the many kindnesses he had received here. He could speak for his wife and children that they would never forget the kind words his friends had spoken on that occasion. With respect to the gifts, the rev. gentleman said that he received them not merely for their money value, but as a mark of the esteem and affection which they had shown him, and which was beyond any words of his to describe. They would have them before their eyes as mementoes of those in Southport; as mementoes of the good work which he knew would be carried on here in these noble institutions with which it had been his great joy and very great gratification to be connected. If any little labour of his had helped those institutions, he would be amply paid if that work had been effectual in promoting their interests. He had been more than paid by their expressions of kindness to him, a kindness that he never would forget, and which he would bear with him his life-long. And when he had departed this life he hoped his children would not only remember their father, but also remember those kind friends who made his life in Southport so exceedingly a happy one. In conclusion, he asked them to allow him to thank them all from the bottom of his heart for their great kindness to him. The rev. gentleman then resumed his seat amid much applause.

Alderman NICHOLSON moved a vote of thanks to the gentlemen who had conducted that testimonial from the beginning to the end.

The Rev. T. HOLLAND, having seconded the motion, it was carried unanimously.

Mr. FROANE, in reply, said it had been to him a labour of love throughout. They felt that they were doing a work which was deserved by the recipient of the gifts that day. He then moved a vote of thanks to the chairman, who, he remarked, had gone through his duties very creditably indeed.

This was unanimously received, and then acknowledged by Mr. Atkinson.

The timepiece bore the following inscription:—"To the Rev. T. Holland, B.A., from a few of his fellow-workers in the charitable institutions in Southport, as a token of their respect and regard. Dec., 1881."

The watch bore a somewhat similar inscription.

RINGWOOD.—The annual Christmas tea-meeting of the congregation of St. Thomas's Chapel was held in the schoolroom on the 26th December. The chapel and schoolroom were tastefully decorated by the ladies of the congregation. After tea Mr. John Conway, of London, took the chair, and opened the proceedings by giving a hearty welcome to all present. Mr. Cogan Conway then distributed Bibles and Hymn-books to various members of the congregation, from the bequest of the late Mr. William Clark, and briefly reviewed the work of the year, expressing his high sense and keen appreciation of the value of the services of their respected minister, the Rev. J. W. Smith. The year had been signalled by the adoption of Martineau's "Hymns of Prayer and Praise" in the services. Considerable and important repairs had been effected in the roof and floors of the chapel and the organ. All the side windows had also been renewed. This was naturally a heavy expense, which he, as treasurer, would have been wholly unable to meet, but for the liberal help of friends at a distance, prominent among whom were Mr. Hugh Martineau, of London; Dr. Genese, late of Bourne-mouth; and the late Mr. Samuel Sharpe. Still further assistance would be required before the whole charge could be defrayed. Mr. F. W. Osler gave an address to the parents of the Sunday scholars. The Rev. J. W. Smith briefly summed up the work of the year. Mrs. Smith made a statement as to the Provident Fund, which she has started and conducts in connection with the Sunday-school, and the remainder of the evening was devoted to music, readings and recitations. A very pleasant and profitable evening was brought to a close by singing the Evening Hymn.

TODMORDEN.—The annual congregational tea party was held in the schoolroom, Hanging Ditch, Todmorden, on Saturday evening last, and, happening on the eve of the settlement of a new minister, was of special interest to the regular attendants, and to many now living at a distance, formerly connected with the church or school. An excellent sandwich tea was served by a number of the ladies of the congregation, and afterwards a very interesting meeting was held, under the presidency of Mr. Walton Wadsworth, of Fairview. The annual report of the Sunday-school was read by Mr. James Crabtree, one of the superintendents, and showed that the number of scholars was well maintained (the school roll containing the names of as many children as the premises will accommodate), and during the year there had been a considerable increase in the number of teachers. The report was generally of a very favourable character, recording amongst other matters the establishment of three successful winter evening classes, and the accomplishment of much useful work by the Band of Hope and other auxiliaries of the school. A very hearty recognition was given of the services rendered in the Sunday-school during the year by the students from the Unitarian Home Missionary Board, who had been sent to supply the church pulpit. The report was adopted, and then the Christmas hymn, with variations, was performed by the church bell-ringers on their excellent peal of hand-bells. The Rev. C. J. Street, M.A., of Padiham, gave an appropriate address, congratulating the congregation very warmly upon the settlement of the Rev. Jas. Black amongst them, and also wishing that gentleman a long and successful ministry. The Rev. Thos. Leyland, of Burnley, gave an address on Sunday-school instruction. He remarked also that, though Unitarians did not show very large statistical results in chapel building and such movements, everything seemed to be tending in the direction of their position.—The Rev. Joseph Harrison, of Acricington, offered his congratulations to the new minister (Mr. Black) and to the congregation.—Mr. John Kershaw, actuary of the Sunday-school savings bank, read a short report of that department, showing that at the end of the financial year there were one hundred and thirty-three open accounts, and £1,058 13s. 1d. standing to the credit of depositors.—The Rev. Jas. Black, who was received with prolonged and hearty cheering, said that the present was a period which marked for him one step more in an eventful life. As most of those before him would be aware, he was brought up in connection with the Established Church of Scotland, and although he had left that church he had not one word to say against her. He left her with great reluctance, and only when he found he was no longer able to hold to all the points in her theology. He parted from her without any hard words, and came and found a home among the Unitarians. It was fifteen years since he preached his first sermon in a Unitarian place of worship, then he came to Gee Cross, and from that preliminary engagement he passed, in the month of April, into the Stockport pulpit, where until now he had remained. The ministers who had spoken had offered their congratulations on the good prospects opened up for them by the new circumstances in which they were placed; and he (Mr. Black) felt sure that these arrangements would be found advantageous, and the interests of all parties concerned wisely and generously regarded. Their secretary had asked him to state that Mr. Samuel Fielden, who had been invited to attend, regretted that he was unable to be with them. He (Mr. Black) was proud to become their minister at such a time, when, as he believed, they were entering upon a career full of promise, and one which was likely to be satisfactory to all. The church choir gave several glees during the evening, and the bell-ringers also played several pieces in a very successful manner. The usual complimentary votes of thanks were passed, bringing a pleasant meeting to a conclusion at nine o'clock.—On Sunday Mr. Black began his ministry at Todmorden, preaching at two services to large congregations.

The Liberal Pulpit.

THE CHURCH OF THE FUTURE.

[The following sermon was lately preached by the Rev. J. W. McCormick, a Methodist minister in Wisconsin, and led to his trial and expulsion from the Methodist Conference.]

"Can ye not discern the signs of the times?"—Matt. xvi. 3.

Not long ago a writer for one of the leading magazines made a call for "a New Religion," arguing that the old religion had become obsolete and worn out. And, still later, one of the contributors of the North American Review advertises for a "New Morality," and argues that we have no adequate system of morals now. But the most significant fact of our times, and which has most reference to this matter, is the revision of the New Testament and the proposed revision of the Old Testament also. These facts represent a real and pressing demand. Such utterances and events are the surface indications of a deep and constantly growing necessity for a re-statement of religious beliefs, to meet the wants not only of the young, who, coming up under the progressive influences of the times, at once reject the old formulas of faith, but also for the advantage of that great and growing multitude of thinking men and women, preachers and lay members, those inside of the Church as well as those who are outside, who wish to know the truth about their religious obligations, but who find themselves drifting away from the creed statements of the churches all the time. Those who are the best able to sympathise with this demand are such as belong to orthodox churches, and whose interests would be in every way subserved by clinging to the creed until forced by mature and settled conviction to dissent from it, and who yet find themselves being forced by the hard stress of stubborn facts, in spite of prejudice and training, to yield one point after another of the creed they adopted in early life, until the faith of former years has quite fallen to pieces. Those who are thus situated are in the best possible position to aid in the work of forming the plan of the Church of the Future, because every word they speak and every act they perform involves a personal sacrifice, and they are thus protected from wrong motives and ambitions.

What, then, are some of the facts upon which the much-needed and loudly called for religious creed of the future depends? The revision of the New Testament indicates, first, that the infallibility of the Bible must be given up. The old doctrine of the verbal or plenary inspiration of the Scriptures is exactly on a par with the dogma of the Pope's infallibility. There is exactly the same assumption in one that there is in the other. They are twin superstitions; one is precisely as reasonable as the other. Both alike contradict all reason and observation and experience. The latter needs no contradiction except to Roman Catholics, and the former has received its death-blow in the revised translation of the New Testament.

The Bible is to be taken as any other book is—for what it is worth and for the good that can be got out of it. The Bible creates no truth: it only reveals that truth which already exists. If, therefore, anything be found in the Bible that is of no use to you, it should be as if it were not there. It need not particularly be denied, unless it is contradicted by experience and facts; but it should not be forced upon the belief or acceptance. The cardinal blunder of all works of Christian apologetics has been this: they teach that the whole Bible must stand or fall together, or that the evidence of the truth of each part of the Bible is the same. No more foolish idea could be taught. The revisers have found various degrees of evidence in favour of many passages, and have not found enough for some to allow them to remain longer as a part of the Bible. And, independently of the external evidence of a passage of Scripture, is its inherent reasonableness no part of the evidence of its truth? And do all statements of Scripture commend themselves alike to the judgment?

Mr. Lincoln once said to a friend that if he could find a Church which had for its creed this, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength, and thy neighbour as thyself," he would join it at once.

But there were a great many requirements of belief in church creeds that he could not accept, and hundreds and thousands of other thinking men and women of large intelligence, who cultivate religious convictions, and recognise a Supreme Being, who has a right to their reverential regard, and who believe in self-sacrifice for the good of others, nevertheless find it impossible to join any church and subscribe to its creed without mental and moral stultification.

I find no difficulty, for instance, in believing that the principles set forth in the Ten Commandments or in the Beatitudes would, if adopted and practiced in any reasonable interpretation of them, tend to the physical, mental, and moral advancement of mankind. But, when I read the story of the annual troubling of the pool at Bethesda, by the angel, by which the strongest invalid present only was cured, I find here something from which my sense of goodness utterly revolts; and I would rather leave that story out, as I have left it out of my creed for years. And there are other matters, such as the resurrection of the body, the nature of the godhead, the nature and extent of future punishment, a general judgment, and many other things that are made a part of church creeds and concerning which the Bible speaks in a most uncertain way, so that many passages may be marshaled upon every side of these subjects—all such matters which cannot be settled by either reason or Scripture, or by both together, matters that are merely speculative and not practical, will be eliminated from the new religion. In the Church of the Future no one will be required to accept any part of the Bible that is of no use to him. The book of nature is the only plenary inspired book in the universe, but nobody is required to take any part of that book except that which he can use. If one were forced to swallow every product of the soil for food, for instance, how long would he survive the effects of the poison he would get into his stomach thereby? Each takes what is of use to him and lives and grows thereby; and the rest is to him as if it were not, although it may be useful to others. If somebody else can use any part that he cannot, well, but it is of no use to him. So of the Bible. According to the idea even of those who contend for its infallibility, it is a book for all times and all people. If it is, it cannot apply alike to all in its every part. But there will be parts that are useful to one age or nation or individual and not to another. I have no use for the Song of Solomon, for instance; nor do I think my age or nation has any use for it. But I can see why one book of the Bible should be written according to the tastes of an Oriental people, and so employ a luxuriantly imaginative style, and use the voluptuous figures of speech that belonged to that nation and age. I can readily understand the fact of sin and the reasons for resisting temptation; but, when it is the origin of evil that is to be discussed, I must be allowed to put an allegorical interpretation upon the story of the garden and on the "History of the Fall of Man." I can understand how the beautiful life of Jesus of Nazareth should appeal to the noblest impulses of the human heart and stimulate heroic purposes in the soul, and so exercise a redemptive influence upon the world. I can appreciate something of the deep wisdom of his teachings and feel the transforming influence of his life as I read the story of his suffering and his love. As I stand in the light of his Cross, it seems to become plain to me that selfishness is failure, and that sacrifice for the good of others is the highest and the only true success. All this is level with the plane of everyday life, and is the result of mental operations with which every one is familiar and has its basis in plain historical fact. But that Jesus died as God, or made an infinite sacrifice on the Cross, by which he bought off the wrath of God, or that he reconciled God to the race, or that he induced God to love mankind, or that God accepted Christ's righteousness in the place of man's, or substituted it for man's, all that to me is misty and nonsensical.

The New Religion will assume that there is valuable truth to be found in other systems of religion besides Christianity. It will repudiate the narrow and bigoted notion that God's revelations are confined to that little fraction of the race that have had the Hebrew Scriptures. Ignorance and prejudice have united, heretofore, in making the claim that all valuable religious truth was contained in the Bible. On the contrary, it is certain that no system of religion has ever found acceptance anywhere that did not contain much valuable truth. A study of the great religions of the world is the sure and speedy corrective of false notions on this subject. Such a study will find declarations of Confucius, Buddha, Zoroaster, Socrates, and the greatest minds of every nation and age that are worthy to be placed by the side of the words of Jesus. And such a study will confirm a thousand times the words of Paul, that "the grace of God that bringeth salvation hath appeared unto all men; teaching them to deny themselves of ungodliness and worldly lusts, and to live soberly and righteously in the present world." The best evidence of the truth of the Bible is that it reveals intuitive truth.

Liberty in the use of forms and ceremonies will be an article of the New Religion. This will remove one of the strongest supports of superstition. The ceremonials of the Church, connected with water baptism, the sacrament, clerical vestments, and all the forms of religion, are full of superstition. They will be left to the choice of all members of the Church of the future. They will be allowed to those who need the help of visible symbols, just as a heathen would be allowed the use of an image till he could be educated to a degree where it would no longer be necessary to him. But these forms, except some such as are necessary to organise and carry on religious services, will soon vanish into the neglect and desuetude of the old Jewish ritual, of which they are a part.

The pulpit of the New Religion will appeal to the conscience and affections through the judgment. Its aim will be to convince men and women that it is for their peace of mind, and for the conservation of every interest they possess, to be religious. And whatever does not tend directly to this end will have no place in pulpit ministrations. Speculative doctrines and beliefs and metaphysical distinctions will be eschewed. "Pelagian," "Arminian," "Antinomian," "Homocousian," "Homoiousian," "Socinian," "Arian," "Sub-lapsarian," "Supra-lapsarian," "Consubstantiation," "Transubstantiation," and all mere scholasticisms, will be neglected. Preachers will reason of righteousness and judgment (not judgment to come, but prudence, self-respect, wisdom). They will study and delve for ideas of a practical nature, such as will help and inspire those that hear them to a better life; and they will strive and toil to give these ideas such clearness and force and beauty of expression and illustration as will win the obedience of the people to them. This new gospel will be no weak, emasculated, one-sided thing, either. It will affectionally "warn every man" as well as "teach every man all wisdom." But, instead of declaring future punishment as a dogma, and representing God as torturing the damned in hell forever, it will tenderly urge all to consider the law of nature which punishes sin now and here, and whatever it has to say about future punishment will be based upon the facts of common knowledge and experience, and not upon any arbitrary declaration. It will point out the tendency to permanency of character or the law of habit, which fixes the condition more irrevocably every hour, and which binds men of wicked life in chains, and torments them with quenchless fires and gnawing pains, even here in this life. It will proclaim a present judgment going on every day around us as the real one which is to be the basis of every other one. It will urge men to consider what will be the consequences wrought out by this law of habit in a million years, if it produces such results in a lifetime.

The New Religion will not divorce piety and good living. It will obliterate the false distinctions that the Church has made and still makes, by which those amusements that are good and healthy are condemned, while those that are bad and unhealthy are allowed, and by which those recreations which nature demands are proscribed, while dishonesty, slander, backbiting, and many other crimes against society are winked at. Let me be explicit here, for I make a very grave charge. I speak from sad experience. I have not sought these unsavoury and damaging things. They have been forced upon me. On one occasion a leading member of the church in my charge demanded that some young people should be expelled from the church for attending a ball. The demand was seconded by the official board. I said to them this:—"If you wish to go into the cleaning-up business I am with you. But we will begin with the worst things. There are members of this church who cheat and slander and backbite, and swear and break the Sabbath, and who are miserly, and who use obscene language, and who are intemperate. We will turn them out of the church first, and then we will see about these young people who have been dancing." That was the end of that business; I heard no more about it. I have had my hands tied and my efforts to do good counteracted by the gross immoralities of the Church. And I speak now not of the sins of individuals, but of the sins of the Church, in practices that are recognised as legitimate. For years I have been made to feel that the greatest and only serious obstacle to my success as a Christian worker was the open, notorious, and authorised and allowed sins of the Church itself. These sins have been a disgrace to common morality and decency. A single church fair, conducted as thousands are conducted in parts of the land, without rebuke from the Church, except here and there a feeble voice, in which gambling devices of various kinds are the leading features, and which are conducted in the exact form and manner of gambling in the worst hells in the country, would be sufficient to paralyse Christian effort for years in a community where it had occurred. Or a black-mailing scheme to raise money to pay a preacher, which is the yearly custom in many places to-day, and the plan of which is to serve notices upon business men and citizens, irrespective of church relations, of the time and place of the so-called donation, this notice being understood by the man who receives it as a notification that he will be expected to be there or contribute, and that, if he is not there, or does not contribute, he will be made to suffer for this neglect. I say what I know to be true when I declare that men who have been served with such notices have gone to those so-called donations under protest, and have given what they did, not because they owed it, or felt under any obligation to give, but simply as an assessment that they had better pay than to resist the demand—just as they would pay a highwayman who had his pistol cocked and pointed at their head, demanding money or life. And I know what I say when I assert that such a black-mailing scheme, authorised by the Church, destroys the respect of the world for religion. And I know that no man can receive money obtained by such means and retain his own self-respect and the respect of a community.

The Church of the Future will not try to advance religion at the expense of morality and manhood. Say what we will but there is a radical defect at this point in the religion of the present. There is too much, a great deal too much, emphasis placed upon what one believes, and faith is made to cover a multitude of sins.

The New Religion will give new emphasis to the old truth that "a tree is to be known by its fruits." It will care little what a man professes to believe or disbelieve, but will pay attention to what he does, and will test all professions by the results they produce. It will cling to the plain principles of morality, as the sheet anchor of its faith. It will urge upon men that no matter what they believe or do not believe, whether they accept the Bible as inspired or not, whether they believe Christ is divine or not, whether they believe in the Trinity or not, whether they believe in instantaneous conversion or not, whether they believe in the resurrection of the body, or the general judgment, or miracles, or future endless punishment, or the story of the garden, or the flood, or the suns standing still, or Jonah being swallowed by the whale, or a thousand other things or not, still it is better to be honest than a thief, better to be just than a tyrant, better to be true than a liar, better to be sober than a drunkard, better to be generous than selfish, better to be pure than impure; and it will evermore point to these principles as the shield that is to protect when the hot, burning girocco of scepticism sweeps over the soul that is wandering over the dreary desert of doubt, or as the oases that spring out of the parched and barren sands. It will make less account of what one believes and more of what he does, less of faith and more of works, less of piety and more of morality, less of future rewards and more of present happiness, less of the hell of the hereafter and more of the miseries of the present, less of heaven and more of earth. Religion will walk on earth, a beautiful spirit, carrying benedictions to all. And, with such views and practices, the Church of the Future will put on her beautiful garments, and become fair as the sun and terrible as an army with banners, and the Bible, instead of being a bone of contention, will become a beacon of light, and in its adaptation to human needs a vade mecum, a guiding companion to the race.

Obituary.

PRESIDENT BURGERS.—On the 9th inst. Mr. T. F. Burgers, ex-President of the Transvaal, died at Richmond, South Africa, after a short illness. The deceased was born in 1834, and went as a boy to Utrecht, where his education was completed, and on his return was ordained minister of the Dutch Reformed Church. In 1862 his preaching attracted attention, and in 1864 he was suspended by the Church Courts. He appealed successfully against their decision, and carried on his ministrations at Hanover for eight years. In 1872 he was elected President of the Transvaal Boers. During his Presidency he visited Capetown, England, and the Continent. Mr. Burgers induced the Raad to declare war against Secoceni. The campaign was, however, unsuccessful, and with its failure the Republic collapsed, and Mr. Burgers, accepting a pension from the English Government, settled down to farming in Hanover, and was succeeded by Mr. Shepstone. Mr. Burgers belonged to the Liberal school in theology.

MR. WILLIAM HARRISON AINSWORTH, the well-known novelist, died at Reigate on Tuesday morning. His name is familiar to a large section of the public as a successful and versatile writer of romance. Born in 1805, he was educated at the Free Grammar School at Manchester, and was articled at the age of sixteen to a local solicitor. At nineteen he came to London and finished his term with Mr. Phillips, of the Inner Temple. His first work was published before he was twenty-one, and his marriage, in 1826, to the daughter of the late Mr. Ebers, publisher, Bond-street, led him to abandon law in favour of literature. "Rookwood," published in 1834, established his fame as a writer of fiction; "Jack Sheppard" was an immense success, and "The Tower of London," "Old St. Paul's," "St. James's, or The Court of Queen Anne," "The Star Chamber," and numerous other works, well known to the public, achieved great popularity both in England and America.

PROFESSOR JOHN WILLIAM DRAPER, the scientist and author, died on Wednesday morning, at his residence on the Hudson, at the age of seventy-one. Dr. Draper was a native of this country, having been born at St. Helens, near Liverpool, on May 5, 1811. He had thus nearly completed his seventy-first year. After studying under private teachers, and then at University College, London, he went in 1833 to America, and graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1836. He was soon afterwards appointed Professor of Chemistry, Natural Philosophy and Physiology in Hampden-Sidney College in Virginia, and in 1839 was appointed Professor of Chemistry and Natural History in the University of New York. He afterwards became President of the Scientific and Medical Departments of the University. Dr. Draper contributed largely to European and American scientific journals, and published several works, some purely scientific, others of a philosophical and historical character. Among the latter may be cited his "History of the Intellectual Development of Europe," the "History of the American Civil War," and the "History of the Conflict between Religion and Science," published in 1874. Two of his sons have attained distinction as scientific men.

THE ELECTRIC LIGHT IN CHURCH.—On Sunday night, in St. James's, Westmoreland-street, Marylebone, the Edison and Maxim lights were used for the first time in a London church, under the direction of Mr. Laohlan, of the Société de la Force et la Lumière, 446, Strand. Three clear glass lamps hung under three arches separating the side aisle and vestry, over the altar was a strong Maxim, and two others in the pulpit were enclosed in milk white globes. The light was brilliant, soft, and steady, more steady than any gas. Faure's secondary battery, consisting of forty boxes, was used. These were deposited at five in the afternoon, ready charged, and no engine or any additional machinery was required. The wires were quickly connected, before seven o'clock service, with the suspended lamps, the lights being lowered or turned up to different degrees of brilliancy at discretion. A fine loan collection of sacred paintings was thus admirably lighted. There was an immense congregation, and crowds of people kept passing through the vestry till past ten o'clock. A selection from the Messiah took the place of an anthem, and we understand that Mr. Haweis was indebted to the kindness of Miss de Fonblanque and Miss Altsen for an admirable rendering of the solos in the organ gallery; no names, however, appeared on any programme. The usual choir took the choruses. This is the first application of the electric light to churches, and no one can help feeling that in these steady lamps, burning in vacuo, neither giving out heat nor using up air—easily stored and carried, and perfectly soft, and, let us add, safe—we have the light of the future for all crowded buildings.

BROAD CHURCHISM AND INDEPENDENCY.

How difficult it is for the religionist of one school of thought to appreciate the views of another with which he has no sympathy is often seen in theological discussion. However he may try to be fair and impartial, the evidence of party feeling will be sure to betray itself, and his utter lack of sympathy with the opposite side will inevitably detract from the value of his attempted appreciation of his opponent's position. We see this constantly illustrated in the controversies between Roman Catholics and Protestants, between Trinitarians and Unitarians, between sceptics and believers, and even between parties not so widely separated as these in religious thought and feeling. It is on this account that religious controversy is as a rule so utterly unsatisfactory, and so seldom fails to carry conviction to the other side. In order to estimate any one's theological position we must endeavour to put ourselves in his place, and look at the matter not from our own antagonistic, but from his appreciative point of view. We shall, perhaps, be less surprised then than we are now at some of the differences which divide the religious world.

These thoughts have occurred to us on reading a report of a lecture recently delivered by the Rev. EDWARD WHITE on "Broad Churchism and Independency." Mr. WHITE is well known as an intelligent and thoughtful writer on religious subjects, and a somewhat prominent member of the denomination to which he belongs. By his rejection of the doctrine of endless punishment he has entered on the path of rational religious thought, but he seems incapable of advancing in the same direction. The other doctrines of Orthodoxy he holds as tenaciously as if he were not tainted with heresy at all. He has no liking for Broad Churchism, and characterises it in terms which show how far he is from any sympathy with it. He draws a comparison between Broad Churchism and Independency, and, as an Independent, he of course assigns the true Gospel to his own sect. It "seeks to reproduce Primitive Christianity." It "is built on the rock of divine revelation," the theology of Independency "is Catholic and Apostolic." It "recognised the ever present authority of CHRIST in his Church." Independency was no "mere denomination." "If it had no commission from the Lord may its tongue cleave to the roof of its mouth!"

Having eulogised Independency after this fashion, Mr. WHITE proceeds to characterise Broad Churchism. It "has a history restricted to the last fifty years. It is the growth of modern thought, and the name has created in the popular mind a certain presumption in its favour. It is looked on as a continuous protest against all that is narrow and unscientific. It is a fluid mollescent mass of sentimental Theism. Its breadth of doctrine is contrary to the narrowness which CHRIST declared to be of the essence of true Christianity." All this and much more to the same effect. Now, it is an inadequate and misleading statement that Broad Churchism has a history restricted to the last fifty years. There were Broad Churchmen and Broad Church teaching more than fifty years ago. Some of the most distinguished of the clergy belonged to this school in the last century. In fact, the principles of Broad Churchism have had advocates in nearly all Christian times. The Church has seldom been without its men of broad sympathies, scientific mind, and liberal thought; and these were the true Broad Churchmen of their day. Where does CHRIST declare narrowness to be the essence of his gospel? It is true there are certain expressions ascribed to him which Mr. WHITE may have had in his mind; but these occur chiefly in the Fourth Gospel, the apostolic authority and historical character of which are more than doubtful. Others also occur in passages of Scripture of doubtful genuineness—Mark xvi. 16, Matt. xx. 16. Against these may be set other sayings of CHRIST, in which the broadest principles are taught—Matt. viii. 11, vii. 21, xii. 50.

Mr. WHITE gives next the following portraiture of Broad Churchism:—

At the root of the new liberal scheme lay the anti-dogmatic feeling. Its criticism was destructive and contemptuous. The prophecies, it was now maintained, were not forecasts of the future; the miracles were no credentials, for they required themselves to be confirmed. Inspiration was claimed for this age as much as for the Apostolic, and conscience was to be the sole guide of men. Supernatural Christianity was thus swept away. Virtue, it was taught, was a service man owed to himself. Ecclesiastical authority annihilated the individual. Biblical authority was fallacious. Christ was extinguished as the light of the world in the name of conscience. Any and all opinions were to be tolerated, but they must not be held fast, for to hold them so was to be dogmatic. The whole policy of Broad Churchism rested upon the abolition of the distinction between the natural and the spiritual man in the nation. It ignored the awful generic distinction between the wicked and the righteous. It sought to comprehend the righteous and the prophets of Baal in one hierarchy. In ecclesiastical morals and politics the difference between Independency and Broad Churchism was that between righteousness and injustice.

Would any Broad Churchman accept that as a fair statement of his theological position? It is simply negative. It does not attempt to do justice to the positive side of the Broad Church theology. Its noble, spiritual, affirmative teaching is ignored. Let any one compare the above representation with any one of Mr. STOFFORD BROOKE's sermons, and its defective partial character will be apparent at once. It illustrates forcibly our opening remarks as to the difficulty with which one religionist appreciates the position of another. The Broad Church theology rests upon certain leading principles which are witnessed to by the reason, conscience and affections of man, and the constitutions of the visible universe. It aims to show the divine accord of reason, nature, science, and religion. It takes a broad outlook, and its conclusions are those which that outlook warrants. Its field of observation is the world, and its survey takes in other religions besides Christianity. It does not shut its eyes to facts which tell against assumption and pretension on the part of any one religion against all others. It welcomes truth, goodness, reverence, piety, wherever they are to be found. It believes that GOD has other religious agencies for saving man besides Christianity and the Bible. Without undervaluing the Bible it aims to keep clear of Bibliolatry, and seeks to discriminate between a just regard for it and that superstitious reverence which is the popular sentiment of orthodox Protestantism. It is especially desirous to make religion helpful to man in the cultivation of his moral and spiritual nature, and in the promotion of whatever will conduce to his highest happiness and good.

CHRISTIAN SOCIALISM IN GER-MANY.

AN irresistible logic of cause and effect governs the aggregate life of society. Selfish or self-seeking tendencies may arrest the action of general causes; but once let these begin to freely operate and their natural effects inevitably follow. Thus, if we mistake not, the spread of elementary education among the masses, in itself an act of simple justice, will bring in its train the demand for something approaching an entire reconstruction of the social life of the people, as distinguished from the rich and ruling classes of society. Those who sleep on beds of down, drink their rich old port, and luxuriate in the thought of their many safe and profitable investments, may close their eyes to the dark and threatening cloud which hangs upon the social horizon of the future. But such as read the signs of the times, such among us as grieve over the ever-widening gulf between rich and poor, and those who, like Bishop FRASER, see and denounce the worst evils of the Manchester School of Economic Science, see the cloud in question, and know that sooner or later it must either discharge its contents in gentle showers or in a desolating storm. The social life of the masses will either have to be greatly ameliorated on the present lines of private property and of supply and demand in the labour market, or else a vast force will organise itself for the reconstruction of society on the basis of collective property. Indications of this are to be seen here in England, as well as all over the Continent. But, as we might expect, it is in Germany, in spite of the plodding, migratory habits of the people that Socialism is most active, just because elementary education is most widely extended there among the toiling masses. Russia might seem to be still more deeply affected with socialistic theories than Germany; but this view of the matter would be an inaccurate estimate of social forces, since Nihilism has arisen and is sustained by a state of things wholly unknown to Western nations. Be this as it may, however, no one can doubt that in Germany the axe is laid at the root of the Manchester tree of free industrial and economic law, which is condemned as a upas tree of poisonous and deadly character. Prince BISMARCK knows this well enough, and hence, though he is vigilant in repressing and even in punishing law-breaking Socialists, as shown by the recent Leipzig trials, he is anxious to meet their demands by a large measure of reconstructive legislation, as his more recent speeches in the new Reichstag abundantly prove.

Now it needs hardly a moment's consideration to see that there is an affinity between the central or economic principle of Socialism and Christianity, though the religious attitude of the two systems is so antagonistic. Hence, side by side with the Atheistic Socialism of Germany, there has sprung up what Mr. RAE calls "Christian Socialism," and in illustration of which he contributes an article to the current number of the Contemporary Review. Beginning with a reference to the fact that to many persons of by no means an inferior order of mind there appears to be an inherent affinity between Christianity and Socialism, he says that "Some of the principal Socialists of the earlier part of this century used to declare that Socialism was only Christianity more logically carried out and more faithfully practised, and that Socialism would be an idle superfluity if ordinary Christian principles were really to be acted upon honestly and without reserve." ST. SIMON, he goes on to state, published his views under the title of the "Nouveau Christianisme," and asserted that "the prevailing forms of Christianity were one gigantic heresy, while CABET was no less explicit in his assertion that if Christianity had been interpreted and applied in the spirit of JESUS CHRIST it would have sufficed and would still suffice "to establish a perfect social and political organisation, and to deliver mankind from all its ills." So far as modern history is concerned, the Socialism of the only other period besides our own century is to be found, our author tells us, in the views of the Anabaptists of the Reformation period, which were the direct outcome of Christian conviction. Mingled as these views were with the idea of class emancipation, and much as they may have tended to stir the insurrection of the German peasantry, their real origin lay, we are told, in the religious fervour which was abroad at the time, and which buoyed up "sanguine and mystical minds on dreams of the reign of GOD."

Mr. RAE admits that the Socialism of the present day is not of a religious origin, but that on the contrary there is some truth in the remark of the distinguished economist M. PAUL LEROY-BEAULIEU as to the prevalence of socialistic ideas being largely due to the decline of religious faith among the working classes. Of this decline we fear there is but too much evidence; nor is it less certain that, from some cause or causes which we will not stop to seek, "contemporary Socialists have turned their backs on religion." They sometimes speak of it with a spirit of settled bitterness, and as our author observes, they are wont to say "we are not Atheists, we have simply done with GOD." "If there be a God," he is, in their opinion, "the God of the rich and not of the poor, for whom He cares nothing." This admixture of Agnosticism and Atheism "is as much a matter of class antipathy as of free thought." It is Christian in its human aspect, and violently anti-Christian in its religious antagonism and bitterness. It must be clear, however, to the most shallow thinker that Socialism has no inherent relation to Atheism, but implies exactly the reverse. This is what some Churchmen have seen and acted upon, here in our own country thirty years ago, under the inspiration of MAURICE, and more recently in Germany, where both Catholics and Protestants have recognised, we are told, "a soul of good" in the Socialistic movement, in spite of its violent anti-religious attitude. In other words, some of the leading spirits of the Catholic Church and a few Protestant divines have sought to effect a compromise between the extreme reconstructive tenets of men like CARL MARX and the doctrines of the prevailing school of economists by a variously stated and extended measure of social reform, to be sought in harmony with Christian agencies and by the influence of Christian principles.

The movement in the Catholic Church was, it appears, the earlier and more important. And as it was supported by great dignitaries of the Church it was probably countenanced, we are told, by Rome itself. Here it may be well to quote Mr. RAE somewhat more fully than we have hitherto done. "The Socialistic agitation had no sooner broken out in 1863 than Dr. DOLLINGER, then a pillar of the Church of Rome, strongly recommended the Catholic Clubs of Germany to take the question up. These clubs are societies for mutual improvement, recreation, and benefit, and are composed mainly of working men. Father HOLPING, himself at the time a working man, had in 1847 founded an extensive organisation of Catholic journeymen, which in 1872 had a total membership of seventy thousand, and consisted of an affiliation of small journeymen clubs, with a membership of from fifty to four hundred each in the various towns of Germany. These clubs naturally afforded an organisation ready to hand for any general purpose the members might share in common, and being composed of working men, they seemed reasonably calculated to be of effective service in forwarding the cause of social amelioration. Early in 1864, accordingly, Bishop KETTELER, of Mayence, warmly seconded DOLLINGER's idea, and at the same time published a remarkable pamphlet on the Labour Question and Christianity, in which he unfolded his views of the causes and the cure of the existing evils."

was one which it was his business, both as a Christian and as a bishop, to treat. The Labour Question, he thought, resolved itself into "how the great bulk of the working classes are to get the bread and clothing necessary to sustain them in life." Things had come to the present unfortunate pass, more unfortunate for Germany than for this country, where wages are better—owing, he contended, "to the spread of industrial freedom and the ascendancy of the large capitalists." In consequence of these changes the labourer is now treated, he showed, as a commodity, and the rate of his wages settled by the same law that settles the price of every other commodity—the cost of its production. This state of things he spoke of as "the slave market of our Liberal Europe, fashioned after the model of our humanist, illuminist, anti-Christian Liberalism and freemasonry." But though he joined with LASALLE in condemning "the iron and cruel law" he did not join with him in advocating the establishment of productive associations of working men upon capital supplied by the State. Nor did he argue for the abolition of industrial freedom, says our author, as might have been supposed, with the restoration of something like the old compulsory guilds. He thought the State should interfere by levying a tax, similar to our poor-rate, for the alleviation of actual distress, but that it should not take the initiative, or indeed take part in any scheme for the improvement of the normal condition of the people. But where the civil authority ended Christian authority began, he argued, and it was to the voluntary activity of the Christian spirit that he looked for the cure of all the evils of society. He therefore proposed that productive associations of working men should be made a scheme of the Church, and he appealed to Christian philanthropy to effect this, as a service similar to that in which funds had been raised for the emancipation of slaves in Italy and elsewhere.

This remarkable proposal, says Mr. RAE, died still-born, and was never afterwards reverted to by its author, though he continued to write and labour much to promote the cause of social reform. In short, "When a Christian social party was formed, under his countenance, they adopted a programme which made large demands not only on the intervention but on the pecuniary help of the State." The principles of this party, which set itself the task of forming Christian Social or St. Joseph Associations in connection with the existing Catholic clubs, were explained in 1871, we are told by Canon MOUFANG, who became the champion of the movement. MOUFANG, in opposition to the views of Bishop KETTELER, made no demand upon the Church for pecuniary aid. But he contended that the State can and must help the poorer classes in four different ways—first, by giving legislative protection to the labourer, by which he meant that the State should not merely guard the rights of labour, but fix its value, and not leave this to be settled by the employer, like the fluctuating price of a commodity. Secondly, the State ought to give pecuniary help in aid of co-operative enterprises among working men on the same principle that it advances money on easy terms for the realisation of railway schemes or other public works. Thirdly, the State ought to reduce the taxes and military burdens of the labouring classes. And fourthly, that the State ought to fetter the domination of the money power, and especially to check excesses of speculation and control the operations of the Stock Exchange. These proposals are far enough, as it will be seen, from ordinary Socialistic schemes which seek the abolition of private property, at least in the instruments of production. Hence it is clear that the sympathy felt by the Catholic leaders of the Christian Socialistic movement in Germany is less with the Socialists proper than with the labouring classes in their struggling, but as yet relatively contented, condition. It is the reform of the present industrial system and not its reconstruction on new and wholly untried lines which they advocated.

As regards the Protestant Churches, no voice was raised by or among them, we are told, till 1878. This long apathy on the subject is traced to their "absolute dependence" on the State, and their lack of that "strong popular sympathy" which pervades the Catholic Church. When, at length, a section of the Evangelical clergy originated a movement on this subject, it was RUDOLF TODT, a pastor at Barenthelm in Old Preignitz, and STÖCKER, one of the Court preachers at Berlin, who took the lead. The former condemned, it appears, the existing industrial régime as being decidedly unchristian, declaring the general principles of Socialism to be directly countenanced by Scripture. Much of his work was "devoted to show the inner affinity of Christianity and Socialism, and the inner antagonism between Christianity and Manchesterdom." He goes so far, it seems, as to say that every active Christian who is true to his creed has a Socialistic vein in him; and every Socialist, however hostile he may be to religion, has an unconscious Christianity at his heart; whereas, on the other hand, "the merely nominal Christian, who has never got out of his natural state, is always a spiritual Manchesterist." Radical Socialism consisted, he taught, of three elements—economics as communism; politics as republicanism; and religion in the negative form of Atheism. As regards the last of these elements, Socialism is clearly in direct antagonism to Christianity; but TODT deplored the Atheism prevalent among Socialists, "not merely as an error, but as a fatal inconsistency"—a view of the subject with which we heartily concur. His argument on the second principle is fanciful and worthless. The third, that is to say, the vital or germinal principle of Socialism, is, he contends, entirely in harmony with the economical ideal of the New Testament. He describes the communistic idea as consisting of two parts: "first, the general principles of liberty, equality, and fraternity, which he finds directly involved in the Scriptural doctrines of moral responsibility, of men's common origin and redemption, and the law of love; and secondly, the transformation of all private property in the instruments of production into private property which includes three points:—(a) The abolition of the present wages system; (b) giving the labourer the full product of his labour; and (c) associated labour. In spite, however, of this speculative boldness TODT shrank, it seems, from formulating what we should have supposed could be his only logical conclusion—the abolition of private property. He has no immediate remedy for the ills of the toiling masses, but the kindness of their employers and the hope that the latter will regard their wealth as a trust for which they are only stewards. Soon after the publication of TODT'S book, STÖCKER and some Evangelical friends founded, says our author, two associations for the purpose of dealing with the social question from a Christian stand-point, and established a newspaper to advocate their opinions. One of these associations was called the Central Union for Social Reform, and was composed of persons belonging to the educated classes; the other, called the Christian Social Working Men's Party, consisted of working men alone. Both came to grief, it appears, when the Anti-Socialist Bill was passed some two years ago.

This brief résumé of Mr. RAE'S paper will show our readers that the churches of Germany are alive to the dangers and difficulties of the great social question. That question will, as we have already said, ultimately force itself to the front here in England, and without committing ourselves to any kind of communistic principles we feel bound to assert our belief that as "the earth is the LORD'S and the fulness thereof" there ought to be no absolute want for the man who is willing to work or for the feeble and the aged who cannot, do so.

THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

In reference to the question discussed recently in our columns as to the position of Liverpool as a suitable place for the purposes of the Conference we have been supplied with the following interesting information. In the Northern district of England, including Derbyshire and Cheshire, as well as the six Northern counties, are to be found about one hundred and twenty-five Presbyterian, Unitarian, or missionary congregations. In the Southern counties, including the metropolis, the number scarcely exceeds fifty. In four Eastern counties there are about twenty, and in three Western ones—Gloucestershire, Somersetshire, and Devonshire—the number exceeds twenty-five. In the ten Midland counties there are forty-four congregations.

Lancashire, with fifty-eight congregations, adjoined by Cheshire with twenty and Yorkshire with twenty-eight, is thus a more important denominational centre than the home counties of Middlesex and Surrey, in which there are twenty congregations, or than Warwickshire, Staffordshire, and Worcestershire, which together number twenty-eight. But in considering this question of centrality, there is also to be taken into account the fact mentioned in Mr. Steinthal's letter last week, that Ireland has more than forty congregations, for whom Liverpool is, perhaps, the most convenient possible place outside their own country, while the thirty or more Welsh congregations can, on the whole, reach Liverpool as readily as any place beyond their borders. For the four Scottish congregations, perhaps, no more accessible place could have been chosen. These statistics are, we believe, in the main accurate, though they may be open to slight corrections for chapels recently closed or recently reopened. From this calculation it would seem difficult to find a place more convenient than Liverpool for the great bulk of our denomination.

We are glad to learn that the Conference is rapidly receiving numerous adherents from all quarters, and that spirited measures are being taken by an influential local Committee to secure its success at Liverpool.

FASCINATION.

Moralists, theologians, philosophers, and parsons have too often treated fascination as if it were purely factitious, artificial, misleading and ensnaring. We wish that some genial thinker from a higher eminence of thought and feeling would take a different view, and show us the fascinations that beckon the soul upward to real beauty, and are therefore helpful and encouraging. Fascination may be of the earth earthy, or of the heavens heavenly. But even sensuous illusions may have a divine reality behind them; for is there not some mysterious relation between the sensual and the spiritual; some invisible string that ties the beautiful to the good, and therefore some means of rising from the low to the high, from the flesh to the spirit, using the one as a stair to the other? Moral impurities sometimes hide under the mask and drapery of physical beauty; but still this beauty on the surface is a blessing to the thoughtful observer, if not to the actual possessor, for it shows that nature has been gentle and generous, even to the unworthy, and will therefore be equally generous and gentle to the good, when the time comes to drop this "muddy vesture of decay," and assume a form that is beautiful. If even the weeds of humanity are adorned with charms, will not the flowers become still more lovely in their proper season and proper sphere? If there is often a temporary beauty given to the earthy form, while the character is comparatively low, how much greater will be the beauty given to the heavenly form when the character is high. It seems to be a generous intention of Providence that all things shall become ultimately beautiful, whether for the present, good or bad, and the putting forth of the activity of this beauty is fascination. It is sometimes high and sometimes low; but it tends in the course of ages to improve; and by-and-by, when character forms a real beauty of its own instead of borrowing its similitude, fascination will become a safe, natural, and healthy thing. Meanwhile, we are thankful for such beauty as we can get. Even those ensnaring things called pretty girls are by no means to be lightly appreciated. If in many instances their characters are less charming than their persons, it is much to be regretted certainly; but still it is better to have the beauty somewhere than to have it nowhere; if there is not much of it in the soul, let us at any rate have a little of it on the body. For our own parts, though long since passed into "the sere, the yellow leaf," we have a surviving sympathy with the romantic and the young. We like to hear of honourable youths and maidens being deeply, warmly, passionately in love. We should like to meet with a few Romeos, Juliets, Desdemonas, Imogens, Cordelias. There is a generous glow at a man's heart when he is under the influence of a virtuous and lovely girl,—when he imaginatively clothes her with "the beauty of a thousand stars," when he looks with rapture on her graceful form, her bright and flowing hair, "Cæsariem effusæ nitidam per candida colla."

Arduusque notate oculos: qui spiritus illi;

Qui vultus vocisve sonus, vel gressus eunti.

These enthusiasms, though they may be illusory, show at any rate that a man's bosom is not selfish and cold, that the ugly things of the world have not obliterated all faith in the beautiful, and that the weeds of life have not utterly overgrown and stifled the flowers. The illusion of a lover that his maiden is an angel on earth is at any rate the forecast of a belief that there may be angels in heaven, and there is some spirituality and moral beauty in such a conception. A man deeply in love may do many a rash and imprudent thing, but he seldom does a mean one.

Moral fascinations which have their source in the deep springs of character are, of course, higher than those which have or seem to have a physical origin. All greatly influential characters have had fascinating powers. Jesus of Nazareth, though we know nothing of his bodily form and feature, must have been gifted with fascinating qualities of the very highest order. It is said that on one agonising occasion "an angel ministered unto him," and he was just the kind of character to whom an angel would minister, if angels there be. The constantly open, receptive attitude of his soul, the sweet sympathies he diffused among his fellow-men on earth, were not unlikely to draw down upon himself a kindred sympathy from Heaven, whatever natural doubts may arise as to the personal form of its manifestation. The old painters represented him with the nimbus around his brow, and the symbol is suggestive, for it indicates that highest kind of beauty which is identical with light and which radiates from the inner soul instead of falling accidentally and superficially on the external features. It is the rarest of all beauty, and wonderfully deep is its charm and fascination.

Fascinations which arise from physical endowments only are evanescent; and very melancholy in age is the condition of those who in youth ministered to nothing nobler than the "lust of the eye." There is not a sadder sight in humanity than a withered heartless beauty sinking day by day into wrinkles and wretchedness. The Grand 'Mère in Beranger's Poem says:—

Combien je regrette
Mon bras si dodu,
Ma jambe bien faite,
Et le temps perdu!

That last line is very mournful—"Et le temps perdu!" It is only time which is lost it might possibly be compensated by increase of exertion afterwards; but when the loss is the loss of innocence, natural sensibility, intelligence and purity of taste, recovery in age is a difficult, almost a hopeless thing. Youth may live merrily, for a little while, under any kind of gay blossom that hangs on the bough; but the peace of age depends on fruit as well as blossom, and when the bloom is forced, premature, artificial, unnatural, blight is apt to come, and the promise of the fruit is gone.

In intellectual matters how few men of those whose acquirements seem to qualify them to become teachers have the gift to present their subjects on the beautiful and attractive side! They drag us as it were by force up "the Hill Difficulty." They do not know how to fascinate us so that the ascent may be made without pain. There is scarcely a single art or science or any kind of learning, however beautiful in its results, which is made charming in the processes by which it is pursued. "Beauty swims in the light of forms," says Proclus; but many teachers show us only the forms in their knotty and difficult aspects, and reveal nothing of the swimming beauty. There is dreariness in some of the processes of our colleges and schools. Is it necessary and inevitable that we must pass through a swamp to arrive at a garden? and is study always to be such "a weariness to the flesh" that it takes away beauty, and bloom, and health, and enjoyment?

Pain and sorrow are not usually reckoned as beautiful; but there is a fascination in them whenever anything generous and noble lies behind them as their origin and cause. There is some fascination in the gloomiest life if there be mental vision to discern the little openings of heavenly blue behind and above the cloud; and it is within the compass of possibility to suppose existing on the earth a human being so heroic in soul,—so attuned to Heaven,—so accustomed to communion with Him who is tender in love while He is terrible in power,—so sensitive to beauty of all kinds as to feel the fascination of the Supreme Charmer amid the most awful and mysterious of His charms, and even sink under the engulfing waves of a stormy sea, with some sense of the grandeur and magnificence around. In most of us the veil of the material is so thick as to completely hide the spiritual, and hence arise doubts, tremblings, and fears. If we could thin this veil and make it transparent, then would arise hope, confidence, courage, visions of an all-environmenting beauty to fascinate and charm.

Mistakes, follies, sins, difficulties, dangers, and sorrows are likely to characterise humanity for many an age to come. We all need encouragement in right endeavour. We want teachers who will turn back the silver lining of the cloud so that it may be seen, who will show us the loveliness of the good and the true, the beauty of holiness, the symmetry and simplicity of the intricate and complex, the grace, the charm, the blessedness, and the peace that may be made to hover around and dwell within even this frail life of the body. Of course there are very few indeed of such teachers in our present stage of moral and intellectual development; and all being imperfect, none are justified in throwing stones of reproach at others. We must strive and wait. It is a pity that all who teach have not yet attained to a beautiful method in their exposition of beautiful things. Some believe that there are no such methods. They seem to think that the gems of the intellect and heart are, like some gems of the earth, made up of very coarse elements that require cold, hard, severe, long-enduring pressure, and that there is Providential intention and discipline in strewn much ugliness and disgust along the road that leads ultimately to beauty. There are many facts in the history of man which seem to favour that opinion; but it seems to us defective and not to furnish the whole truth of the matter. We incline to believe that though, by the intervening wisdom and generosity of God, the coarse things of life are at last subordinated to its finest issues, yet that there is a way, hereafter to be discovered, of brightening the intellect, of warming the heart, and of uplifting the character generally by means of beautiful charms and lawful fascinations. DR. WILLIAMS'S TRUST.—XXI.

[CONTRIBUTED BY W. D. JEREMY, ESQ.]

106. REV. THOMAS MORGAN, LL.D. (1783-1804).—Sometime minister of a congregation in Alife-street in the room of Dr. Prior. One of the compilers of the General Biography, in ten volumes, begun by Dr. Enfield and completed by Dr. Aikin as principal editor. Member of the Presbyterian Board (1777-99). In 1804 Dr. Morgan undertook the office of Librarian at Red Cross-street, which he discharged with ability until his death, which occurred at the Library, Feb. 14, 1821, in his sixty-seventh year. A portrait of him is preserved there.

107. EDMUND CALAMY, Esq. (1784-1812).—Of Lincoln's Inn, Barrister at Law; son of the Rev. Edmund Calamy. A member of the Presbyterian Board. He resigned the Trust in 1812, on leaving London, and died May 12, 1816, in Devonshire, aged seventy-three years. He married a daughter of the Rev. Michael Pope (No. 67 ante), and was the father of the late Rev. Michael Calamy, of Exeter.

108. REV. HUGH WORTHINGTON (1785-1813).—Assistant to Mr. Spilsbury at Salters'-Hall (1773-82), then pastor (1782-1813). He was a son of the Rev. Hugh Worthington, of Leicester.

109. THOMAS ROGERS, Esq. (1786-93).—Banker in partnership with Messrs. Welch. Sometime M.P. for Coventry. Father of Samuel Rogers, the poet.

110. REV. THOMAS JERVIS (1786-1808) (1823-33).—Sometime classical and mathematical tutor at the Exeter Academy. In 1772 he undertook the education of the two sons of the Earl of Shelburne (afterwards created Marquis of Lansdowne) at Bowood, where Dr. Priestley was at the same time Librarian. There Mr. Jervis remained eleven years. For the next twenty-five years he was a minister in London, first at St. Thomas's, Southwark (1783-96), and then at Princes-street, Westminster, being a trustee from 1786 to 1808, and a member of the Presbyterian Board from 1783 to 1808. In that year he succeeded Mr. Wood at Mill-hill Chapel, Leeds where he remained ten years, after which he returned to London, and was re-elected a Trustee in 1823. He died 31st Aug., 1833, in his eighty-sixth year. He married a daughter of the Rev. Dr. Disney, Minister of Essex-street Chapel. Busts of himself and his father-in-law were presented by him to the Library, where they are still preserved. For a list of his published works see the Unitarian Chronicle for 1833, p. 320.

111. REV. JAMES LINDSAY, D.D. (1787-1821).—Minister of Monkwell-street Chapel (1783-1818), and afternoon preacher at Newington-green (1787-1803). A member of the Presbyterian Board (1784-1821). He died suddenly at a public meeting at Dr. Williams's Library, 14th Feb., 1821 in his sixty-seventh year. A marble bust of him was placed where he expired, to commemorate his death and to honour his memory.

112. REV. THOMAS URWICK. (1788-1807).—Many years minister of a congregation at Clapham, where he succeeded Dr. Furneaux. He was a pupil of Dr. Doddridge, and afterwards studied at Glasgow on Dr. Williams's foundation. He died 26th Feb., 1807, in his eighty-first year.

113. JOHN RAYMOND BARKER, Esq. (1788-1805).—A member of Carter-lane Congregation, and of the Presbyterian Board (1780-90).

114. REV. JOSEPH TOWERS, LL.D. (1790-99).—A political and biographical writer of considerable note, and well worthy of being remembered as an exemplar. He was born in 1737, in Southwark, where his father was a second-hand bookseller in poor circumstances. When scarcely twelve years of age he was placed as an errand boy with a stationer in the City, and afterwards (1754) apprenticed to a printer in the country. Whilst thus employed he devoted his leisure hours to the study of Greek and Latin, of which he acquired a competent knowledge, and by assiduous reading he made up for the want of early education, and accumulated varied and extensive knowledge. At the age of twenty-six he published "A Review of the Genuine Doctrines of Christianity," therein stating his reasons for abandoning the Calvinistic theory. In the following year he returned to London, and supported himself by working as a journeyman printer. Taking a lively interest in politics he now published a pamphlet on Libels—a subject which, on account of the prosecution of Wilkes and the burning of his periodical the North Briton, by the hands of the hangman, had greatly excited the popular mind. Towers afterwards kept a bookseller's shop for eight or ten years. In the meantime he was employed upon a serial publication called British Biography, the first six or seven volumes of which were the fruit of his industry. His name, however, did not appear on its pages, but it was privately known who the writer was, and his merits were appreciated. Dr. Kippis engaged him as a coadjutor in bringing out a new edition of the Biographia Britannica. In 1774 he was induced to give up the book-selling business, and to become the minister of a congregation at Highgate, which, however, he soon exchanged for that in Newington-green, and there he continued to be morning preacher for about a quarter of a century. His pamphlets, which were chiefly on political topics, were collected and republished in 1796 in three octavo volumes, with a portrait of himself prefixed. His most solid single work was the "Life and Reign of Frederick, the Third King of Prussia" (Frederick the Great), in two volumes, 1795. Dr. Towers was an Arian. He died May 20, 1799. His widow was afterwards housekeeper at Dr. Williams's Library, and his son was for some time Librarian there.

115. JOHN TOWGOOD, Esq. (1791-1837).—Banker, son of Matthew Towgood, Esq., banker. He succeeded his father in the Trust, and on his death, in 1837, was succeeded by his son, the late Mr. John Towgood, barrister-at-law.

116. REV. GEORGE LEWIS (1791-1823).

117. JOHN WANSEY, Esq. (1793-1820).—Treasurer of the Presbyterian Fund in 1802 and 1803. He died May 2, 1820, at Walthamstow, in his seventy-second year, being at the time one of the oldest members of Dr. Abraham Rees's congregation. He was succeeded in the trust by the late Mr. John Wansey, of the Reform Club.

118. OLIVER CROMWELL, Esq. (1793).—Sometime solicitor and secretary to the Trust, and clerk to St. Thomas's Hospital. Author of "Memoirs of the Protector Cromwell, and his sons Richard and Henry; Illustrated by Original Letters and other Family Papers." His father was Thomas Cromwell, a grocer on Snow-hill, one of the numerous grandchildren of Henry Cromwell, son of the Protector. He succeeded to the family estate of Theobalds on the failure of the issue of Richard Cromwell. He died at Cheshunt-park in 1821, aged seventy-nine years. As he declined the Trust owing, doubtless, to his leaving London, he ought not, perhaps, to be included in the roll of Trustees.

119. SAMUEL ROGERS, Esq. (1794-1806).—The poet. Elected a Trustee in place of his father. He was descended in the maternal line from one of the two thousand confessors of 1662, the Rev. Philip Henry. The late Mr. Samuel Sharpe in his life of Samuel Rogers observes that the poet mentions his dissenting parentage with just pride in the following lines:—

"What though his ancestors, early or late,
Were not ennobled by the breath of kings;
Yet in his veins were running at his birth
The blood of those most eminent of old
For wisdom, virtue—those who could renounce
The things of this world for their conscience sake,
And die like blessed martyrs."

Samuel Rogers died December 18, 1855, aged ninety-one years. A portrait of him was presented to the Library by his nephew, Mr. Samuel Sharpe.

THE HULSEAN DIVINITY PRIZE.—The Hulsean Divinity Prize at Cambridge, given annually under the will of the late Rev. John Hulse (ob. 1789) to any member of Cambridge University under the degree or standing of M.A., for the best dissertation in the English language on the evidences in general or on the prophecies or miracles in particular, or any direct or collateral proofs of the Christian religion, in order to evince its truth and excellence, has been adjudged to A. W. W. Dale, B.A., Fellow of Trinity Hall. The adjudicators offered a premium of about £75 for the best dissertation on the following subject:—"The Synod of Elvira, with special reference to Christian life and worship in the fourth century."

During the past year the number of applications for letters patent has been 5,751, being an increase of 234 upon those of the year 1880.

It is understood that the late Mr. Bernal Osborne, amongst other political papers, has left a review of Mr. Gladstone's Irish policy and the state of Ireland generally.

THE CHRISTIAN ARMY AND THE GOSPEL MISSION.

BY THE REV. J. M. DIXON.

"The paths to God are more in number than the breathings of created beings." But even good men have been slow to recognise this catholic truth. Ancient story says: "For a week Abraham would scarce break his fast for fear some hungry traveller might pass needing his store. Daily he looked out upon the desert, and on a day he beheld the bent form of an aged man, his hair white as snow, tottering toward his door. 'Guest of mine eyes,' said Abraham, 'enter thou with welcome, and be pleased to share my bread and salt.' The stranger entered, and to him was given the place of honour. When the cloth was spread, and the family had gathered round the board, each uttered 'Bismillah' ('in the name of God') save one—the aged guest uttered no word. Abraham said, 'Old man, is it not right, when thou dost eat thy food, to repeat the name of God?' The stranger said, 'My custom is that of the fire-worshipper.' Then Abraham arose in wrath, and drove the aged Geber from his house. Even as he did so, a swift-winged spirit stood before the patriarch and said, 'Abraham! for a hundred years the divine bounty has flowed out in sunshine and rain, in bread and life, to this man; is it for thee to withhold thy hand from him because his worship is not thine?' The swift-winged spirit of humanity has taught the world much since Abraham's time of the charity which never fails and the religion that shows its love to God by goodwill to all mankind. Yet are many good people slow to see that the "paths to God are more in number than the breathings of created beings." The people of Hull have no small number of roads to God, and many of them are curious bye-paths, made for them by lowly, energetic leaders. Two such paths I ask you to peep into at present.

The Christian Army was originated in Hull by Mr. Henry Powers, on the 20th of September, 1880. Since then Mr. Powers has opened stations in York, Goole, Lincoln, Louth, Spalding, Halifax, Peterborough, Huddersfield, Todmorden, Wakefield, Stockport, Keighley, Brighouse, and Thornhill. Mr. or General Powers seems to be a man of travel and work abundant. He says, "The number of miles travelled in visiting the stations, 3,000; letters received and answered, 1,825; visits to the homes of the poor, 600; addressed about 2,200 meetings, and has been used, in the hands of God, directly and indirectly, of pointing between three and four thousand souls to the foot of the Cross. All this work in about a year." In May last The Christian Army News was commenced. It is edited by the General, and has a large circulation. The meeting house of the Christian Army is in Merrick-street, Dry-pool, where meetings are held on Sundays and every night in the week. On the Sunday evenings the room is usually filled, but on week evenings the audience is often scanty. In doctrine there is little or nothing to distinguish the Christian Army from several other religious societies in Hull, and they might with Christian grace all unite as one religious party. Perhaps the love of leadership is too strong for this union to be effected. The Merrick-street Army is not so loudly demonstrative as the Salvation Army and, so far as I have heard, the Gospel according to the Christian Army is preached grammatically by its chief apostles. This is a pleasant feature. Surely the music of the spiritual spheres ought not to be presented in the unphoniousness of bad grammar. Even a revival preacher might be more spiritually useful by the mastery of the rudiments of English grammar. An author who has made grammar interesting says:—"No department of knowledge is like grammar. A person may conceal his ignorance of any other art—but every time he speaks he publishes his ignorance of this. Other arts may be practised occasionally, but the art of speaking must be practised continually. . . . There can be no greater imputation on the intelligence of any man than that he should talk from the cradle to the tomb, and never talk well. . . . He who has not energy for the acquirement of grammar ought to suspect himself." Why should he present the saving angel of truth in the rags and disorder of ungrammatical speech, when a short time spent in the study of his mother tongue would enable him to do justice to the important subject on which he speaks?

General Powers was not present at the Temple

the evening I attended. The service was commenced with a hymn:—

We're travelling on to heaven above, Will you?
To sing the Saviour's dying love, Will you go?
Millions have reached that blissful shore,
Their trials and their labours o'er,
And yet there's room for millions more, Will you go?

After prayer an address was given by the presiding officer. It was an earnest exhortation to repent and be saved at once. After more singing several men and women spoke their religious experience. The women were the more fluent and effective speakers. To a sensitive religious spirit, however, there is something painful in thus publishing on the platform the secrets of the inner life. Mrs. Powers, the wife of General Powers, prayed in an earnest, reverent tone. Hull is the "Head-quarters" of the Christian Army, but the Hull society is not the largest branch of the Army. It has been weakened by a secession. The Christian Army News says:—"The General has had a lot to contend with. Last February he appointed a man as Captain at Hull who he thought was a good Christian man, but after being in that office for three weeks he, along with others, caused a split in the camp, but since then the work of God at Head-quarters has gone on with greater spiritual success. The old barracks in Naylor's-row have been exchanged for a beautiful Temple in Merrick-street, where sinners are nightly being brought to the feet of Jesus." It appears by the following that the Army is in a jubilant, hopeful, and resolute condition:—"Hull (Head-quarters).—The power of God's Holy Spirit is still with the dear people at Head-quarters, for during the past month many have started for glory. Death has also been doing its work in our ranks. Brother May (better known as the 'Hallelujah Fiddler') has been called to his reward in the skies. We shall give a short sketch of his life and death next month. We have been visited by Commissioner Bird, Major Mahomet, Captains Gent, Smith, Melton, Gill, Godfrey, Broadbent, Haigh, Armitage, and others. Our meetings are better attended, and the collections a little improved. Mr. Counsellor Martin, Major Hawkins, and Captain Moore are still pushing the battle to the gate. The General has again resumed his duties at Head-quarters, and has recovered from his ill-treatment which he received at Brighouse, on the 1st of November, when an attempt was made upon his life. On Wednesday, the 16th of November, we had a visit from Major Thompson, from Horsea, and the brass band. We still mean victory or death! Pray for us."

The Seceders meet in a large room in Naylor's-row, under the leadership of Captain Broughton. They are more numerous than the Christian Army in Hull. The secession movement is known as the Gospel Mission, and is confined to Hull. I recently formed one of the congregation at the Gospel Mission Room. The singing was much in the style of the Salvation Army. Captain Broughton spoke a long time on holiness, its nature and importance. He is more fluent than grammatical. Several other persons spoke, both men and women. One woman triumphantly affirmed that she had been "washed in the blood of Jesus." When Caleb Whitfield seriously asked Dr. Johnson if he thought a man ought to be transported for being guilty of a double meaning, Johnson, with his usual strong sense, crushed the quibble by saying, "Sir, if a man means well the more he means the better." Still, I venture to think that though this woman meant well, she meant too much when she spoke in such a literal and unpleasant manner of what Christ had done for her. Another eloquent sister prefaced her address by singing a hymn alone. One man, considerably past the summer of life, gave talk in over quantity without regard to quality. He spoke of "an never-ending eternity," and said he knew that if he were to die to-night he would go to heaven. The congregation was better dressed and more respectable looking than is usually seen at similar meetings. Though the evening was cold there were several mothers with babies in arms at the service. It was announced that on the following evening "a suit of new clothes" would be presented to their captain. After the more public service Captain Broughton and several members of the society commenced the prayer meeting, or penitent meeting, by singing a hymn kneeling. At this part of the proceedings the majority of the people left the room, and

I also departed, feeling that the Gospel Mission Room would have been no less attractive by a little more material fire. I have heard it said that residence in the hot region of eternity might, in some cases, be the ideal of happiness to shivering Greenlanders. At any rate, poor humanity may be excused in wishing to hear the Gospel preached in moderate bodily comfort.

THE UNIVERSITY OF LONDON.—A meeting of Convocation is summoned for Tuesday next, and it promises to be one of considerable interest and importance. There is first the nomination of a list of three persons to be submitted to the Crown for the selection therefrom of a member of the Senate. Four candidates are proposed—Dr. Barnes, Dr. Buchanan, medical officer of the Local Government Board, Professor Carey Foster, of University College, and Dr. Samuel Newth, Principal of New College, St. John's Wood. Dr. Newth is supported in his candidature by the names of 481 members of Convocation; Dr. Buchanan by 401; Dr. Barnes by 168; and Professor Foster by 11. Some of the candidates are probably proposed merely with a view to subsequent elections. The stress of the conflict will apparently lie between Dr. Newth and Dr. Buchanan, as the candidate at the head of the poll is invariably selected by the Crown. The next business on the paper is the adjourned debate on Mr. Hensman's motion with regard to the admission of women to Convocation and to the Parliamentary franchise of the University. The debate was adjourned at the last meeting, in order that time might be given for further consideration of a matter so important, and because doubts were entertained whether Convocation has under the charter the power of admitting women to membership. Certainly it has not the power of conferring the Parliamentary franchise. A motion by Dr. Pye Smith is to follow on the formation of Boards of Studies, with the view of bringing the affiliated colleges into a real instead of merely nominal relation to the University. Other motions relate to the extension of the power of Convocation, and the establishment of local examinations analogous to those so successfully conducted by the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge. Lastly, Dr. Rolit is to submit a resolution on the desirableness of conferring honorary fellowships on graduates who have distinguished themselves by original research or otherwise. The motions of Dr. Pye Smith and Dr. Rolit are indications of a feeling which appears to be gaining in force that the time has arrived when the metropolitan University should cease to be a mere examining board, and should become a real, instead of a merely nominal, corporation.

THE SUNDAY SOCIETY.—At the usual meeting of the Committee of the Sunday Society, on Monday night, at 9, Conduit-street, a subscription of £5 was voted to the fund for erecting a national memorial to the society's late president, Dean Stanley. Arrangements were made for opening the exhibition of the Society of British Artists, under the auspices of the Sunday Society, on January 15 and 22. It was decided to hold a second national conference on the eve of the day on which Mr. George Howard, M.P., will bring forward in the House of Commons his motion for the further opening of museums and art galleries on Sundays. The object of the conference will be to support Mr. Howard's resolution—viz., "That, seeing the success which has attended the action of her Majesty's Government in opening on Sundays the national museums and galleries in the suburban districts of London and in the city of Dublin, this House is of opinion that the time has arrived for extending this action to all museums and galleries supported by national funds."

MR. GLADSTONE AND THE CITY CORPORATION.—The City Lands Committee have given Mr. Thomas Woolner, R.A., the commission to execute a bust of Mr. Gladstone for the Guildhall, in accordance with the resolution come to at a recent meeting of the Court of Common Council. The offer made by a Greek company to supply the marble, as a slight recognition of Mr. Gladstone's services to Greece, has been formally accepted, and the Greek Minister has been informed that Mr. Woolner will be the sculptor. The completion of this work is naturally looked forward to with interest, as the artist will arrange with Mr. Gladstone for sittings, and will therefore execute the work from life.

HULL.—On Wednesday evening, the 4th inst., the annual conversazione of the Park-street Church Mutual Improvement Society was held in the School-room, which was tastefully decorated. The attendance was large, and a very pleasant evening was spent.

Occasional Notes.

CHURCHMEN are prone to talk about the number of Nonconformist sects and the differences among Dissenters as if their own withers were unwarped. But here are two instances which illustrate the boasted unity of the Established Church. Commenting on the proceedings of a Church Association meeting, the Church Times said that "the speakers talked as if High Churchmen professed a different creed, and worshipped a different God from Him whom Evangelical men adore." And the same thing may be said of the way in which Ritualists write and speak of the Evangelicals. At the Liverpool Diocesan Conference (November 16) the Bishop said that one of the advantages of such conferences was that they drew together Churchmen of various opinions and schools of thought. "At present," said Dr. Ryle, "the clergy keep aloof from one another read their own newspapers, and support their own favourite societies, and seldom or never see each other, except at rural dean synods and visitations; and then, I often think, they look at one another with as much curiosity as if they were looking at the last new arrival in the Zoological Gardens." We have only to undertake the most distasteful task of reading the church papers of different schools to see how Churchmen love one another.

We take the following from the Rock:—"Curates are just now in demand, and men of any experience or ability are at a premium. We have had opportunity to see lately some replies to an advertisement for a curate for a well-ordered parish in a healthy and accessible northern suburb, and we were not a little surprised at the conditions raised by some of the gentlemen who offered their services. The matter which seemed chiefly to concern all was society. What society is there in the neighbourhood?"

A SCENE of some excitement occurred on Tuesday in connection with the sale of the advowson of Presteigne, Radnorshire, at the Mart, Tokenhouse-yard. The living, valued at £1,360, was knocked down for £5,000. At the conclusion of the proceedings the secretary of one of the Church societies entered an "indignant protest on behalf of the Church and religion against the infamous scandal of these sales."

In the Fortnightly Review this month Miss Frances Power Cobbe deals very trenchantly with the four papers in favour of vivisection which have recently appeared. She thus sets forth the position occupied by the anti-vivisectionists, with whom she is co-operating:—

We desire to stop the torture of animals as a grave moral offence, the consequences of which, be they fortunate or the reverse, we are no more concerned to weigh than those of any other evil deed, but which we believe to be without real advantage to the physical welfare of the community, as we are assured they are detrimental to its moral interests. We find it practically impossible to separate torturing from non-torturing vivisection, or to obtain for an animal bound on a vivisection table any security against the extremity of torture. We therefore ask of Parliament the total prohibition of vivisection.

AN Oxford correspondent of the Daily News calls attention to a curious parallel between Tennyson and Darwin on earthworms, as the following lines show from "Geraint and Enid":—

While some whose souls the old serpent long had drawn

Down, as the worm draws in the withered leaf

And makes it earth.

Readers of "In Memoriam" will call to mind several parallels between the poet's teaching and that of modern science.

It is noted in "Trübner's Literary Record" that all the reports of American literature show a falling off in the circulation of books. This is explained in the New York Nation, on the theory that business was so brisk that people had not time to read; and, further, that they were occupied by the Presidential election, and the literature connected with it.

ACCORDING to a table of statistics, just issued, regarding the leading religious bodies, and stated to be compiled from trustworthy sources, the Baptist denomination now has in Great Britain and Ireland 3,565 churches, 281,016 church members, 1,902 ministers—of whom many are at present engaged in secular business—besides 400 others without pastoral charge; 400,000 Sabbath-school teachers; 61 missionaries—"connected with vigorous missions" as follows—33 in India, 3 in Ceylon, 4 in Norway and Sweden, 3 in France, and the rest in Africa, the West Indies, Italy, China, and Japan; £180,000 being raised by the Baptists for benevolent and missionary purposes. There are 10 colleges and a staff of 30 professors and tutors. The General Baptists in England number 25,000 members, and there are 187 churches.

WE learn from the summary in the Congregational Year-Book for 1882 that the total of churches, branch churches, and preaching stations in Great Britain and Ireland and the islands of the British seas is 4,397, to which must be added for the colonies 589, and the mission stations supported by the London Missionary Society in China, India, South and Central Africa, Madagascar, the West Indies, Polynesia, and New Guinea. Of churches without settled pastors in the United Kingdom there are 308, and of ministers without pastorates 571. The lay pastors are returned at 38, and the evangelists 130. During the year there have been built or rebuilt 64 chapels and 31 schools, and foundation-stones have been laid of 29 chapels and 9 schools; 13 new churches have been formed. The students in the colleges and institutes number 493, exclusive of 300 native students in the training institutions of the London Missionary Society.

AN interesting story is told respecting the wreath sent by Queen Victoria to be placed on General Garfield's coffin. As the coffin was removed from the Rotunda to the hearse at the close of the ceremonies a bud from the wreath dropped off, and a high officer of the Government took it home to his wife, who was confined to a sick bed, put it in a glass upon a table by her side, and informed her that there was a bud from the wreath sent by order of the Queen. The next morning the bud opened, and disclosed in the centre of the flower a beautiful white dove. As the invalid looked upon this, to her, miraculous manifestation—for she never before had seen a flower of the "Holy Spirit," as it is called, and did not know of its existence—she exclaimed to her husband that it was a revelation to her that she was going to recover, and she began to mend from that moment and in a short time was perfectly well.

THERE has again been an increase in the number of students attending the University of Edinburgh. This year the number of matriculated students is 3,237. In the three preceding years the numbers have been, 2,617, 2,856, and 3,172. Of the students 50 per cent. are in the faculty of medicine, and of these 38 per cent. belong to Scotland, and 35·7 to England. The fact that, while the University classes continue to increase, no corresponding addition is made to the teaching power which is at present attracting much attention in Scotland. There has been a lively and somewhat bitter newspaper correspondence between the champions of large classes and the advocates of University reform. Some of the single classes in the faculty of arts, in which the rudiments of Latin and Greek are taught, number two hundred students. What the reformers urge is that, while a professor may lecture to as many students as he can reach with his voice, he cannot teach grammar to more than fifty or sixty in an hour, and there seems to be some reasonableness in the contention. But what is really needed, as Dr. Donaldson points out in his article in the British Quarterly Review, is a higher standard of admission, so that first-rate University professors may no longer have to teach the rudiments of Latin and Greek to lads of sixteen or seventeen.

ONE of the great London hospitals is about to erect a convalescent home near Gravesend, which will be one of the largest in the kingdom. Sir Sydney Waterlow, who is one of the governors, has just communicated to his friends that one gentleman has sent him a cheque for £11,000 towards the good work, and that another has sent £5,000, the latter adding that when he had to make up his accounts for the year he should not miss it.

The New Man and the Eternal Life: Notes on the Reiterated Amen of the Son of God. By Andrew Jukes. London: Longmans and Co. 1881.

This is a book which will find favour with a certain class of readers—those who are fond of religious mysticism, of discovering in the Bible types, emblems, symbols, and of inventing fancied explanations. The work consists of fourteen sections or chapters. The first is introductory, then follow the "reiterated Amens," in twelve chapters, each of which is headed with a reference to a portion of the Fourth Gospel. In each passage of the Gospel referred to Christ uses the expression "Verily, verily." This is the "Amen," and these repetitions are the "reiterated Amens" alluded to in the title. A chapter on "The New Man and the Eternal Life" brings the work to a close. The whole proceeds on the assumption that Scripture is an oracle, and to be so interpreted. Nothing in it is natural or spontaneous, but everything is foreseen, is intended with a particular purpose, is part of a plan or scheme originating in the Divine mind before the foundation of the world. The fall of man is the basis of this theological structure; everything that follows is necessitated by that. The object of Christ's mission was to deliver man from the effects of the fall, and make mankind sons of God like Himself.

It may be convenient to quote here a passage from the first chapter, in which Mr. Jukes states briefly what are the contents of his book:—

The reiterated amens show us the course and stages of that eternal life which is given in Christ Jesus. I have already said that there are twelve sayings of our Lord's which are thus introduced. In some of these sayings the reiterated amen occurs but once; in others twice; in others thrice; in two instances no less than four times; the number of repetitions in each instance depending, if I mistake not, on the special importance or apparent strangeness of the testimony to which they are appended. But there are only twelve sayings which are thus distinguished from the rest of our Lord's words. The first tells of the sphere or home of the new man; heaven, long shut to man, is now re-opened to him. The second shows how alone we enter this home by a new birth, involving a passing through the waters that is a death to nature, in the power of God's spirit. The third tells out the law of the life of this new man; that he doeth nothing from self, but only what the Father doeth; the fourth tells us of his meat, the living word, that bread which comes down from heaven, that a man may eat and not die. The fifth shows us the liberty which he has and gives, even to be free from sin; the sixth declares his divinity, that, as he proceeded forth and came from God, he is a partaker of God's nature and can truly say "I am." The seventh describes his service as a shepherd with his sheep, first walking with them when they walk and then laying down his life for them that they may live. The eighth more fully opens his sacrifice and its results; the ninth shows us his lowliness and that disciples are cleansed and glorified by his humiliation. In the tenth we are shown his glory, that he reveals God, so that he that hath seen the son has seen the Father also; in the eleventh we have his sorrow and joy. The twelfth and last shows us his perfecting; the end, even as the beginning of this wondrous life being still marked by the same entire surrender of self to God in everything.

The leading ideas thus briefly summarised are elaborated in the subsequent portions of the book. The writer shows considerable ingenuity in citing fragments of Scripture, adjusting them and piecing them together to support his theory. He is thoroughly familiar with the New Testament, and has its various sayings always ready for illustration. The Bible is so many-sided, so various, so multifarious are its sayings bearing on religious thought and doctrine, so rich is it in moral and religious experience of every kind that it lends itself to every ingenious theoriser. It becomes quite plastic in his hands, and, quoted in little broken fragments, may be made to teach almost anything he likes. Hence it is that the most conflicting theories obtain support from the same book; and every conflict of texts between rival disputants issues in a drawn battle at last. Mr. Jukes is quite confident that his theory is that of the New Testament; another writer taking a different view may be equally confident of his too. And so there is no end to controversy and sectarian differences. To admit that Mr. Jukes's theory can be sustained by an appeal to Scripture is to say no more than might be conceded on behalf of another theory from which he would dissent. He finds in the New Testament the doctrines of the fall of man, the atonement, the divinity of Christ, sacramental grace, &c. We do not deny that Scripture may be cited easily in support of these doctrines; but we say that the grounds on which the question of their truth rests are much broader than any number of isolated texts can supply. He does not look beyond the two Testaments, but the question of the fall of man for example is not one that the Bible alone can decide. Science has a great deal to say on this matter, and what science has to say deserves, to say the least, as much attention as what the Bible says. The doctrine of the Divinity of Christ, too, cannot be decided by the Bible only; the teaching of comparative mythology has to be considered; what is said of the founders of other religions by their disciples has to be taken into account. The Bible is only one witness on the question of Christian doctrine. There are other witnesses to be called which theologians have been in the habit of overlooking; but whose testimony can no longer be ignored. We fully expect that in time to come this broader view will take the place of the partial one now so prevalent, and then we may look for juster estimates of religious thought and doctrine. As Mr. Jukes writes for Christian believers, his method of treating his subject will, no doubt, commend itself to them; and in their present stage of religious advancement meet their needs. It does not enter into his plan to discuss any questions of Biblical criticism. He takes the Bible as he finds it, and the Authorised Version as it is, and quotes from it abundantly, so that large portions of his work are little else than a paraphrase of parts of Scripture. In one chapter of his work there are ninety-one Scripture references, in another ninety-four, and in another one hundred and thirteen.

Mr. Jukes thinks that we are living in perilous times, that we are on the eve of important changes, and that the Church is approaching a great crisis:—

The days we live in have tokens that some great change is close at hand, and that our race, which step by step has reached its present state, is about to pass, not surely without a crisis, for every advance is through some crisis, into some new and we may believe some higher experience. Does Christ's life give us no light here? Does it not rather show us the appointed way to the consummation, which has, indeed, been individually experienced by the elect, who, as God's first born, ever lead the way, and of which they are the witness and example, but which, unless I misunderstand Christ's life, is to be reached, at last, by the race whose nature he has redeemed, and already brought in himself through death from earth to heaven. . . . Saints in bygone days foresaw that the Church would come to a tribulation, which should make her cry, like Christ, "My God, my God, why has thou forsaken me?" out of which, through the consumption which is decreed, she shall be raised to another state, and like her head, even through judgment, be yet more blessed and made a blessing. To me all things seem to witness that this change is at the doors, that Christendom is even now on the very eve of judgment, and yet that the break up of the Church, like that of Israel of old, will raise the world another step, and lead, not only to the departure of the fleshly forms of Christ, but to an outpouring of the spirit such as hitherto has not been known. Christ shall be revealed. It will not be what so many are expecting, the continuation of that which now is seen, but the bringing in, or rather bringing out, of that which still is hidden, which, while it will surely shake all that can be shaken, will reveal also something which shall not be moved.

And so, according to our author, the drama of human history is near the closing scene. It has been the dream of the Christian ages from the time of the Apostles to the present hour. In every century the signs of the times have pointed to the great catastrophe. And still it is delayed. The new heavens and the new earth have been looked for with longing eyes by the succeeding generations of eighteen centuries, but the old heavens and the old earth are with us still. There have been great crises in the world's affairs, but the derangement has been only partial and temporary. The great wheels of nature have continued their course in their customary track; society has recovered from the shock which threatened its dissolution; men's interest in secular matters has returned to them unimpaired; and all things have settled down once more with comparatively little change. Will the crisis which many, like Mr. Jukes, are anticipating now be of a different character from those of the past? Will it be a higher fulfilment of human hopes than any which has yet been seen? Will it correct the gigantic evils which still curse the world, and bring about peace on earth and good will among men? Our author believes that it will, and that Christ himself is the promise, the prophecy of it all. It is something to have that faith and to avow it in an unbelieving age. Even should it prove to be mistaken or exaggerated it is better than the pessimism which abandons the world to ruin and despair. For ourselves, we do not believe in any sudden conversion of the world, or any personal return of Christ to the earth; but we do believe in the improvement of the world, in the growth of knowledge, freedom and happiness, and in a future for mankind brighter, better, happier than the past. Entering into the Kingdom of God. A Discourse by the Rev. Henry Solly. Elliot Stock.

This valuable discourse was delivered before the two hundred and twenty-eighth annual meeting of the General Baptist Assembly, on June 7 last, and is now published at their request. It is an earnest vindication of supernatural Christianity and of the right of adult baptism as "a stern decisive act which shall at once mark and manifest, shall consecrate and decide for time and eternity, the choice between good and evil, between the kingdom of God and the kingdom of the devil." Mr. Solly's position is not ours, although we are glad to recognise many fundamental points of agreement. For our own part we believe solely in a moral and spiritual Christianity which relies for its authority upon its own intrinsic truth and divinity, and not upon the sanction of doubtful historical records, and upon legendary marvels which admit of no decisive proof. And we distrust the tendency to rely upon any external rite as a necessary passport or testimony of entrance into a purely moral and spiritual kingdom.

Mr. Solly is alarmed at the progress of "Christian Theism" among the Liberal Churches, meaning by that phrase "Christianity without Christ, without the Son of God, without miracles, or any reliable Gospels?" The question of "reliable Gospels" is one of pure criticism, on which it is not a part of Mr. Solly's object in this discourse to offer us any help. Those who reject the miracles believe that they make Christianity more credible in its vital, moral, and spiritual influence. And those who reject the Christ of the creeds or the superhuman Christ of ancient tradition and modern illusion hold that he becomes nearer and more real to them as the brother man struggling like ourselves, only with infinitely greater faith and nobler victory, with temptation and evil, and working his way, as we all must, to the final destiny of the eternal spirit. "Have we not God and Christian morality? What want we more? Christian Theism, let that suffice." Mr. Solly obviously thinks this does not suffice. For our own part we think that if we have "God and Christian morality" we have the fundamental things to which all else is subsidiary. It is much in these days to believe in Christ as the greatest of human teachers; and if we believe also in God with all the mind and heart and soul, all moral and speculative difficulties will quickly be solved. Instead of apparently disparaging such grand affirmations as insufficient, the wise Christian teacher will recognise them as embodying, after all, the essence of that real Catholic faith which is founded upon the permanent requirements of the human heart and conscience.

The discourse is mainly, as it will be perceived, an alarmist cry of warning to the small and rapidly dying out Churches of the general Baptist sect. At the same time there is at the conclusion an interesting testimony to the influence and work of the Unitarian Churches in which the preacher was born and bred:—

Foremost among the band of faithful men who have resisted and exposed these unhappy perversions of simple Gospel truth, have been the denomination to which I referred above—the old English Presbyterians, the descendants of the "Westminster Assembly of Divines," of Matthew Henry, Oliver Heywood, Richard Baxter, and the other heroic two thousand ejected ministers, who left the Church of England on "Black Bartholomew" day, 1662. The Unitarians of this country, who represent those Presbyterian martyrs, are especially to be honoured for their faithful advocacy of certain vital, all-important Scripture truths, which, at the cost often of social and ecclesiastical martyrdom, they have vindicated against prevalent pernicious errors with true Christian insight and with a noble fidelity to the Scriptures they revered and the Saviour whom they desired to obey. All honour to Lindsey, Price, Priestley, Belsham, Aspland, Carpenter, Channing, for the witness they bore on behalf of the Unity, supremacy, and universal love of God, the greatness and worth of humanity, the personal nature of salvation,—for their protest against the doctrines which confounded the Son of God with the Eternal Father, which invented an impossible and terribly unjust "satisfaction of justice," which proclaimed remission of punishment instead of the removal of sin as the great object of Christian hope, and consigned innumerable millions of human beings to everlasting torments and eternal sin. Yes, the Unitarians of this country have done a great and imperishable work for which they will receive the thanks and honour of the Lord of the Christian Church, and of His Father and His God. They were called to deliver an all-important message, and they have done it nobly.

And while deploring again the growth and progress of the obnoxious "Christian Theism" among Unitarian churches, Mr. Solly adds:—

But, brethren, I cannot believe—and I say it with all respect and deference for a body of Christians to whom I owe so much and whom I esteem so highly—that the Lord of the Churches means to let the Unitarian denomination perish. There is too much unspeakably precious truth committed to their custody, too much brave faithful loyalty to duty and to truth, too much devout self-consecration to God and to the welfare of man, too much spiritual life, high morality, and (of late years) missionary zeal among them—the very serious errors into which I dare to think they have been driven, have sprung too decisively from their fidelity to what seemed truth to them—for the Lord Jesus to let that denomination perish. Rather will he bring them back "by ways they know not of" to their first love, their true faith—the faith of Heywood and Baxter—purified from the errors which Channing and Maurice alike have denounced, and have replaced with vital truths. God's blessing be on them for what they have done and for what they have suffered in the cause of truth, and for that which I believe their Church will yet live to do and to be. But oh! my General Baptist brethren, suffer me to pray you to beware how you let the deadly blight of fatal errors, from whatever quarter they may come, Orthodox, Unitarian, or sceptical (all the more dangerous when existing side by side with heavenly truths), creep over your churches, and bring on you the decay and ruin witnessed in many a congregation, and which, if not arrested in time, inevitably follows the loss of faith in a living present Deliverer, Saviour, King, God knows too well, and you can see with your own eyes "the desolate heritage," "the wilderness and solitary places" of what were once flourishing churches; and you begin to hear some sorrowful cries coming up even from the midst of churches still flourishing to the outward eye.

The Modern Review. James Clarke and Co.

The January number is full of varied learning and profound philosophical thought and elaborate critical scholarship; but we must respectfully hint that there is some danger of its following too closely in the footsteps of its "lamented predecessor," and becoming a little too ponderous and elaborate in tone, even for those who are warmly interested in maintaining the scholarly reputation of an organ of liberal religion. The present number does not interest us so much as most of its predecessors, but that may be owing to our own mental peculiarities, and we do not for a moment impute the slightest blame to the new editor, who has no doubt done the best with the materials submitted to him.

In the first article, the "Churches Established and Non-Established," Dr. G. Vance Smith advocates his "comprehension theory," which, if memory serves us aright, has been in substantially the same form stated from time to time in the pages of the Modern Review, the Nineteenth Century, the Contemporary Review, and the columns of the Inquirer. We need hardly say that we entirely sympathise with the desire for "comprehension," and have no belief whatever in the cardinal maxims of the Liberationists, although we hold that "Disestablishment" as a political fact will inevitably come sooner or later, whether we like it or not. But the practical objection to "Comprehension" is that it cannot in any form be carried out without a thorough revolution in theological and ecclesiastical belief, which it seems vain to expect in the present condition of thought. Any scheme of "Comprehension" which implied that sacerdotalism and Episcopacy were things indifferent would at once necessarily lead to the exclusion of the High Church party. Any scheme which implied that the Athanasian and Nicene Creeds, and the Thirty-nine Articles were not necessary to be believed, would at once involve the exclusion of the Evangelical and the High Church parties together. Dr. Vance Smith's and other schemes of "Comprehension" are only palatable to the Broad Church party in the Establishment, and among Unitarians—an infinitesimally small minority. When all men, or the great majority, become sound religious Liberals then "comprehension" may become a question of practical politics, but even then grave and insurmountable difficulties may arise respecting Liturgies, the Episcopacy, the Credenda, which cannot be settled by the easy decree of leaving all congregations free to act for themselves. And all depends upon that very important word when!

The Rev. J. Edwin Odgers follows with a paper on "Westcott and Hort's Greek New Testament," his object being to state the problem presented to the textual critic in the present day, and the principles upon which the editors have dealt with it, as set forth in the introduction, and illustrated in their appendix. The article is one of a class which ably represents the free learning and criticism of which this Review is one of the ablest representatives, and it will be read with great interest by the too limited class of Biblical critics.

Of the remaining articles we need say but little. We doubt whether Mr. James T. Bixby—an accomplished American contributor.—in his article on "Herbert Spencer's Data of Ethics," thoroughly comprehends the work he so ably criticises; and the dialogue between the author and an imaginary disciple at the end seems rather a parody than a real reductio ad absurdum of Mr. Spencer's ethical system.

Mr. J. Hunter Smith, in an article on "Religious Instruction in Schools," gives a sketch of the religious instruction which he thinks might be given with fairness and advantage to the children of parents of all Christian denominations. The writer lays down the two following postulates:—"First: That forasmuch Christianity has had immense influence on the history of the world, no one can be said to have a liberal education who is not acquainted with the history of the people from whose midst it sprung, and the life and sayings of the founder and his disciples. Secondly: That religious instruction in schools should not only supply needful information on this point, but should also bear on conduct, and especially on conduct in relation to others." The obvious objection to this is that it is practically impossible to open the door to religious instruction so far and no farther. And, although Mr. Hunter Smith gives some admirable illustrations of the teaching he would sanction—quite in accordance with the ethical principles of liberal Christianity—he has omitted to notice that on his own principle it would be next to impossible, if it would not be glaringly unjust, to prevent equally zealous advocates of supernaturalism and dogmatic orthodoxy from indoctrinating their pupils with their own systems. In all these schemes, both of Church and School comprehension, Liberals fall into the fallacy of thinking that their more or less negative systems are to be the sole standard for all others; but why should not our orthodox and sacerdotal friends with equal dogmatism be permitted to assert the exclusive predominance of their own systems, which are to them the vital essence of Christianity?

The remaining articles are "The Leading Idea of the Divine Comedy," a fine piece of literary criticism, by C. Tomlinson, F.R.S.; "Richard Cobden," an interesting review of John Morley's recently published Memoir, by the Rev. S. A.

Steinthal, who, we fancy, might have given some valuable personal reminiscences of his own; and "Architectural Restoration in the Nineteenth Century," by Charles Grindrod, who enters a strong and greatly-needed protest against the destructive work of so-called "restorers."

Under the heading of "Notes and Discussions," we have four short papers on the following subjects:—"Remarks on the Moral Influence of the Christian Pulpit," by the Rev. J. Drummond, characterised by the writer's intensity of spiritual thought; "Note on St. Paul's Saying in the Corinthians xv. 32," in which Mr. Andrew Miller vindicates that saying in reply to Dr. Hooykas; "A Controversy on the Talmud," an account, by the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed, of an interesting discussion which has recently taken place in Holland between Professor Oort, of Leiden, and Rabbi Tal, of Amsterdam; and "Dr. J. H. Stirling's Text-Book to Kant," in which the Rev. C. B. Upton criticises some points in the Transcendental Logic.

In the copious "Notices of Books," there are short reviews by the Rev. Dr. John Hunt, Mr. R. Lane Poole, the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, Mr. T. W. Rhys-Davids, Professor J. E. Carpenter, the Revs. P. H. Wicksteed, F. H. Jones, W. Binns, R. B. Drummond, W. H. Herford, T. W. Freckelton, H. S. Solly, and others.

Short Notices.

The Nobility of Goodness is the appropriate title of an "In Memoriam" discourse preached on Sunday morning, December 4, 1881, at Kingswood Chapel, on the occasion of the lamented death of Joseph Henry Nettlefold, Esq., J.P., one of its trustees, by the Rev. James Taplin, minister of the congregation. Taking for his text Luke xxiii. 30:—"And behold there was a man named Joseph, a counsellor, and he was a good man and a just," Mr. Taplin draws an ingenious parallel between the character of his late friend and that of the wealthy and upright member of the Jewish Sanhedrin, claiming for him that if he was not a great man he was essentially a good man; and in the higher sense of the word great:—

"Great in industry, effort, and exertion in endeavouring to stem the threatening floods of mercantile depression and embarrassments; in inspiring courage and hopefulness in those who sought his counsel, with gloom on their brows and anxiety in their hearts, often converting their gloom to cheerfulness, and their anxiety to peace of mind; great in ministering comfort in adversity, strength in weakness, and balm in sickness, thus promoting the well-being and happiness of all within the sphere of his influence. I, therefore, pronounce him a great as well as a good man, believing as I do, that the great in excellence, character, and action have a deeper hold on the affections of mankind, than profundity of intellect, devoid of those benevolent sympathies which breathe through and touch the finest chords of our moral nature."

"The highest benevolence is that which labours to accomplish the greatest moral good for man and for society. There is no legitimate or better use and application of wealth, or more in harmony with the spirit of Christ's religion, than the appropriation of a liberal portion of it to the accomplishment of rightful and benevolent objects. When wealth is used for diffusing popular knowledge by establishing and sustaining schools, and laying the foundations of great, growing, and humanising institutions, it then becomes a public and a wide-spread blessing, and the capitalist is seen and revered as the poor man's friend in the time of need. He thus proves himself the faithful steward of God's rich gifts, elevating and comforting the receivers, both in their social welfare and in their moral and spiritual life. In this way our departed friend used his wealth. Faithful to his trust, he dispensed his charity without ostentation, and manifested his religion without parade. He aimed at no personal glory, seeking the delightful pleasure of doing good unnoticed by any human eye. . . . Difference of religion made no difference in the bestowal of his gifts. His benevolence recognised man as man, irrespective of all sectarian diversities and dispensed with a gentle and good will to give his needy neighbours help and comfort. He was a truthful type of the Good Samaritan, immortalised by the Saviour for all that is generous and human. . . . What a deep and glorious meaning have we in that recorded sentiment, 'a just man,' one who renders to all his rightful dues, who casts aside all private interest, that equity may be the rule of his actions to secure man's rights and to shield them from wrong. Justice goes with him to the judgment seat, where he is ever found faithful to his light, true to his convictions of duty, ever striving to bring the jarring elements of discord among neighbours to soberness and peace. As a magistrate, he blended mercy with judgment. His rule was to protect the weak, and to restrain injustice. Our local bench has lost in him a sound and exemplary helper, over whose tribunal seat might be truly written: 'Thou hast never defrauded or oppressed us, neither hast thou taken aught from any man's hand.' While he tempered justice with mercy he dealt out equal and exact justice with unsparing earnestness, irrespective of State, religious or political influence."

The following passage from an appended address to the members and friends of the Kingswood congregation will be read with interest:—

"I propose devoting the surplus of the sale of his publication for raising a fund to purchase a field, adjoining our burial ground, which has been offered us for £100. It is most desirable that we should secure it, and that without delay, as our burial ground will soon require more space for interments. The increase will be a great advantage to our Birmingham friends, who will have a rural cemetery within a reasonable distance, delightfully situated, planted with trees, shrubs, and flowers, which they might revisit with the sweetest remembrances of the dearest objects of affection, though with a melancholy pleasure. It is a work which I am most anxious to see completed, as my age is advancing, having entered my eighty-third year, and by the blessing of Providence, with health and strength, enabled to sustain my ministerial duties, which I pray may continue until my desire is fulfilled, of leaving Kingswood far better than I found it."

The Pioneer of a Family; or, Adventures of a Young Governess. By J. R. H. Hawthorn. London: Hodder and Stoughton. 1881.

Part of this tale was written some years ago for the Sydney Mail, but the work has been lately revised and extended by the author, who has lived in Australia for more than forty years. Though the first scene is laid in London, we are soon transported to Australia, in which the chief interest of the book is centred. The heroine leaves England to be governess in the family of a squatter in New South Wales. It is the time when convicts, or Government men, as they were called, were assigned to the colonists, and there are many interesting references in this story to them and their condition. There are also pleasant descriptions of life and scenery in the bush. After a few happy years there our young governess returns suddenly to England to take charge of her father, invalided by a steamboat accident in which he had lost his wife and youngest child, and the account of her fight with poverty in London, both before and after her father's death, and her struggles to keep a home for her younger brothers and sister is evidently intended as a strong contrast to her peaceful, happy, colonial life. Fortunately Kate's Australian fiancé appears upon the scene when the fortunes of the family are at their lowest ebb, and carries her and her sister off to the happy land, whither, after a time, the rest of the family follow. Once re-established at the Antipodes all goes well. The men become rich and influential, the women make good marriages. We hope that Mr. Hawthorn, in his love for the new country, which he says is ere long destined to be "the greatest empire of the Southern World," is not holding out delusive hopes to emigrants. The smallest effort made to induce respectable families to leave this overcrowded country and work their way up in a new land is commendable, and even a story book may not have been written in vain. Although the dialogue is not of great literary merit, the author is so well-intentioned and sincere, and there is such an accent of truth in all the descriptions, that our interest is kept up throughout, in spite, also, of the rather Evangelical tone of the book. The accounts of sea voyages and shipwrecks will be enjoyed by boy-readers. We may add that the book is well printed and attractively bound, and suitable for a gift-book.

The Expositor for December opens with a scholarly article by Dr. Sanday on the text of "The Revised New Testament," defending the Revisers, not unsuccessfully as regards the passages quoted, from the charge of dogmatic bias. Professor Robertson Smith continues his interesting series on "Christ and the Angels." The other articles in this number are an essay on "The Epistle to the Hebrews," by the Rev. H. Wace, who brings out its spiritual and comprehensive characteristics; a continuation of Dean Plumptre's valuable series of papers on "Assyrian and Babylonian Inscriptions;" and "Peter and John before the Sanhedrin," a commentary on the incident in Acts iv. 7-20.—In the January number the Rev. Canon Evans, in his "Critical Remarks on the Translation of the Revised Version," contends that it exhibits "more labour than genius, more learning than judgment"—and gives several instances in proof, while allowing that several texts have been retranslated for the better. The editor—the Rev. S. Cox—follows with an admirable exposition of "The Second Psalm." In the first of a series of "Studies in the Minor Prophets" the Rev. Dr. Matheson follows Dean Stanley in bringing out the breadth and real human interest of the too much neglected book of Jonah. The Rev. Dr. Abbott in an essay on "The Second Epistle of St. Peter—Had the Author read Josephus?" gives striking evidence in support of the theory that the author of this epistle imitated Josephus. Finally, Professor Robertson Smith continues his series of articles on "Christ and the Angels."

The Clergyman's Magazine (Hodder and Stoughton) is published chiefly under Evangelical auspices; and while it contains much that is useful and instructive for parochial clergymen and others, it has little that will interest ministers and students of the Liberal school of thought. The number for January opens with an Address, by the Bishop of Bedford, on "Devotional Meetings of the Clergy." This is followed by a number of "Outlines and Instructions based upon the Ecclesiastical Year, Bible and Prayer-book," &c., which look very artificial. The Rev. J. Rawson Lumby—a competent scholar—begins a series of chapters of an "Introduction to the New Testament" of a popular kind; and Norman Kerr has a treatise on "Wines: Scriptural and Ecclesiastical," in which he advocates the substitution of unfermented wine in the administration of the Lord's Supper. But the most interesting article to the general reader is the account of a journey "Through Siberia," by the Rev. Henry Lansdell, the editor of the magazine, and author of the valuable letters on "Siberia," which appeared some months ago in the Times. A fac-simile is given of Mr. Lansdell in Gilyah costume of salmon-skin, with a large ring through his nose—altogether very truculent person.

The Bibliographer (Eliot Stock) is an excellent journal of book-lore, full of interest to archaeologists and book collectors. The second number contains, among other contributions, a valuable historical article on "The Bishops' Bible," by the Rev. Nicholas Pocock; "Dante in England," a chapter of literary history, by Professor J. W. Hales; "The Woodcutters of the Netherlands," by W. M. Conway; and an account of The Sunderland Sale and the Comerford Sale, with the prices of the principal books sold.

Messrs. Longmans have published in their wonderfully cheap and attractive "Sunbeam Series" Strange Dwellings, being a description of the habitations of animals, slightly abridged from the Rev. J. G. Wood's popular "Homes Without Hands." It is printed in excellent type, and is, we need hardly add, a work especially interesting to the young and to budding Naturalists.

Literary Notes.

MESSRS. LONGMAN will publish in the spring the third and fourth volumes of Mr. Lecky's masterly work, "The History of England in the Eighteenth Century," they will deal with the period between 1760 and 1784.

MR. BLANCHARD JERROLD is engaged in a work on Egypt, which will be published shortly, and will be entitled "The Belgium of the East."

SIGNOR GALLAGHER will shortly publish a work in which he will give an account of his travels in Russia. He was unfortunately prevented from visiting Siberia.

UNDER the title of "The Gospel and its Witnesses," Professor Wace is going to print six lectures delivered by him at St. James's, Westminster, on the principal facts in the life of Christ, and the authority of the Gospel narratives. Mr. Murray, who will publish the book, also promises "An Argument for the Divinity of Jesus Christ," a translation by C. L. Currie from "Le Christianisme et les Temps Présents," of Abbé E. Bougaud.

A NEW poem by Mr. Tennyson, on "The Charge of the Heavy Brigade," will appear in the February number of Macmillan's Magazine.

THE sale of the Beckford Library commences next June. We learn from the Athenæum that though the cataloguing of the valuable MSS. will be begun at once, the task will not probably be finished in time to admit of their being included in the June auction, which is to last ten days; but they will most likely be disposed of at a later period. The books sold in June will probably, on account of their splendid bindings, attract many French buyers. The Hamilton Library will be sold after the Beckford.

MR. CHARLES HARDWICK, of Manchester, the historian of Preston, has in hand a book on the ancient battlefields of Lancashire. Mr. Hardwick has contributed considerably to the literature of the County Palatine, and rendered assistance to the Rev. Brooke Herford in his editorship of the concluding volume of the last edition of Baines's "Lancashire."

MR. T. H. FARRER, Permanent Secretary of the Board of Trade, has written a work to illustrate established truths, and to expose exploded, though not obsolete fallacies, which will be shortly published for the Cobden Club, under the title of "Free Trade versus Fair Trade."

PROFESSOR REVEL, of Florence, has completed and issued his new Italian version of the New Testament. This is the fourth new version published in Europe in the year 1881, making this year remarkable in the history of scriptural bibliography. The work has occupied him for ten years, and will, if found acceptable to the Protestant Churches, supersede a version made two hundred years ago.

Le Nord, the Russian organ, hitherto published daily at Brussels, will for the future appear once a week.

THE second volume of the "Calendar of Virginia State Papers and other Manuscripts, preserved in the Capitol at Richmond," has been recently published, says the New York Nation, under the supervision of Dr. William P. Palmer, aided by Mr. M' Rae, the State Librarian. The volumes embraces the archives of Virginia from April 1, 1781, to Dec. 31, 1781, which was practically the closing period of the American Revolution.

BARON TAUCHNITZ has made a New Year's gift of a handsomely-bound copy of the two thousandth volume of his series of English books to each of the authors whose works are contained in it.

MESSRS. METZLER and Co., of Great Marlborough-street, are, by command of her Majesty, preparing for publication a complete collection of the musical compositions, sacred and secular, of H.R.H. the Prince Consort, the whole being produced under the supervision of Mr. W. G. Cousins, her Majesty's "Master of Music."

THE total sum of money received at the National Gallery for admission on students' days during the past year exceeded £700. The number of visitors to the same institution averaged, daily, from less than 200 to more than 500.

REFERRING to published statements that the Cambridge Professorship of Fine Art will shortly be vacant, the Athenæum is in a position to say that at the end of the usual term Professor Colvin will offer himself for re-election.

THE Academy says that Messrs. Chapman and Hall are about to publish an important and costly work on certain living English artists. It will contain portraits of them, and etchings—in some cases, we believe, by themselves; in others, etchings of their works; and the letterpress dealing with their lives and pictures will be written with their special authority, if not with their own hands. Mr. Herkomer will contribute an original engraving—partly etched, partly mezzotint—a proof of which was exhibited in the collection of his works at Messrs. Goupil's in the spring of last year.

MANY will be glad to hear that the exploration of Buddhist ruins in the Peshawur Valley, commenced in 1873 and 1874, is shortly to be again taken up.

THROAT IRRITATION.—Soreness and dryness, tickling and irritation, inducing cough and affecting the voice. For these symptoms use Epps's Glycerine Jujubes. Glycerine, in these agreeable confections, being in proximity to the glands at the moment they are excited by the act of sucking, becomes actively healing. Sold only in boxes, 7½d. and 1s. 1½d., labelled, "JAMES EPPS and Co., Homœopathic Chemists, London." A letter received:—"Gentlemen,—It may, perhaps, interest you to know that, after an extended trial, I have found your Glycerine Jujubes of considerable benefit (with or without medical treatment) in almost all forms of throat disease. They soften and clear the voice.—Yours faithfully, GORDON HOLMES, L.R.C.P.E., Senior Physician to the Municipal Throat and Ear Infirmary."

THE NAMES "UNITARIAN" AND "SOCINIAN."

BY DR. G. VANCE SMITH.

The following remarks on these misunderstood words are taken from the reporter's notes of the sermon recently delivered at the annual meeting of the Scottish Unitarian Christian Association, and printed as an appendix to the Report of the Society:—

The name "Unitarian" has been usually understood to imply a direct dissent from the popular doctrine of the Trinity of persons in the Godhead; and it involves, though it does not expressly affirm, a denial of the doctrine that Jesus Christ is God. It denies also that the Holy Spirit is God, in the sense of being a separate Divine personality. This, however, does not appear to have been the force or import of the word Unitarian when it was first introduced. Another and less controversial idea was associated with it in its earlier use. The name itself is believed to have originated in the middle of the sixteenth century, in Transylvania, which is a province of the Austrian Empire, where there has been an established Unitarian Church for more than three hundred years, recognised and supported by the Austrian Government. It is related that, at a Diet, or provincial Parliament, held in the year 1557, a resolution was passed, which afterwards became law, guaranteeing to all sects freedom of worship. As this resolution promised to put an end to existing differences, and to bring about union among the people concerned, those who desired and promoted its adoption were called Uniti or Unitarii. In this, then, we seem to have the primitive meaning of the name before us. The persons who first bore it were persons who sought especially to establish Union, Equality, and Freedom of Worship among and for the different political and religious parties of their time and country. In this signification, the name might be used, I imagine, by most of the sects and parties of our own day, unless, indeed, we except Roman Catholics and some of the higher sort of Protestants, who probably would not tolerate anything like religious union or equality with those who would not adopt their own creeds and their modes of worship; but, nevertheless, the great bulk of the Christian bodies in this country would allow themselves to be considered Unitarians, or even claim to be Unitarians in the earlier sense, though not in the theological sense. This theological sense, however, soon made its appearance, and became important. It happened that the party to whom the name Unitarian was given, as I have just mentioned, were distinguished for their agreement in reference to the doctrine of the Divine Unity. They rejected the ancient Church-idea of a plurality of persons in the Godhead as not being sufficiently warranted by the teaching of Scripture. Thus, what was at first a political term, or half-political and half-ecclesiastical, came to obtain a more properly theological signification. It came to denote those who believed in One God in One Person, or in other words, in One God, the Father; and this, in express contradiction to those who explained away the Unity of the Godhead, and who cannot be said to believe in One sole God, without very considerable qualification.

The history of the word Unitarian, with its import as now used, is thus, it appears, a very simple and straightforward matter. Those who bear this name, or to whom it has been given, have not invented it. It has come down to them historically; and it has been admitted and employed mainly because it appears to denote correctly the theological position which they occupy. On the whole, I must add, I cannot but think that it is the most open and straightforward course to accept the name which has thus come down to us, as I have explained, and to apply it in its usual and historical sense. So employed, it has a very distinct and important meaning. Nor is it without interesting and honourable associations in the past, as anyone will find who will take the trouble to investigate its history. But yet the name is one of exclusion. To some extent this is undeniable, and to be regretted that it is so; but if it excludes, at least it does not denounce those who may differ in their theological views, and say that they shall perish everlastingly because they are not Unitarians. If any one would find us a better name, and one more expressive of our actual theological position, we, as Unitarians, doubtless would be glad to accept it; but until that is done we cannot fairly avoid or decline an unpopular name merely because it is in a certain sense exclusive, and controversial in its character.

In the next place, while I am upon this subject of names and their use, let me briefly refer to another term of which some persons are very fond. It is usually brought out as a term of reproach, or abuse even, but not always so, for I imagine that it is occasionally used simply because it is supposed to denote correctly the theological doctrines to which it is applied. I allude to the word Socinian. The present Archbishop of York, for example, in a sermon on an occasion which I remember, spoke of Dr. Channing as a Socinian; and so the word is very often applied to persons who, like Channing, are believers in the sole deity of the One God, the Father. But more commonly this name of Socinian has been a term of abuse; and to speak of a man as a Socinian is, in the ears of many good people, much the same thing as to call him a Deist, or even worse. But now, I must say this is unjust and altogether indefensible on the ground of historical accuracy. In the first place, it is highly unjust to the memory of two eminent men whose character and history were, in most respects such that it should be esteemed an honour, rather than a reproach, to be named after them. The two Socini, uncle and nephew, were members of a distinguished Italian family. They were of noble birth, and received the best education which the times could afford. Living in the sixteenth century, in the time of Calvin and our own reformers, they were led to adopt the doctrines and the principles of the Reformation; but they went a little farther than others, and they soon had to flee from their own country as heretics. Many of their friends were thrown into prison, and put to death, on the same grounds. The German and the Swiss reformers look coldly upon them; and it is related of Calvin that on one occasion when the elder Socinus proposed some doubtful question for his consideration, Calvin grimly replied by warning him to get rid of his "itch of inquiry" lest he should bring upon himself great torment. This happened, we are told, in the same year in which Calvin brought about the burning of the Unitarian Servetus at Geneva; and it shows us the spirit which animated some of the great Protestant leaders of that time. Thus the Socini were reputed heretics; and their party, powerful in some countries, though small, became a term for heresy and abuse in later times. But, notwithstanding, how highly they were esteemed by some of the best men of a former age for character, fidelity to their sense of duty, and their general ability and learning, I will illustrate by two brief quotations. The following words are by the celebrated William Penn, the founder of Pennsylvania, who was himself once charged with being a Socinian. In his defence he used these words:—"I must confess that I have heard of one Socinus, of what is called a noble family, of Sienna in Italy, who about the year 1574, being a young man, did voluntarily abandon the pleasures and honours of the great Duke of Tuscany's court at Florence, who became an exile for his conscience, whose parts, wisdom, and just behaviour, made him famous with the Polish and Transylvanian Churches." But he adds—"I was never baptised into his name, and therefore deny that reproachful epithet, and if in anything I acknowledge the truth of his doctrine, it is for the truth's sake, of which, in many things, he had a clearer prospect than most of his contemporaries." Another distinguished person, an Anglican prelate, no less a person than Archbishop Tillotson, speaks of the Socinian writers of his time in terms of appreciation and justice, which are not commonly met with, and well deserve to be remembered. He says:—"To do right to the writers on that side, I must own they argue matters with that temper and gravity, and with that freedom from passion, which become a serious and weighty argument, inasmuch that some of the Protestant, and the generality of the Popish writers, and even the Jesuits themselves, who pretend to all the reason and subtlety in the world, are in comparison to them but mere scolds and bunglers. Upon the whole," Archbishop Tillotson continues—"they have but this one great defect, that they want a good cause and truth on their side, which if they had, they have reason, and wit, and temper enough to defend it."

Whether the Socinian writers who are thus characterised had a good cause or not may be matter of opinion. At any rate, they had not a popular cause. They were bitterly denounced, and suffered great persecutions for their reputed heresies; and so it happened that their name became a name of opprobrium, and is still too frequently employed in that evil sense. But let me now point out that this is not only, as I have said, unjust to the original bearers of that name, but it further involves a degree of inaccuracy, or even of ignorance, which is not altogether creditable to those who so apply it to the modern Unitarian. In one most important respect the Unitarian is not a Socinian, while the Orthodox or Evangelical Christian, of whatever name, is such—for the true Socinian, it is well known, pays religious worship to Christ. The modern Unitarian never does so. He would consider such worship, offered by himself, as simply idolatrous. This is one of the most important respects in which one form of Christian belief can differ from another. And it follows that the epithet Socinian is in this respect really applicable to the Trinitarian quite as much as in another respect to the Unitarian. To apply it to such a man as Channing, or such a man as Priestley, or Milton, or Locke, or Newton, not to speak of any living Unitarian, is erroneous and unjust in the highest degree; because none of these eminent men owed their Christian belief, in any degree, to the Socini, or to their system; but they studied Christianity for themselves, as they were well able to do, in its original records. They had examined for themselves; and would have repudiated, in the strongest language, the following in the footsteps of any master whatsoever. One was their master, even Christ; and they refused, as strongly as they could refuse, to call themselves by any other name.

SOCIETY OF BIBLICAL ARCHAEOLOGY.—On Tuesday night the anniversary meeting of the Society of Biblical Archaeology was held at its rooms, 9, Conduit-street, W., the Rev. Canon Beechey in the chair. The report, which was read by the secretary, stated the present number of ordinary members to be 559, in addition to thirty-five foreign honorary members. Mr. Rylands reproduced from the Egyptian correspondence of a French journal the latest accounts of Professor Maspero's exploration of the mysterious step-pyramid of Meydom, which is thought by some not unlikely to prove that of the Protomarch Menes himself. Maspero had discovered the entrance at the summit of the supposed artificial mound on which the pyramid was thought to have stood, but which turned out to be its first story. According to M. Gabriel Charmes, writing on the day of his visiting the pyramid, with Maspero as his cicerone, the opening now uncovered forms an entrance by an admirably constructed corridor sloping downwards about forty metres, absolutely the same length as that of the Great Pyramid. At the end of this long slope the path is as yet blocked up by débris. Maspero had already found in the corridor two hieratic inscriptions, in the style of the twentieth dynasty, recording the names of a couple of scribes who had visited the pyramid at that date, at least 1,000 B.C.

PALESTINE EXPLORATION FUND.—Lieutenant Conder has returned to Jerusalem, bringing with him the results of his first campaign in Eastern Palestine. These are the survey of about five hundred square miles of country, the plans, photographs, and special surveys of a great many places of interest, including Heshbon-Amman and Arak el Emir, the great castle of Hircanus. At Amman—the ancient Rabbath Ammon—he has examined a building which he considers to be of Sassanian architecture. If this is the case it is important, as showing that other Sassanian buildings were put up besides the great castle of Mashita discovered by Canon Tristram. Over six hundred names have been collected, two hundred miles examined, several Bible identifications proposed. The great feature of the country just explored is the prodigious number of cromlechs, and these not scattered about, but grouped and referable to certain centres which represent the old sacred places of the primitive inhabitants. In addition to the cromlechs some very interesting menhirs were found and ancient stone circles. Lieutenant Conder suggests that the "bedstead" of King Og (Deut. iii. 11), which should be "throne," may have been one of these cromlechs. He is also reminded of Balak's altars on finding cromlechs surrounding a large cairn on Mount Nebo. Two reports continuing his information on this subject arrived too late for the January number of the Quarterly Statement. Mr. Clermont Ganneau, the well-known archaeologist, has resumed his "Notes" for the Society, and discusses in this number various points of interest with his well-known learning. Another rock-cut passage has been found at the Pool of Siloam. There is a paper by Mr. St. Chad Boscawen on the Phœnician Funeral Tablet, of which a sketch has already been given by Lieutenant Conder, and there are papers of controversy on topographical points. The Committee make an appeal for assistance in their work.

Our Contemporaries.

THE WORSHIP OF HUMANITY.

The Spectator, in an article on the Positivist Service reported in our last number, writes:—

The outside world probably reads the accounts which appear from time to time of the worship of the Positivists with ever increasing wonder and bewilderment. But then the outside world hardly understands the position of men who want, as the Positivists do, to give man not merely all the credit of his religion except the credit of discerning what is real, but, to make up for that little defect, the special credit of originality in having invented it. To most men it would seem rather a discredit than a credit that man should have made himself believe in an infinite God, if that God did not exist, and in an eternal life which, for individuals at least, had turned out to be a pure fable. Not so with the Positivists. They are delighted that man has shown so great a scope of imagination, and they are prepared to assert that though the Infinite Being outside man is nothing in the world, the idea is a noble one, being but the ideal shadow, as it were, of the great race whose common and progressive life Positivists make so much ado about under the name of Humanity; and that the supposed deathlessness of the spiritualised individual is an egotised, but for that reason only a more popular, version of the unity and perfectibility of a spiritualised race. In other words, they claim for the religions of the past that they have but gone astray in their object. Most of the language applied to God might have been, they think, not inappropriately applied to man, if the whole range of man's existence had been taken in; and the language applied to man's personal immortality might not inappropriately have been applied to the posthumous existence of the dead in the living, and of the living in their posterity. And then with those little rectifications, the whole language of adoration and hope would have been justified. So that, in point of fact, in the opinion of Positivists, the religions of the world have not been so wrong as they seemed; they have only lavished on imaginary objects, a sort of emotion appropriate enough to real objects, though real objects more or less hidden from view,—observed for us, not from being too far off, but from being too near. What the Positivists think, as we understand them, is that men would not have invented for a non-existent Being the kind of attributes with which they clothed the Deity, or the kind of hopes with which they contemplated their own existence beyond the grave, if there had not been something in man of kinship with these attributes, and of a character to justify these hopes; and they claim, by directing our minds to the aspects of human nature in which they see this kinship, at once to free the language of religion from superstition, and to concentrate it on what they regard as its true purpose, the further purification and idealisation of our actual life. They believe that human life without the dream of a God may sink into something very gross indeed, unless Positivists contrive to make men see in human life itself that which so riveted their thoughts on God; that human life with an absolute finish in the grave may prove very dreary indeed, unless they can make men see in the consequences of their actions, a prospect almost as delightful as the prospect of a constantly deepening and growing personality; and, therefore, they exercise all the skill they can in trying to charm us into the belief that Humanity is God enough for us all, and that posthumous life is immortality enough for us all.

On the whole, we should say that Positivism shows how strong the yearning for unreal worship is in those who cannot believe enough to justify a real worship. The Positivists go to the utmost verge of the language appropriate to faith in immortality, while openly rejecting it as a selfish dream; and they do this apparently because they admire the enthusiasm of religious meditation too much to be willing to let any of it go, even after its significance is lost. And so, too, they go to the utmost verge of language only appropriate to faith in God, while rejecting the belief in God as superstitious, and just for the same reason as before—that they cannot bear to drop the grand, idealising language which is so fascinating to the imagination, even after they have rejected the faith which made that language reasonable. Surely they should have more of the courage of their opinions. If their view be true, good and bad make up their "grand-êtré," and good and bad live the same posthumous life; and they may just as fitly curse man in the name of what is evil in humanity, and he will be cursed with it, whether they utter the curse or not, if there be no God to shield him from the curse and to turn it into a blessing—as invoke blessings on him in a caricature of Christian benediction, and pray to him in a parody of Christian trust.

A MOORISH MESSIAH.

The Spectator writes:—One of the most striking signs of the deep unrest within the Mahommedan world, an unrest visible in the Panislamic movement, the insurrection throughout North Africa, and the important though badly reported struggles for power in Mecca and the Syrian Desert, is the increased expectation of the immediate arrivals of the Mehdi. All good Mussulmans of all sects, whether orthodox or heretical, believe that in the dark hour of Islam God will send down a Mehdi, or Teacher, whom Mahommed himself foresaw, and who he prophesied should be an Arab of the clan Koreish, and a descendant of his own house. He will restore Islam, reunite the Faithful, and either become Khalif, or for a time supersede him, as ruler of the Mahommedans throughout the world. Usually the belief is of no more importance than the belief of some Christians in the coming of the Millennium; but of late it has taken a stronger hold of the general Mussulman mind, has become a dogma instead of a recognised idea, crops up in many places at once, and most seriously disturbs the old-established Mahommedan Governments, whose rulers are well aware that the moral basis of their authority would be wholly destroyed by the appearance of such a pretender. It is so general in Arabia and Syria that the Turks watch the family at Mecca from which the Mehdi should come with an intentness that has already produced tragical results, and might any day produce a massacre. It is the evident belief of Mr. Blunt, the Arabian traveller, that the next aspirant for power in that region will call himself El Mehdi, the teacher who is expected, and that if he appears and wins the smallest skirmish, half Arabia will flock to his standard. In Egypt the followers of Colonel Arabi are said to be earnestly watching for the promised deliverer; while in Tripoli a correspondent of the Times, evidently possessed of unusual information, declares that El Mehdi, the sacrosanct head of the Senoussia community, which has monasteries by the hundred in North Africa, and even in Arabia and Syria, and is obeyed by Mahommedan tribes of the desert whose very names are unknown to Europeans, claims to be the long-expected Teacher, and promises to proclaim himself openly to the world on November 12, 1882. A prophecy to that effect has been carefully circulated for some years through the Moorish-Mussulman world, and is thoroughly known all through the South Mediterranean, from Aleppo to Mogador. It is believed to have been drawn up by Senoussi, the Algerine Moor—a Shereef, we believe, or descendant of the Prophet, though we are not quite certain—who, in 1850, founded the great organisation which now disputes with the Turks the sovereignty of Southern Tripoli, and which, the correspondent says, supplies the material resources for the resistance offered by the Tunisian tribes to the French invasion. The prophecy is couched in these words:—"On the first of the month of Moharram, in the year 1300 (12th November, 1882), will appear the El Mehdi, or Messiah. He will be exactly forty years of age, and of noble bearing. One arm will be longer than the other; his father's name will be Muhammed, his mother's Fatima, and he will be hidden for a time prior to his manifestation." El Mehdi has the physical peculiarity referred to, his right arm reaching to his knee, and he has for four years been hidden from all eyes in religious retreat.

Prophecies of this kind, circulating among a people always ready to believe, and just now excited alike by European pressure, by the Sultan's missionaries, who are preaching the unity of Mahommedans everywhere, and by a wave of religious revival, will be very apt to produce their own fulfilment. There was no doubt among those who carefully examined the great movement called the Indian Mutiny that the uprising, though not caused by the prophecy that the East India Company should cease to reign in one hundred and one years from Plassey—a prophecy curiously fulfilled—was accelerated by it, and owed to it much of its temporary success. The family and tribal jealousies which are so strong in Mecca may prove obstacles to a Moorish claim; but Islam is essentially democratic, a wave of popular feeling may prove irresistible, and we think it quite reasonable to expect that a Mehdi will appear, and that his first habitat will be North Africa, where the tribes are all of one faith and language, all martial, all expectant, and where, but for the French soldiers, any considerable Mussulman leader would have no difficulty whatever in setting up an Arab Empire, reigning from the Atlantic to the Euphrates. If he has but rifles for his Arabs there is nothing whatever, except Europe, to stop his career. There is no force not European in existence which could arrest the tribes, for the Ottomans are powerless in the Desert; the clan itself has been wasted by the wars of a half-century, and the ordinary Mussulmans of Turkey would probably accept the Mehdi, or at least fight against him with half-hearts.

LIVERPOOL HOSPITAL SUNDAY.—Last Sunday was Hospital Sunday in Liverpool. At Renshaw-street Chapel the Rev. C. Beard preached a special sermon in the forenoon from the words in St. Matthew vii. 12:—"Therefore, all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them; for this is the law and the prophets." The discourse is reported at length in the Daily Post of Monday. As in previous years, the collection at Renshaw-street Chapel heads the list, the amount being £493 5s. 2d. At Hope-street Church the amount was £710s. 6½d.

THE PRESBYTERY OF EDINBURGH AND SUNDAY EVENING LECTURES.—A pro re nata meeting of the Established Presbytery of Edinburgh was held on Friday week, in compliance with a requisition to the Moderator, Mr. Norman McLeod, to consider an advertisement which appeared in the Edinburgh papers on the previous Saturday, of a course of lectures to be delivered in the parish church of Old Greyfriars. The advertisement referred to was as follows:—"Greyfriars Lectures.—Free lectures will be delivered in Old Greyfriars Church on the following Sunday evenings, at half-past six o'clock. Jan. 8, 'Charles Dickens as a preacher of Christianity,' by the Rev. David Macrae, Dundee. January 15, 'Three-quarters of a century,' an historical and literary review, by Professor Nichol, LL.D., Glasgow. January 22, 'Catholic Reformers of the 16th Century,' by the Rev. Archibald Bisset, M.A., Ratho. January 29, 'The Early Struggle of Science,' by Dr. Andrew Wilson, F.R.S., &c., Edinburgh. February 5, 'The Reformers and the Bible,' by the Rev. W. L. McFarlan, Lenzie. Feb. 12, 'The True and False in History,' by John Campbell Smith, Esq., Advocate, Edinburgh. February 19, 'Revivals,' by the Rev. Alex. Webster, M.A., Edinburgh. February 26, 'Mohammed,' by David Brand, Esq., Advocate, Edinburgh. March 5, 'Spinoza,' by the Rev. John Glassey, M.A. Edinburgh. Collections to defray expenses." The proceedings of the Presbytery were conducted in private, but after a discussion of three hours and a half Mr. Langwill, the Clerk communicated the result of the meeting as follows:—"Mr. Kennedy, seconded by Mr. A. Webster, moved "That the Presbytery having heard from Mr. Glassey that he is willing to withdraw from his course of lectures those under the names of the laymen, express their satisfaction with the same, and find no cause for further interference." Dr. Lees, seconded by Mr. Macgregor, moved, "That the Presbytery, having considered the advertisement which appeared in the Edinburgh newspapers on Saturday last, of a course of lectures to be delivered at the Parish Church of Old Greyfriars, on the evenings of Sundays, at half-past six o'clock, at which hour the regular service of the church falls to be held, and having heard explanations from the minister of Old Greyfriars, are of opinion that the proposed course of lectures ought not to be proceeded with; that this finding be intimated to the minister of Old Greyfriars, and that he be inhibited from allowing this course of lectures to be delivered in his church as advertised." Dr. Phin, seconded by Mr. Jamieson, moved that "The Presbytery having learned that arrangements have been made for the delivery of certain lectures by persons who are not licentiates of this Church in the Parish Church of Old Greyfriars, on the 8th, 15th, and 29th inst., and on the 12th and 26th prox., as advertised in the Edinburgh Courier on the 30th ult., prohibit the delivery of the said lectures on the Lord's Day, specified in the advertisement, and enjoin the ministers and Kirk Session of Old Greyfriars to give effect to this prohibition." A vote was taken between the motions of Mr. Kennedy and Dr. Lees, when there voted for Mr. Kennedy four, and for Dr. Lees, nineteen. Dr. Lees's motion was then put against Dr. Phin's, with the result that fourteen members voted for each, and the Moderator gave his vote in favour of the motion of Dr. Lees. This motion then became the judgment of the Presbytery. Mr. Glassey, Mr. Kennedy, and Mr. A. Webster dissented and appealed to the Senate

JOSEPH SMITH, THE MORMON PROPHET.—I.

BY THE HON. JOSIAH QUINCY.

It is by no means improbable that some future text-book, for the use of generations yet unborn, will contain a question something like this:—What historical American of the nineteenth century has exerted the most powerful influence upon the destinies of his countrymen? And it is by no means impossible that the answer to that interrogatory may be thus written:—Joseph Smith, the Mormon Prophet. And the reply, absurd as it, doubtless, seems to most men now living, may be an obvious commonplace to their descendants. History deals in surprises and paradoxes quite as startling as this. The man who established a religion in this age of free debate, who was and is to-day accepted by hundreds of thousands as a direct emissary from the Most High—such a rare human being is not to be disposed of by pelting his memory with unsavory epithets. Fanatic, impostor, charlatan he may have been; but these hard names furnish no solution to the problem he presents to us. Fanatics and impostors are living and dying every day, and their memory is buried with them; but the wonderful influence which this founder of a religion exerted and still exerts throws him into relief before us not as a rogue to be criminated, but as a phenomenon to be explained. The most vital questions Americans are asking each other to-day have to do with this man and what he has left us. Is there any remedy heroic enough to meet the case, yet in accordance with our national doctrines of liberty and toleration, which can be applied to the demoralising doctrines now advanced by the sect which he created? The possibilities of the Mormon system are unfathomable. Polygamy may be followed by still darker "revelations." Here is a society resting upon foundations which may at any moment be made subversive of every duty which we claim from the citizen. Must it be reached by that last argument which quenched the evil fanaticisms of Mulhausen and Munster? A generation other than mine must deal with these questions. Burning questions they are, which must give a prominent place in the history of the country to that sturdy self-asserter whom I visited at Nauvoo. Joseph Smith, claiming to be an inspired teacher, faced adversity such as few men have been called to meet, enjoyed a brief season of prosperity such as few men have ever attained, and finally, forty-three days after I saw him, went cheerfully to a martyr's death. When he surrendered his person to Governor Ford, in order to prevent the shedding of blood, the prophet had a presentiment of what was before him. "I am going like a lamb to the slaughter," he is reported to have said; "but I am as calm as a summer's morning. I have a conscience void of offence and shall die innocent." I have no theory to advance respecting this extraordinary man. I shall simply give the facts of my intercourse with him. At some future time they may be found to have some bearing upon the theories of others who are more competent to make them. Ten closely-written pages of my journal describe my impressions of Nauvoo, and of its prophet, mayor, general, and judge; but details, necessarily omitted in the diary, went into letters addressed to friends at home, and I shall use both these sources to make my narrative as complete as possible. I happened to visit Joseph Smith in company with a distinguished gentleman, who, if rumor may be trusted, has been as conscientious a journal-writer as was his father. It is not impossible that my record may one day be supplemented by that of my fellow-traveller, the Hon. Charles Francis Adams.

It was on the 25th of April, 1844, that Mr. Adams and myself left Boston for the journey to the West which we had had for some time in contemplation. I omit all account of our adventures—and a very full account of them is before me—until the 14th of May, when we are ascending the clear, sparkling waters of the Upper Mississippi in the little steamboat Amaranth. With one exception, we find our fellow-passengers uninteresting. The exception is Dr. Goforth. A chivalric, yet simple personage is this same doctor, who has served under General Jackson at the battle of New Orleans and is now going to Nauvoo to promote the election of the just nominated Henry Clay. It is to this gentleman we owe our sight of the City of the Saints, which, strangely enough, we had not intended to visit. Though far from being a Mormon himself, Dr. Goforth told us much that was good and interesting about this strange people. He urged us to see for ourselves the result of the singular political system which had been fastened upon Christianity, and to make the acquaintance of his friend, General Smith, the religious and civil autocrat of the community. "We agreed to stop at Nauvoo," says my journal, "provided some conveyance should be found at the landing which would take us up to General Smith's tavern, and prepared our baggage for this contingency. Owing to various delays, we did not reach the landing till nearly midnight, when our friend, who had jumped on shore the moment the boat stopped, returned with the intelligence that no carriage was to be had, and so we bade him adieu, to go on our way. But, as we still lingered upon the hurricane deck, he shouted that there was a house on the landing, where we could get a good bed. This changed our destiny, and just at the last moment we hurried on shore. Here we found that the 'good bed' our friend had promised us was in an old mill, which had been converted into an Irish shanty. However, we made the best of it, and, having dispossessed a cat and a small army of cockroaches of their quarters on the coverlet, we lay down in our dressing-gowns and were soon asleep."

We left our lowly bed in the grey light of the morning to find the rain descending in torrents and the roads knee-deep in mud. Intelligence of our arrival had in some mysterious manner reached General Smith, and the prophet's own chariot, a comfortable carryall, drawn by two horses, soon made its appearance. It is probable that we owed the alacrity with which we were served to an odd blunder which had combined our names and personalities and set forth that no less a man than ex-President John Quincy Adams had arrived to visit Mr. Joseph Smith. Happily, however, Dr. Goforth, who had got upon the road before us, divided our persons and reduced them to their proper proportions, so that no trace of disappointment was visible in the group of rough-looking Mormons who awaited our descent at the door of the tavern. It was a three-story frame house, set back from the street and surrounded by a white fence, that we had reached after about two miles of the muddiest driving. Pre-eminent among the stragglers by the door stood a man of commanding appearance, clad in the costume of a journeyman carpenter when about his work. He was a hearty, athletic fellow, with blue eyes, standing prominently out upon his light complexion, a long nose, and a retreating forehead. He wore striped pantaloons, a linen jacket, which had not lately seen the wash-tub, and a beard of some three days' growth. This was the founder of the religion which had been preached in every quarter of the earth. As Dr. Goforth introduced us to the prophet he mentioned the parentage of my companion. "God bless you, to begin with!" said Joseph Smith, raising his hands in the air and letting them descend upon the shoulders of Mr. Adams. The benediction, though evidently sincere, had an odd savour of what may be called official familiarity, such as a crowned head might adopt on receiving the heir presumptive of a friendly court. The greeting to me was cordial—with that sort of cordiality with which the president of a college might welcome a deserving janitor—and a blessing formed no part of it. "And now come, both of you, into the house!" said our host, as, suiting the action to the word, he ushered us across the threshold of his tavern.

A fine-looking man is what the passer-by would instinctively have murmured upon meeting the remarkable individual who had fashioned the mould which was to shape the feelings of so many thousands of his fellow-mortals. But Smith was more than this, and one could not resist the impression that capacity and resource were natural to his stalwart person. I have already mentioned the resemblance he bore to Elisha D. Potter, of Rhode Island, whom I met in Washington in 1826. The likeness was not such as would be recognised in a picture, but rather one that would be felt in a grave emergency. Of all men I have met these two seemed best endowed with that kingly faculty which directs, as by intrinsic right, the feeble or confused souls who are looking for guidance. This it is just to say with emphasis; for the reader will find so much that is puerile and even shocking in my report of the prophet's conversation that he might never suspect the impression of rugged power that was given by the man.

On the right hand, as we entered the house, was a small and very comfortless-looking bar-room; all the more comfortless, perchance, from its being a dry bar-room, as no spirituous liquors were permitted at Nauvoo. In apparent search for more private quarters the prophet opened the door of a room on the left. He instantly shut it again, but not before I perceived that the obstacle to our entrance was its prior occupancy by a woman, in bed.

He then ran upstairs, calling upon us to follow him, and, throwing open a door in the second story, disclosed three Mormons in three beds. This was not satisfactory; neither was the next chamber, which was found, on inspection, to contain two sleeping disciples. The third attempt was somewhat more fortunate, for we had found a room which held but a single bed and a single sleeper. Into this apartment we were invited to enter. Our host immediately proceeded to the bed, and drew the clothes well over the head of its occupant. He then called a man to make a fire, and begged us to sit down. Smith then began to talk about himself and his people, as, of course, we encouraged him to do. He addressed his words to Mr. Adams oftener than to me, evidently thinking that this gentleman had, or was likely to have, political influence, which it was desirable to conciliate. Whether by subtle tact or happy accident, he introduced us to Mormonism as a secular institution before stating its monstrous claims as a religious system. Polygamy, it must be remembered, formed no part of the alleged revelations upon which the social life at Nauvoo was based; indeed, the recorded precepts of its prophet were utterly opposed to such a practice. And it is at least doubtful whether this barbarism was in any way sanctioned by Smith. Let a man who has so much to answer for be allowed the full benefit of the doubt; and Mormonism, minus the spiritual wife system, had, as it has to-day, much that was interesting in its secular aspects. Its founder told us what he had accomplished and the terrible persecutions through which he had brought his people. He spoke with bitterness of outrages to which they had been subjected in Missouri, and implied that the wanton barbarities of his lawless enemies must one day be atoned for. He spoke of the industrial results of his autocracy in the holy city we were visiting, and of the extraordinary powers of its charter, obtained through his friend Governor Ford. The past had shown him that a military organisation was necessary. He was now at the head of three thousand men, equipped by the State of Illinois and belonging to its militia, and the Saints were prepared to fight, as well as to work. "I decided," said Smith, "that the commander of my troops ought to be a lieutenant-general, and I was, of course, chosen to that position. I sent my certificate of election to Governor Ford, and received in return a commission of lieutenant-general of the Nauvoo Legion and of the militia of the State of Illinois. Now, on examining the Constitution of the United States, I find that an officer must be tried by a court-martial composed of his equals in rank; and as I am the only lieutenant-general in the country, I think they find it pretty hard to try me."

At this point breakfast was announced, and a substantial meal was served in a long back kitchen. We sat down with about thirty persons, some of them being in their shirt-sleeves, as if just come from work. There was no going out, as the rain still fell in torrents; and so, when we had finished breakfast, the prophet (who had exchanged his working dress for a broadcloth suit while we lingered at the table) proposed to return to the chamber we had quitted, where he would give us his views of theology. The bed had been made during our absence and the fire plentifully replenished. Our party was now increased by the presence of the patriarch, Hiram Smith; Dr. Richards, of Philadelphia, who seemed to be a very modest and respectable Mormon; Dr. Goforth, and a Methodist minister, whose name I have not preserved. No sooner were we seated than there entered some half-dozen leaders of the sect, among whom, I think, were Rigdon and Young; but of their presence I cannot be positive. These men constituted a sort of silent chorus during the expositions of their chief. They fixed a searching, yet furtive gaze upon Mr. Adams and myself, as if eager to discover how we were impressed by what we heard. Of the wild talk that we listened to I have preserved but a few fragments. Smith was well versed in the letter of the Scriptures, though he had little comprehension of their spirit. He began by denying the doctrine of the Trinity, and supported his views by the glib recitation of a number of texts. From this he passed to his own claims to special inspiration, quoting with great emphasis the eleventh and twelfth verses of the fourth chapter of Ephesians, which, in his eyes, adumbrated the whole Mormon hierarchy. The degrees and orders of ecclesiastical dignitaries he set forth with great precision, being careful to mention the interesting revelation which placed Joseph Smith supreme above them all. This information was plentifully besprinkled with cant phrases or homely proverbs. "There, I have proved that point as straight as a loon's leg." "The curses of my enemies run off from me like water from a duck's back." Such are the specimens which my journal happens to preserve, but the exposition was constantly garnished with forcible vulgarisms of a similar sort. The prophet referred to his miraculous gift of understanding all languages, and took down a Bible in various tongues, for the purpose of exhibiting his accomplishments in this particular. Our position as guests prevented our testing his powers by a rigid examination, and the rendering of a few familiar texts seemed to be accepted by his followers as a triumphant demonstration of his abilities. It may have been an accident, but I observed that the bulk of his translations were from the Hebrew, which, presumably, his visitors did not understand, rather than from the classical languages, in which they might more easily have caught him tripping.

"And now come with me," said the prophet, "and I will show you the curiosities." So saying, he led the way to a lower room, where sat a venerable and respectable-looking lady. "This is my mother, gentlemen. The curiosities we shall see belong to her. They were purchased with her own money, at a cost of six thousand dollars," and then, with deep feeling, were added the words, "and that woman was turned out upon the prairie in the dead of night by a mob." There were some pine presses fixed against the wall of the room. These receptacles Smith opened, and disclosed four human bodies, shrunken and black with age. "These are mummies," said the exhibitor. "I want you to look at that little runt of a fellow over there. He was a great man in his day. Why, that was Pharaoh Necho, King of Egypt!" Some parchments inscribed with hieroglyphics were then offered us. They were preserved under glass and handled with great respect. "That is the handwriting of Abraham, the Father of the Faithful," said the prophet. "This is the autograph of Moses, and these lines were written by his brother Aaron. Here we have the earliest account of the Creation, from which Moses composed the First Book of Genesis." The parchment last referred to showed a rude drawing of a man and woman, and a serpent walking upon a pair of legs. I ventured to doubt the propriety of providing the reptile in question with this unusual means of locomotion. "Why, that's as plain as a pikestaff," was the rejoinder. "Before the Fall snakes always went about on legs, just like chickens. They were deprived of them, in punishment for their agency in the ruin of man." We were further assured that the prophet was the only mortal who could translate these mysterious writings, and that his power was given by direct inspiration.

It is well known that Joseph Smith was accustomed to make his revelations point to those sturdy business habits which lead to prosperity in this present life. He had little enough of that unmixt spiritual power which flashed out from the spare, neurasthenic body of Andrew Jackson. The prophet's hold upon you seemed to come from the balance and harmony of temperament which reposes upon a large physical basis. No association with the sacred phrases of Scripture could keep the inspirations of this man from getting down upon the hard pan of practical affairs. "Verily I say unto you, let my servant, Sidney Gilbert, plant himself in this place and establish a store." So had run one of his revelations, in which no holier spirit than that of commerce is discernible. The exhibition of these august relics concluded with a similar descent into the hard modern world of fact. Monarchs, patriarchs, and parchments were very well in their way; but this was clearly the nineteenth century, when prophets must get a living and provide for their relations. "Gentlemen," said this bourgeois Mohammed, as he closed the cabinets, "those who see these curiosities generally pay my mother a quarter of a dollar."

THE LONDON SCHOOL BOARD reassembled on Thursday, after their Christmas recess. The greater portion of a several hours' sitting was occupied by a debate on the Industrial Schools scandal. The Home Secretary has sent a letter stating that the Public Prosecutor had decided that the evidence with regard to the St. Paul's Industrial School would not support a criminal prosecution. Several motions were unsuccessfully made as to what reply should be sent to the Home Secretary. The result was a resolution to simply acknowledge the receipt of the letter. Mr. H. Gower submitted a motion instructing the special committee on the subject to continue the inquiry. This proposition was agreed to, so that the inquiry is to be resumed by the special committee.

Correspondence.

THE COMING CONFERENCE.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—I imagine it is now impossible to alter the place for the meeting of the Conference to which many of us are looking forward with so much interest. The Committee have doubtless considered this matter very thoroughly, and have for certain weighty reasons decided on Liverpool as, on the whole, the best place. Now it remains to us to make up our minds to all go to Liverpool. One of your correspondents of Jan. 7 says that few, if any, of the London and South country ministers and laymen can be expected to go so far north as Liverpool.

Now, Sir, my hope is that every Unitarian and Free Christian minister will be at Liverpool, and further, that every congregation will be represented by one or two delegates chosen by the vote of each congregation. Now how is this to be managed? Certainly not without expense. But I imagine that the Committee are prepared to bear expense in this matter. My hope is that the Committee will say to every minister, "We will give you a railway ticket to Liverpool and back, and we will either find you accommodation in the house of a friend, or else pay you a certain sum for hotel expenses." I feel sure that nothing short of this will meet the case for many of us country ministers. Then we must not merely have a Conference of ministers, we want representative laymen from all our churches. Here, again, my hope is that the Committee will say, "We will provide hospitably for one or two delegates from every church, i.e., if the delegates are bona fide delegates elected by the vote of each congregation, and we will also give you railway tickets." Of course, many ministers and laymen will prefer to pay their own expenses, but some of us cannot possibly do it. Whatever place is chosen for the Conference, whether Birmingham, Nottingham, London, or Liverpool, there must needs be some churches far removed from it, and in many, if not most, of such cases nothing but the most liberal arrangements on the part of the Committee will meet the difficulty. Of course the whole difficulty is solved if each congregation will undertake to pay the expenses of its minister and delegates; but who is to know whether this is being done or not unless the Committee take the matter up?

I am most anxious that this Conference should be thoroughly representative, and therefore urge these views upon the Committee and upon our friends generally. A COUNTRY PARSON.

THE IRISH QUESTION.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—Your readers are much indebted to you for informing them that Mr. Joseph Chamberlain had written a defence of the Government's Irish coercive policy. As you did not copy that excellent defence, and as some of your readers may not have been so fortunate as myself, I hasten to inform them of my good luck. I found it in this month's number of the Truthseeker, safely sandwiched between two letters of Mr. J. P. Hopps's on the same subject, the whole headed "The Policy of Repression in Ireland." Mr. J. P. Hopps had the first and the last word, Mr. Chamberlain, between the two, being rather "shut up." Indeed, but for your friendly intimation I fear he would have been altogether "nowhere." Mr. Hopps asks several questions, and instead of waiting for a reply, answers them himself. He evidently thinks he knows more of the state of Ireland than Mr. Chamberlain (and the whole Government), and yet expresses his "profound esteem" and "humble allegiance" to his right hon. correspondent.

How is it, I am led to ask, in the name of common sense, policy, and prudence, that Liberals like Mr. Hopps cannot trust their chosen leaders to know and to act more wisely than themselves? Any one living in Ireland and unwarped by party prejudice or self-interest acknowledges the necessity of the coercive measures recently enforced. If in error at all, the Government erred on the side of liberty, which had grown into license, and would, but for their interference, have ended in anarchy.

The Land League, in the abstract, might be innocent, justifiable, and useful, but, in the concrete, it was allied with robbers, ruffians, and murderers. Abstractions may suit and satisfy the orator on the platform, but Government must grapple with realities. Whatever exaggerations there may have been the cases of undoubted cruelty and crime were numberless. Take this one of a mild type—within my own personal knowledge:—

"The Rev. G. Webster, D.D., rector of St. Nicholas Church, City of Cork, a clergyman of liberal politics, great energy, and practical philanthropy, had accepted a donation of £500 from Mr. Bence Jones (who had been boycotted on his estate, county Cork, and had taken refuge in England) towards building a boarding-house for the students of the Queen's College, Cork. Mr. Jones, finding he could get the woodwork, &c., much better and cheaper in England than in Ireland, sent over, per Wave, a cargo of doors, window-sashes, &c., to Cork, consigning it to Dr. Webster. No sooner did this arrival become known than, at a meeting of the Cork branch of the Land League, Dr. Webster was denounced and threatened, and the captain of the Wave was warned that he would be shot if he discharged his cargo. The vessel lay several weeks in the river, no one daring to defy the threats of the Land League. At last orders came down from Dublin that the vessel, under strong military guard, should be unloaded. The Rev. Dr. Webster was so harassed and insulted by mobs, and his life so repeatedly threatened that he had to be guarded day and night by policemen. He then was obliged to go, broken in health, to England, whence he has only just returned, to find the streets of Cork clean swept of the liberty (!) loving Land Leaguers by the beneficent besom of Coercion."

CANDID CONFESSIONS.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—I copied the paragraph below from the first number of the Christian Commonwealth of Oct. 20, 1881, under the head of "Pen and Scissors:—"

"A CANDID CONFESSION FROM AN UNEXPECTED SOURCE.—As a striking evidence that a decided reaction is now going on from Latitudinarianism, we may state that, a few evenings since, we had a long conversation with a distinguished Unitarian minister, who is well known both in England and America [W. H. Channing?]. We found him thoroughly tired and sick of the Radicalism which has been rapidly absorbing the Unitarian ranks. He declared to us, with very great feeling, that there was 'no hope for the world except in the Christ, the blessed Son of God.' He spoke in the tenderest manner of the devoted Christian life of the late President Garfield, and declared that such a character was not possible except its foundation was the Christian faith. He told us he knew other men who had been even more radical than he had, who were abandoning their extreme views, and some of them stand now precisely where he does. Among these he mentioned the name of one of the most notorious of the Ultra-Unitarians in America."—[O. B. Frothingham?]

The whole paragraph is rather vague, and the writer seems to have taken advantage of a few good-natured liberal expressions about Orthodoxy.

THE DISESTABLISHMENT OF BELLS.—The law has in the matter of bells, less disregard for the nerves than regard for the privileges of religion. Secular bells of all kinds have one by one been disestablished in the metropolis. The muffin bell, together with all other noisy modes of advertising wares, has been in theory at least silenced. The call bell for ringing workmen up to time is prohibited like steam whistles and horns, used for the same purpose without the sanction of the sanitary authority. Musical hand-bells are liable to the same suppression as the street organ, the common enemy of all mankind who live above the basement floor. Church bells alone, except at one time the unorthodox bells of Roman Catholics, have been subjected to no statutory repression. Bells in their purely musical function may, if they pass the bounds of the definition of nuisance, be restrained by injunction, as happened in the well-known case of the Roman Catholic chapel at Clapham; but the passing bell, the funeral bell, and the bell for service are not only allowed, but enjoined by the Canons. Some repression on these most disturbing forms of ringing may fairly be asked. Passing bells may well be dispensed with altogether in towns; and funeral bells in the near neighbourhood of houses might, without impropriety, be required to be closely muffled. Better reminders of mortality are found nowadays in the first column of the daily newspaper than in the church steeple.—Law Journal.

Religious Intelligence.

HUNSLLET, NEAR LEEDS.—The Rev. M. S. Dunbar, M.A., has resigned the pulpit at this place.

CHELMSFORD.—On Sunday last the services were conducted by Mr. E. Lawrence, LL.B., who preached morning and evening on "The Lord's Prayer," and also addressed the scholars in the afternoon. The attendances were excellent, the evening congregation overflowing into the new annexe, and Mr. Lawrence's kindly persuasive manner has left a deep impression for good.

SAFFRON WALDEN.—On the 4th inst. the annual social meeting of the General Baptist congregation was held, when seventy persons sat down to tea. At the meeting afterwards Mr. Brinkworth traced the history of the church from its commencement by Mr. Metcalfe, when Mr. Catley came from London to preach there. Then it was that the movement was subsidised by Robert Cosens, head steward of the Audley End Estate, in 1711. For many years the churches of Melbourn and Fulbourne, in Cambridgeshire, with Saffron Walden, were under the pastoral care of the Rev. Joseph Eedes, succeeded by Mr. Thomas Barron, who was a medical man, and made a uniform charge of one penny to all who consulted him, and many persons derived very great benefit from his treatment. He was succeeded by the Rev. Stephen Philpot in 1791, the increase under whose ministry necessitated the erection of the present chapel, which was opened on August 5, 1792. The first text preached from was "Peace be within these walls." The funds were collected by Mr. Philpot, chiefly from the London, Kent, and Sussex Baptist Churches, Mr. Dan. Taylor, founder of the New Connexion, giving £6 7s. 6d. After Mr. Philpot's decease, in 1821, considerable trouble arose in connection with Mr. Cundrell, who was his successor. He was followed by the Rev. J. O. Squier, from Edinburgh, who was succeeded, in 1835, by the late Rev. John Marten, who continued pastor until the close of 1864. For some time past the friends have purposed to erect a tablet to the memory of this good man. It was deemed desirable to have two—one to the memory of the Rev. S. Philpot. These have been placed on the west wall of the chapel; they are of the finest statuary marble, on black marble base. The tender of Messrs. Dottridge Brothers, of London, was accepted. They were fixed in the chapel in December by that firm, who have executed the work entrusted to them in the best possible manner, giving great satisfaction. At this stage of the meeting Mr. Brinkworth unveiled them to the audience, who were delighted with these mementos to the memory of the good men. Mr. Marten was for many years managing director of the Gas Works. He established the second building society in this town, and was the leading spirit of the Temperance cause, frequently receiving his reward in stones, bats, and other débris thrown at him. Both men were well known, and, it may be remarked, that both came from Dover in the spring of the year. Mr. Philpot was pastor for thirty years, and Mr. Marten for twenty-nine years. Both died in the month of August. One is buried in the chapel-ground, the other in the cemetery. Other addresses followed, with singing, &c.; and this interesting ceremony was closed in this, one of the oldest Baptist causes in the East of England, where "the Gospel of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ must be preached twice every Lord's Day," any omission of this teaching forfeiting the whole of the property in six months.

GORTON: WELCOME TO THE REV. DENDY AGATE, B.A.—At a congregational meeting of the Brookfield School, held on Monday last, when three hundred and fifty persons were present, a cordial welcome was given to the new minister, Mr. Dendy Agate. Mr. R. Peacock, of Gorton-hall, who presided, traced the growth of the church and school, and alluded to the long connection of their late minister, the Rev. G. H. Wells, M.A., with the place, expressing the hope that their new minister would prove a worthy successor to him, and fulfil the high expectations they had formed respecting him. After reading a letter from Mr. Wells, he concluded by introducing the Rev. Dendy Agate to the congregation, stating that he would begin his ministry permanently on the 15th of the present month. The Rev. Dendy Agate, in reply, said he would try to deserve the very pleasing encomium which Mr. Peacock had pronounced upon him, and he thanked them for their kind reception. He had for four years been settled with a small and struggling congregation, and he had done his best among them; but he was glad, while yet a young man, of the opportunity of being engaged in work which would require him to put forth all his powers. A capital entertainment was then gone through, including selections by the handbell ringers, part songs by the choir, duets, solos, and a dramatic entertainment, including a scene from the "School for Scandal."

Obituary.

THE REV. J. WILSON, OF BIRMINGHAM.

Those who are interested in philanthropic work in Birmingham will hear with deep regret of the death of the Rev. J. Wilson, superintendent of the Church of the Messiah Ministry to the Poor, better known as the Lawrence-street Mission, which took place on Friday morning, the 6th inst., at his residence, in Great Brook-street. Mr. Wilson was fifty-six years of age, having been born at Liverpool in September 1825. Being possessed of an ardent temperament and benevolent disposition, he commenced to take a share in philanthropic work in his native town at the age of eighteen, applying himself specially to the advocacy of the temperance cause and to other questions, social, political, and charitable. For a number of years he was president of the Liverpool Co-operative Provident Association, and from 1854 till 1863 he was minister of the Liverpool Domestic Mission. In the last-named year he removed to Birmingham to take charge of the work in which thenceforth to the time of his death he so zealously and lovingly laboured. Those who are acquainted with Birmingham, especially as it was before the operations of the Health Committee of the Corporation began, know how sadly the poor people in the courts and alleys near Lawrence-street have needed every ameliorating influence which could be brought into operation on their behalf; and though the annual reports of the Mission have furnished statistical and descriptive information as to the work done, much of the good resulting from Mr. Wilson's residence and labour amongst them has been and must be unrecorded. Though labouring as an Unitarian minister, it was in no sectarian aspect that he was generally known. The chapel in which he preached was frequented by the poor of all denominations, as its pulpit, also, was often filled by ministers and laymen of other churches. The Sunday-schools were also carried on undenominationally, and under Mr. Wilson's superintendence were brought to a high degree of efficiency. There were scarcely any vacant places in them, the attendance averaging about 360 in the morning and 380 in the afternoon; and it is worthy of record that, poor as are most of the children attending them, their contributions on Hospital Sunday for the Children's Hospital have been amongst the largest of the school collections in the town. Very useful day schools were also carried on for many years, but about two years ago this part of the work was transferred to the School Board. To these more prominent features—the chapel and the schools—there were added the provision of dinners for poor children during the winter months, a temperance society and Band of Hope, a saving's club, a women's sewing class, and other agencies; while last, and perhaps most important of all, was the visitation of the sick poor. For a considerable time past Mr. Wilson has been in weak health, and has performed his labour of love under circumstances of considerable difficulty, but he was able to gather round him a circle of helpers, whom he imbued with a share of his own self-denying zeal, and by whose co-operation, and that of the members of his own family, he has been enabled, in laying down his work, to leave the institutions of the Mission in the highest state of efficiency. Mr. Wilson, as far as strength and leisure permitted him, took part in other work besides that directly connected with his ministerial charge, and at one time was chairman of the Duddeston Ward Liberal Committee. He leaves a wife and seven children, for whom general sympathy will be felt in the loss which they have sustained.

We may add that Mr. Wilson in 1852-3 was master of the boys' school at Spicer-street Domestic Mission, and gave his services as a volunteer teacher in the Sunday-school. In both capacities he obtained the confidence and esteem of the committee and his fellow-teachers.

The remains were interred on Wednesday at the Old Cemetery, Key Hill. In the morning a service was conducted in Lawrence-street Chapel by the Rev. H. W. Crosskey to a crowded congregation, consisting chiefly of the poor people of the district, among whom the deceased had laboured. In his address Mr. Crosskey referred to Mr. Wilson's long services as missionary in Birmingham and the large amount of good he had effected in reclaiming the people from vice, and the building up of the institutions associated with the chapel. He had also been very zealous in his visitations to the sick, although for a long time he had been very much afflicted himself. Mr. Wilson had drawn around him a band of faithful fellow-workers, who would no doubt continue to be animated by his spirit. A procession, consisting of the hearse, a large number of private carriages, the scholars of the Sunday-school, and a number of people attending the chapel, was then formed and proceeded to the cemetery, where the interment took place, in the presence of the Rev. H. W. Crosskey (who read a brief burial service), the Revs. B. Wright, J. B. Gardner, J. Allsopp, C. Clarke, Kentish Bache, J. Heape, Arthur O'Neill, W. Harrison (Glossop), W. Cochrane (Cradley), H. Eachus (Coseley), H. McKean (Oldbury), and F. Summers (London); Dr. Russell, Messrs. A. W. Wills, C. F. Osler, S. Greenway, H. Lakin, Smith, Timothy Kenrick, T. Gladstone, &c.

THE REV. WM. BENNETT, OF HEYWOOD.—We regret to record the death of the Rev. Wm. Bennett, which took place on Wednesday morning, at his residence, South View Terrace, Heywood, the immediate cause of death being inflammation of the lungs and gastric fever. Mr. Bennett in early life matriculated at the Glasgow University and afterwards engaged in the work of a schoolmaster. He and his brother Thomas established in St. Andrew's-square the first secular school in Scotland. In addition he assisted his brother Thomas in the literary work of the Dumbarton Herald, of which Thomas was the proprietor and editor. About the year 1869 he settled as Unitarian minister at Canterbury. Thence he removed to Aberdeen in 1872, where he became the minister in succession to the Rev. G. J. Slater. We find him in 1877 minister at Paisley, and thence he removed to Heywood in 1879, where he has faithfully pursued his ministerial work with much acceptance, endeavouring to give a practical turn to his parochial labours, seeking not only the culture of the intellect, but the heart. Gradually he was making his way to the respect of all parties in the town, and our friends feel that they have lost a good pastor. Being a strong vegetarian and teetotaler he diligently urged his views on these topics at every fitting opportunity. He has been a frequent poetical contributor to the columns of the Unitarian Herald and other periodicals. We regret to learn that Mr. Bennett leaves behind him a wife and four young children, the eldest of whom is only nine years of age.

MR. ARTHUR ATKINS, OF HINCKLEY.—We regret to record the decease of Mr. Arthur Atkins, which took place at his residence, Teign Bank House, Hinckley, on Thursday, the 5th inst. The deceased gentleman (a member of the firm of Atkins Bros., hosiery manufacturers, Hinckley and Leicester) was universally respected in the town of Hinckley, where he has, in conjunction with the other members of the firm, materially contributed to the increased importance of Hinckley as a manufacturing town. Sorrowful expressions of heartfelt regret were to be heard on all sides and from all classes when the sad news of his decease was made known in the town on Thursday evening. The shock to his family, friends, and the public was all the greater owing to the short illness which preceded his death. On the previous Thursday he had attended a meeting in one of the many public offices he was called to fill, and he was confined to his bed only for a few days afterwards. At the age of forty-three he has passed away, leaving a widow and eight young children in the deepest sorrow, which is shared by a large circle of friends and relations. A loving husband and an affectionate father, a kind friend and a benevolent benefactor to the town, have been lost in the decease of one who was so well known. He filled, amongst other public offices, that of Chairman of the Hinckley School Board, of which he has been a member since its formation in 1872. He was also a member of the Local Board, and one of the Governors of the Hinckley Grammar School. The interment took place last Monday. The universal respect with which the deceased gentleman was regarded was shown in a most remarkable and impressive manner. From the house to the cemetery the sad procession passed between unbroken lines of spectators of all classes and ages. The funeral arrangements were of the simplest possible kind. The coffin, without pall, and covered with beautiful flowers, was carried by workpeople. The respectable and sympathetic behaviour of the people as the mourners passed was very touching, indicating feelings very different from mere idle curiosity. At a short distance from the house the procession was joined by members of all the public bodies and most of the manufacturers of the town, and representatives of the clergy. The service in the chapel was conducted by the Rev. J. Page Hopps, of Leicester, who delivered an appropriate address.

MR. RICHARD HENRY DANA, the distinguished American jurist, author, and politician, died at Rome on the 6th inst., after a few days' illness, from pneumonia. Until within a few hours of the end his death was quite unlooked-for. Mr. Dana was in his sixty-seventh year. He was the son of the late Mr. R. H. Dana, the American essayist and poet, and was born at Cambridge, Massachusetts. Being obliged to leave Harvard College in 1834 on account of ill-health he undertook a voyage to California, which he described in his popular book "Two Years Before the Mast and Twenty Years After." Returning to college he studied law, and was admitted to the Boston Bar in 1840. He acquired a special reputation in maritime law after the publication, in 1841, of his "Seaman's Friends," known in England as "The Seaman's Manual," containing a dictionary of nautical terms. In 1833 he became a member of the Massachusetts Legislature. He was one of the founders of the "Free Soil Party," and took a prominent part in the Republican movement of 1856. At the trial of Jefferson Davis he represented the Government. He is the author of several important legal works, the best known of which is his copiously annotated edition of Wheaton's "International Law." One of the notes in this work, on the neutrality laws of Great Britain and the United States, was translated into French for the use of the arbitrators in Geneva in 1872. "To Cuba and Back: A Vacation Voyage," published in 1859, and a biography of Channing are among his contributions to lighter literature. He was named some time since for the post of minister of the United States in England, but the appointment was withdrawn on account of local opposition in his own country.

FALMOUTH.—On Saturday last an auction was held to sell some goods which had been seized by the County Court bailiff from the premises of Nathaniel Fox, a Quaker, who had been sued in the County Court by the Rev. John Wright, the rector of Falmouth, for arrears of rector's rates, and who had persistently refused to pay for conscientious reasons. Sewing machines, iron bedsteads, and other things were put up, and Mr. Fox, who was present, bid for the lot, and they were nearly all bought by him, the total amount realised being £23 12s., and as about £10 more is wanted to make up the sum required, another seizure and sale will take place. At the close of the sale a Mr. Lovell Squire, a Quaker, made a speech denouncing the proceedings, but everything passed off quietly.

A MIRACLE PLAY IN WORCESTERSHIRE.—The usually quiet village of Rouslench, near Pershore, Worcestershire, has, during the past week, been the scene of an extraordinary miracle play, which was suggested to the rector, the Rev. Mr. Chafey, by the Passion Play of Ober Ammergau. The interest in the play grew daily, and on Saturday last the reproduction was witnessed by a large number of people, most of whom had come considerable distances. In style the piece had been made to imitate as much as possible the great Passion Play, suitable scenery and gorgeous dresses having been obtained at great cost. The performance consisted of a series of tableaux vivants representing various events in the life of Christ. There were exactly fifty persons taking part in the performance, their ages ranging from four years to eighty-two years, the rector taking a leading character from time to time. An explanation was given of the successive tableaux, and selections of music were played during the performance from Elijah and the Messiah.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE.

ORIGINAL AND ONLY GENUINE.

COUGHS,
C COLDS,
A ASTHMA,
B BRONCHITIS.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE.—This wonderful remedy was discovered by Dr. J. COLLIS BROWNE, and the word CHLORODYNE coined by him expressly to designate it. There never has been a remedy so vastly beneficial to suffering humanity, and it is a subject of deep concern to the public that they should not be imposed upon by having imitations pressed upon them on account of cheapness, and as being the same thing. Dr. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE is a totally distinct thing from the spurious compounds called Chlorodyne, the use of which only ends in disappointment and failure.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE.—Vice-Chancellor Sir W. PAGE WOOD, STATED PUBLICLY in Court that Dr. J. COLLIS BROWNE was UNDOUBTEDLY the INVENTOR OF CHLORODYNE, that the whole story of the defendant was deliberately untrue, and he regretted to say it had been sworn to.—See The Times, July 13th, 1864.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE is a LIQUID MEDICINE which ASSUAGES PAIN OF EVERY KIND, affords a calm, refreshing sleep WITHOUT HEADACHE, and INVIGORATES the NERVOUS SYSTEM when exhausted.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE is the GREAT SPECIFIC FOR C CHOLERA, DYSENTERY,
D DIARRHŒA.

The GENERAL BOARD of HEALTH, London, REPORT that it ACTS as a CHARM, one dose generally sufficient.

Dr. GIBBON, Army Medical Staff, Calcutta, states: "TWO DOSES COMPLETELY CURED ME OF DIARRHŒA."

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE rapidly cuts short all attacks of EPILEPSY, SPASMS, COLIC.

PALPITATION, HYSTERIA.

COUGHS, COLDS, &c.

From W. VESALIUS PETTIGREW, M.D., formerly Lecturer at St. George's Hospital, LONDON.

"I have no hesitation in stating that I have never met with any medicine so efficacious as an Anti-Spasmotic and Sedative. I have used it in Consumption, Asthma, Diarrhœa, and other diseases, and am perfectly satisfied with the results."

From W. C. WILKINSON, Esq. F.R.C.S., Spalding.

"I consider it invaluable in Phthisis and Spasmodic Cough; the benefit is very marked indeed."

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE is the TRUE PALLIATIVE in N NEURALGIA, GOUT, CANCER,
T TOOTHACHE, RHEUMATISM.

From Dr. B. J. BOULTON and Co., Horncastle.

"We have made pretty extensive use of Chlorodyne in our practice lately, and look upon it as an excellent direct Sedative and Anti-Spasmotic. It seems to allay pain and irritation in whatever organ, and from whatever cause. It induces a feeling of comfort and quietude not obtainable by any other remedy, and it seems to possess this great advantage over all other Sedatives, that it leaves no unpleasant after effects."

IMPORTANT CAUTION.

The IMMENSE SALE of this REMEDY has given rise to many UNSCRUPULOUS IMITATIONS.

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS.—Enfeebled Existence.—This medicine embraces every attribute required in a general and domestic remedy. It overturns the foundations of disease laid by defective food and impure air. In obstructions or congestions of the liver, lungs, bowels, or any other organs, these Pills are especially serviceable, and eminently successful. They should be kept in readiness in every family, being a medicine of incomparable utility for young persons, especially those of feeble constitutions. They never cause pain or irritate the most sensitive nerves or most tender bowels. Holloway's Pills are the best known purifiers of the blood, the most active promoters of absorption and secretion, whereby all poisonous and obnoxious particles are removed from both solids and fluids.

ORTHODOX MYTHOLOGY.

LAST Sunday the Rev. W. PAGE ROBERTS, preaching at St. Peter's, Vere-street, alluded to the atrocities perpetrated in Russia upon the unfortunate Jews, and made reference to the great services rendered to the world by their ancestors. With many of his remarks all must agree, but the coarse way in which he treated the mythical Incarnation is really surprising. "Do these burning, ravaging Christians know that their Saviour, the God they worship, was a Jew?" exclaimed the preacher, quite unconscious of the gross absurdity, not to say indecency, of such an utterance. This mode of speaking is certainly quite in accordance with the Orthodox doctrine of the Trinity; but stating it in plain English is enough to make reverent minds revolt from it in disgust. The fact is, that the mythological matter with which Christianity was corrupted could not have retained its hold over civilised and intelligent people if its real character had not been partially concealed in old forms of words, which have acquired a sort of conventional mellowing, and which, instead of presenting well-defined pictures to the minds of worshippers, exhibit all objects in a haze of dim religious light. No cultivated Trinitarian in these days ventures to think out, still less to speak out, all the consequences of the theory he accepts. As soon as the subject looks awkward, or painful, it is dismissed to the limbo of what is called faith as a mystery. Nature is full of mysteries, why not religion? We admit mystery. There can be no religion, nor, indeed, any science without it; but Nature's mysteries are very different things from the artificial concoctions of the creed-making theologians. There is no occasion, in dealing with them, to employ only archaic words, or to shrink from penetrating into their spheres as far as a rational use of imagination will carry us. No fact or aspect in Nature is completely explained. The philosopher knows and feels that a mystery underlies the action of gravitation, and the various motions of matter which are believed to constitute light, heat, electricity, and magnetism. The mystery of Divine existence transcends all other mysteries; but unless it is contemplated through some distorting fog of superstition it cannot be made repulsive, or ridiculous, by the plainest statement concerning it we are able to make. Calling GOD a Jew is merely stating the meaning of the Christian mythos, as Orthodoxy usually shrinks from defining it; but it is, nevertheless, a true appellation if the theory be correct. The "perfect GOD" incarnate in the "perfect man," is the infinite shut up in the limited; and the logical absurdity of the hypothesis requires now, as of old, the peculiar justification of credo quia impossibile. Let Trinitarians think of Mr. PAGE ROBERTS's statement of their favourite doctrine, and try whether they can pretend it is wrong from the Orthodox point of view, or admitting, as they must, that it is right, ask themselves how it really looks.

In the Science of Religion the Christian Incarnation cannot be separated from other incarnations which preceded it; and it may be doubted whether we should ever have had the orthodox Trinity if there had not been previous triads, or the Orthodox doctrine of the Atonement, if there had not been previous identifications of the victim with the Deity to whom he was sacrificed.

It may also be observed that the complacent way in which ordinary Bible readers peruse the accounts of Jewish sacrifices, and their readiness to imagine they were anything better than very barbarous proceedings, arise from their not realising the facts which modern travellers relate concerning similar performances amongst the savages of our own time. In like manner, blind faith in the old legend of GOD walking in the Garden of Eden in the cool of the evening, dining with ABRAHAM off "a calf tender and good," and wrestling with JACOB, became intolerable when definitely appreciated, and supposed to be real history. Sir W. DRUMMOND had the courage to look at these stories and statements without any veil to tone them down. In the preface to his "Œdipus Judaicus," he made them unbelievable by putting them in plain English, and then expressed his own opinion thus:—"My notions of the Divine Nature may be heterodox, but they do not permit me to attribute human infirmities to GOD. I cannot suppose the Deity first creating our little earth, and then fretting because he had done so. I cannot ascribe to him all the scolding and cursing about idolatry; all the squabbling about capricious laws; and all that prattling and gossiping about insignificant rites and ceremonies which so frequently occur in the Jewish legends. I cannot allow myself to imagine that the Sacred Writers were speaking literally when they talked of these things; and I feel myself compelled rather to consider their writings as impositions on the credulity of mankind, or to believe that they are chiefly, if not entirely, allegorical compositions. In the 'Œdipus Judaicus' it will be found that I have adopted the latter opinion." Sir WILLIAM's explanations were astronomical, and connected with what we now call "Nature Myths." No scholar of the present day would resort to anything like the same extent to this theory; the history of the Bible shows that it must no longer be regarded as an inspired book, but as many books, belonging to various times, and exhibiting early and barbaric notions, as well as highly-developed thoughts. What Professor ESTLIN CARPENTER says in his discourse, in the eighth of the "Ten Lectures on the Positive Aspects of Unitarian Christianity" represents the opinions that will become general in proportion as men can be induced to think. "The Bible, in every pulpit, in every home, serves as an outward symbol of the spiritual unity of Christendom. Its science has, indeed, been laid aside; the telescope has seen beyond the limits of the Cosmos; the physiologist has disposed of its theories of possession. The beginnings of its history have been rewritten; Eden has become a cave dwelling; the Fall is turned into the rise of man; the curse of toil translated into the blessing of civilisation. But its heaven of inward peace has not vanished with the melting of the firmament into space; the soul is still conscious of sorrow and joy, of victory and defeat beneath the Divine eye, though the evil spirits have been for ever put to flight."

M. RENAN'S CHILDHOOD AND YOUTH.

M. RENAN has just published in the Revue des Deux Mondes (the fourth of his autobiographical sketches which have appeared under the above title. The present paper treats of his connection with the celebrated Catholic institution of Saint Sulpice, and more particularly of his life at Issy, a branch establishment of that seminary. It is needless to say that there is no lack of the old charm, either as regards freshness of thought, keenness of observation, or that perfection of form in which the highest class of French writers stand pre-eminent in the literature of the world. Perhaps the chief characteristic of this sketch is the author's tender pathos, his grateful love of his old masters, and his extreme anxiety to do ample justice to their position, though he was himself driven far away from the Eden of happy innocence in which he pictures them as dwelling. Side by side with these literary and moral merits there is a free expression of opinion as to personal merit and capacity which, if judged exclusively from an English stand-point, might be regarded as bordering on egotism or personal vanity. This is specially noticeable in a passage which refers to COMTE and the Positive Philosophy, and also in another where the author says, "that if he had broken from ecclesiastical influences before entering upon his theological course, his extreme ardour in the study of the vital sciences would have led him to several of the important results attained to by Mr. DARWIN, which he even then dimly foresaw" (entrevoiyais). The fact is, indeed, autobiography is an easier thing for a Frenchman to write, and a more valuable thing for his contemporaries to read, than it is here with us, because national habits admit of a fuller expression of personal traits, without assigning it either to vanity or bad taste.

The previous sketch left our author at the gates of Saint Nicholas-du-Chardonnet, and fresh from the hands of M. DUPANLOUP, the subsequently famous Bishop of Orleans, who proved no friend of his old pupil. This one brings him before us again as he is about to enter the Seminary of Saint Sulpice, which was composed, as he tells us, in some sort of two houses, that of Paris and the branch establishment of Issy. The house at Paris was used for the students of theology, the other for the study of philosophy, and as the two years of philosophy came first, it was at Issy that our author began his new career as a student. The first chapter of this paper deals with the history of Saint Sulpice and the life of its founder, M. OLIER. It is intended to serve as an introduction not only to the body of this present sketch, but also to those which are to follow, and will deal more directly with the rupture that led Mr. RENAN to the world of critical thought, rather than to the Church. Passing over the historical facts, which have but little interest to the general reader on this side of the Channel, it may be remarked that this portion of the paper is chiefly valuable as an exquisite picture of the calm contemplative life which is led even to-day in such abodes of learning, where the old would hardly seem to feel the breath of the new, and where mysticism renders men of saintly life as inviolable by the sword of modern criticism as were MILTON's angels by the artillery used in the war of heaven. "Ces vieux sages consommés ne s'émouvaient de rien. Le monde était pour eux un orgue de Barbarie qui se répète." As regards their literary and theological influence, we are told that in the midst of the pretentious pathos which has invaded the sphere of Christian Apologetics to-day, they have maintained a school of solid doctrine, which repudiates noise and show and abhors mere success, modesty having always been the special characteristic of the fathers of Saint Sulpice. Not for a moment did those excellent teachers think, says M. RENAN, that any great writer or orator was likely to spring from among their pupils. And yet Saint Sulpice, where literature was despised, formed an excellent school for style, owing to the admirable precepts put before the students, who were taught that a man should never speak of himself—that he should consider the substance of what he has to say and not the form, and then say it simply and with as much self-concealment as possible. Having mentioned several of the eminent Catholic theologians and writers who have been trained within the walls of Saint Sulpice, M. RENAN goes on to say that it is not on such grounds that the pious educators of that institution deserve to be praised, since they formed, above all, a school for virtue. Many of his opinions respecting them have astonished men of the world, he says; the latter have been unable to understand him on this head, because they have not seen for themselves as he has done. Those of our readers who connect piety with their own liberal creed, and may suppose that lofty virtue can find no place in a superstitious Church, would do well to lay the following words to heart:—"J'ai vu à Saint-Sulpice l'absolu de la vertu et charité associées à des idées étroites, je l'avoue, la perfection de la bonté, de la politesse, de la modestie, de l'abnégation personnelle. Ce qu'il y a de vertu dans Saint Sulpice suffirait pour gouverner un monde, et cela m'a rendu difficile pour ce que j'ai trouvé ailleurs. Je n'ai trouvé dans le siècle qu'un seul homme qui méritât d'être comparé à ceux-là: c'est M. JAMIRON. Ceux qui ont connu M. DAMIRON ont connu un Sulpicien. Les autres ne sauraient jamais ce que ces vieilles écoles de silence de sérieux et de respect renferment de trésors pour la conservation du bien dans l'humanité."

The house in which the branch establishment is carried on at Issy was the suburban residence, we are told, of MARGUERITE DE VALOIS, the first wife of HENRY the Fourth. With a touch of humour M. RENAN tells his readers that "les Venus devinrent des vierges," and that "avec les Amours on fit des anges." The relations between teacher and pupil seem to have been of the easiest and pleasantest kind. The heads of the establishment led exactly the same kind of life as their students, with whom they occupied themselves as little as possible. Hence, if the latter wished to work, they had an excellent opportunity for doing so; if, on the other hand, they wished to be idle, there was nothing to prevent their following their inclination—a permission of which a large number availed themselves. The superior or head of the house at Issy, when our author entered, was M. GOSSELIN, of whom he says: "C'est l'homme le plus poli et le plus amiable que j'ai jamais connu." He was, it appears, a man of erudition rather than a theologian; while his arguments were sound within the limits of an orthodoxy whose foundation he never seriously questioned. In spite of this he was liberal and charitable in his estimate of the opinions of others.

At the head of the teaching staff was a M. GOTTOFREY, one of the Professors of Philosophy, and a M. PINAULT, who was the Professor of Mathematics and Physics. These two were very unlike M. GOSSELIN, the Superior. The Professor of Philosophy was a fanatic, and fanaticism sometimes renders us very sagacious, says M. RENAN. Anyhow, it was this M. GOTTOFREY who singled out the future heretic, and kept his eye upon his movements and his development. He saw, indeed, what the paternal optimism of the good Superior rendered him incapable of seeing, and what some of the Professors did not think it worth while to look for. M. PINAULT, the Professor of Mathematics, was a man of a higher order of mind, in whom there was a powerful personality, we are told, which faith had subdued, but which ecclesiastical discipline had not crushed. "He was a saint, he was scarcely a priest, he was by no means a Sulpician." In his concentrated passion and the originality of his ways he greatly resembled M. LITRE. For "if M. LITRE had received a Catholic education, he would have been an exalted mystic; and had M. PINAULT been educated outside of Catholicism, he would have been a revolutionist and a Positivist." Those who are acquainted with the vast industry and great powers of M. LITRE will admit this is saying a great deal. The very atmosphere of the seminary created a mystical tendency in the soul of the Issy Professor, which held his genius in check, and in which his thought floated away as figures in a dream. This mysticism was strengthened, it would seem, by a certain Father HANIQUE, who was the con-cierge or porter of the establishment. The most transcendent forms of speculation were reached by this "portier sublime;" and he was admired and consulted by all who aspired to superior sanctity. There was thus a fanatical section of the house headed by M. GOTTOFREY, and a mystical party, of which M. PINAULT and the "Portier sublime" took the lead, while the Superior, M. GOSSELIN, appears to have held the balance of a mild sway between them.

Here we may stop to ask with M. RENAN, How it is that a man with such intellectual gifts as M. PINAULT possessed can remain within the pale of Orthodoxy? How, for instance, did this Professor associate studies which would seem to naturally and necessarily exclude the miraculous tenets of Orthodoxy with an ardent Catholicism? To make use of our author's reply, it is due to the same cause which operates upon those members of the Academy of Sciences who are even to-day firm believers in the old orthodox creeds. To such persons Christianity presents itself as a supernatural historical fact. Now, to test any kind of historical fact, historical science is needed, which is foreign to the scope and tendency of mathematics. Hence minds of a high order, that have never been brought into contact with critical methods, may go on accepting for years what those methods prove to be, an impossibility. All this is true; we may observe at the same time, it does not require much, possibly no more, than the chance expression of a Zulu to turn a mind possessed of great mathematical power to an examination of the methods of historical science, when, as in the case of Bishop COLENZO, all is suddenly changed.

M. RENAN tells his readers that he was strangely fascinated by the few echoes of German philosophy that reached the seminary. He was told, however, by one of the professors that it demanded too much change in the domain of opinion, and that, on the other hand, the philosophy of REID and the Scotch school tended to build up and strengthen Christian beliefs. It was the latter school of thought, and that only, which seems to have prevailed at Issy in M. RENAN's time, apart, of course, from the scholasticism of the Middle Ages. The writers of the modern school of France, such as COUSIN and JOUFFROY, were only known through the refutations of their opponents. The knowledge thus indirectly obtained doubtless seemed perfectly safe; but it was otherwise, for the refutations were too feeble to mitigate the force of the modern ideas they served to convey. Meanwhile the germinating process went on in our author's mind. It was not want of belief in Christianity as a system, nor sceptical doubt as to any particular doctrine, so much as a crumbling away of the philosophical basis of revelation, in the common sense of the word, which was drifting him onward, almost unconsciously to himself. Instead of facing the rocks towards which he was moving he contented himself by looking back upon the many eminent men whose opinions had not differed greatly from his own, and who had yet remained in the Church, one of them, MALEBRANCHE, saying mass throughout his life, in spite of his rationalistic philosophy. A change of this kind, though disregarded by the mystical M. PINAULT, and unobserved by the kind superior, could not long escape the keen, fanatical glance of the Professor of Philosophy, M. GOTTOFREY. "One day," says our author, "when my objections had been pushed with vigour, and when smiles had been provoked in the conference by the feebleness of the replies, he stopped the argument. In the evening he called me aside, and spoke to me in an eloquent manner of the anti-Christian attitude of mind which confidence in reasons betrays, and the injury rationalism does to faith. He grew strangely animated, and reproached me with my taste for study. 'Research—what purpose does it serve? Everything essential has been found out; it is not science that can save souls.' And gradually becoming excited, he said to me in impassioned tones, "Vous n'êtes pas un Chrétien."

Those who know what it is to suddenly awake to the consciousness that they are breaking with a loved and revered past, those who have almost shuddered at the tones of condemnation or of pity uttered by some dear friend of early years with respect to their apostasy, will sympathize with the terror M. RENAN says he felt at the words "vous n'êtes pas un Chrétien" which seemed to sound in his ears all night like the roar of thunder. The Superior, M. GOSSELIN, to whom he confided his trouble, the next day was greatly displeased at what had been said, and treated him with more kindness than ever. One of the professors, a M. MANIER, begged him not to ground his Christian faith upon mere matters of detail, and pointed out that if he did not feel he could become a priest he could even then become a professor of the Scotch philosophy at the University, without breaking with the Church and renouncing Christianity. At length the matter was temporarily tided over, and it was arranged that at the end of his two years at Issy he should pass on to Saint Sulpice for the study of theology, where we shall find him on the appearance of his next auto-biographical paper, which will be awaited with much interest by all who have had any experience of that revolution of opinion which it will doubtless eloquently and graphically pourtray.

IN MEMORIAM.

THE new year has already struck down two worthy men filling useful and responsible positions in our ministerial ranks—JOHN WILSON and WILLIAM BENNETT—obituary notices of whom appeared in our columns last week. It is not often, be, that we record the death of two ministers in the same issue of our paper. The work to which Mr. WILSON devoted himself is one which has especial claims on our appreciation and sympathy. Surely none can be more Christ-like than that which gives itself to the "publicans and sinners" of our large towns, and endeavours to reclaim the vicious, to lift up the fallen, to aid the helpless, to care for the neglected, to instruct the ignorant, to counteract, by the ministry of moral and religious influences, bad associations and surroundings. To do all this was the high aim of Mr. WILSON's work. Only those who have lived in large towns, and mingled much with the poor, who have acquainted themselves with the actual condition, the wants, the temptations and difficulties of the lower classes, can really enter into and appreciate the labours of a faithful domestic missionary. It is a work in many respects exceedingly depressing. He is brought in close contact with vice, poverty, suffering, and wretchedness, in some of their most unhappy and distressing forms. He has to visit the sick poor in close, wretched, ill-ventilated rooms, to thread his way through dark passages and noisome stifling alleys, and listen to tales of suffering, vice and privation painful to hear. Indeed, his work is to correct, as far as possible, the sins and vices of our modern civilisation, as they affect specially the lower class of the population. The missionary would be almost helpless without the aid and sympathy of others.] In this respect Mr. WILSON was well supported. An influential religious society was at his back, and by the members of that society his efforts, we know, were appreciated as they deserved to be.

Not less useful in another direction was Mr. BENNETT. His work describes more that of our ministers generally, namely, to enlighten the public mind on religious and social questions, to point out the mischievous influence of popular superstitions, to correct the pernicious errors which have been accepted as truths by unthinking credulous minds, and lead them to higher, juster, truer views on the most important questions of human concern. His work was that of a religious reformer, a teacher of rational religion, and to that work he brought abilities of no common order. We have before us a little volume of lectures which he published when he was the minister at Aberdeen, and which at the time of its appearance was reviewed in these columns. We believe it reached, as it deserved, a second edition. The subjects are of a popular character, and are handled in a free and reverent spirit, and with uncompromising fidelity to the claims of rational thought. Indeed, the book was sent forth on its mission as a "contribution towards a rational theology." The Lectures of which it consisted had previously appeared separately in a cheap form, but were thought worth preserving in a more permanent shape. In the modest preface which introduces the book the writer says, "My encouragement to offer the Lectures in their present form is the hearty reception given to some two or three of them which, as pamphlets, have already appeared in print. My earnest desire and sincere hope is that, as now published, they may prove helpful, in ever so humble a way, in directing attention by their plain and candid utterances to the irrational and pernicious doctrines and beliefs which, in my opinion, are to be found in the prevailing theology of the times. Let those who differ widely from my position—as I well know many good men honestly do—say of my opinions and of their tendency what they may, they will never take from me the satisfaction of having, in the face of some discouragements, done what I was able, and what to me seemed good for the enlightenment and well-being of the men of my time, and for the promotion of what I esteem to be the true honour and glory of God. Our knowledge in theology is of necessity like our knowledge in every other science, progressive and cumulative. Happy would I be could I believe I had placed ever so small a stone upon the ever-enlarging cairn of truth, or had even simply caused one raised there by other hands to be more plainly visible to the eyes of the humblest and most unlettered wayfarer."

These sentences indicate the spirit not only of his book, but of his pulpit labours, during his too brief ministerial career. Perhaps for some he was too candid, too advanced, but all must acknowledge the truth-loving nature of the man. His poetical effusions which have appeared from time to time always breathed the spirit of hope, trust, love, and aspiration. If they did not reach a high standard of poetical excellence at least they were not open to the charge of dulness or feebleness. They were eminently stimulating to the spiritual nature and to the best affections of the heart. Slight and fugitive as they were, who can doubt that they did good? Who can tell what hearts they cheered, what faith they strengthened, what hope they inspired? Struck from his mind, bright and sparkling, they went forth on their errand to cheer and bless, and it may be that many hearts to-day are gladder and happier for their inspiration. To impart such inspiration is the true mission of the poet, and not a single line that does this has been written in vain. That he should be taken from us just when he was making way at Heywood seems to us unfortunate. We cannot help so regarding it, looking at it from our point of view. Every earnest worker is needed, and every one taken away with powers unimpaired is a loss.

Both Mr. WILSON and Mr. BENNETT leave behind them an unfinished work. The task which has dropped from their hands will have to be taken up by others, and carried on with renewed energy and devotion. The work of rescuing the sinning and suffering, of consoling the sorrowing and teaching the ignorant; and the work of quickening the mind with high and ennobling thought; of inspiring the less gifted with cheering hopes and aims; of correcting pernicious errors and inculcating divine truths—this is a work, in either aspect of it, as pressing and urgent to-day as in any past age of the world. All honour to the men who have laboured in the past; may worthy successors be found to fill the void their removal leaves behind them!

JOSEPH PRIESTLEY, LL.D.

Last Sunday afternoon I went to St. George's Hall, Langham-place, to hear Dr. B. W. Richardson discourse on "Joseph Priestley; a Life-long Struggle for Liberty of Thought in the Eighteenth Century." The lecturer has a broad chest, a strong constitution, a good voice, an easy and effective delivery. He was well-received, and frequently applauded by a large audience.

He asked his hearers to go back in imagination to a secluded house a short way from Philadelphia, inhabited in the year 1800 by a man sixty-seven years old. He is gentle and courteous in manner, and affable in conversation. His range of knowledge is very extensive. He is fully acquainted with the chemistry of his day—indeed, has himself laid the foundation and enlarged the boundaries of the science by discovering oxygen and other gases, and the relation of plants to animals in the economy of nature. He has ascertained that plants assimilate carbon and give out oxygen, which is essential to the support of animal life. He has experimented in electricity and the laws of light. He knows not only the politics of America and England, but of most European states. In theology he is an encyclopedia of knowledge. Enter his home and you find he is an early riser. After eating a frugal breakfast he spends several hours in his laboratory or study. He walks out with his grandchildren in the middle of the day, then dines, and afterwards is ready to play with them at chess, cards, or any other innocent game—but never for money. In the evening friends frequently call upon him and talk on subjects in which they are mutually interested. This man is Joseph Priestley. What brought him to America? To answer this question it is necessary to tell the story of his life.

He was born in 1733, near Leeds. His father was a wool-sorter. His mother died when he was young, and he was placed under the care of an aunt. The family were Calvinistic and Presbyterian. In early life he suffered from fits of depression, as he was not sure that he was one of the elect. He learned Latin, Greek, and some Hebrew from neighbouring tutors. He wished to become a minister, and with this view he entered the Academy at Daventry. There he read "Hartley on Man," which influenced him very much. He became a Necessarian in philosophy and an Arian in theology. Having completed his three years at Daventry, he was chosen minister of Needham Market in Suffolk, at a salary of £40 a year, which was not regularly or fully paid. To eke out a living he opened a school for children, which proved a failure. His evening classes for adults were, however, successful, and he taught the use of the globes, and tried to imbue them with a love for scientific knowledge. In 1758 he removed from Suffolk to minister to a small congregation at Nantwich in Cheshire. In 1761 he was chosen to the important post of tutor in the Warrington Academy. While there he made the acquaintance of Mrs. Barbauld, and through her was introduced to Dr. Price, Dr. Franklin, and others. While at Warrington he was happily married, wrote his book on electricity, was elected Fellow of the Royal Society, and received his degree of LL.D. from Edinburgh. In 1767 he was invited to become the Minister of the Mill-hill Congregation, Leeds, and this pleasant connection continued for six years. An accident in a brewery near his house led him to pursue vigorously his chemical experiments, especially on the gases that are generated during fermentation. In 1773 he engaged himself as Secretary and Librarian to Lord Shelburne at a salary of £300 a year; £40 a year were allowed for laboratory expenses; and in the event of either wishing to terminate the engagement he was to have a pension of £150 a year. He occupied this post for six years, and during the latter portion of the time made a tour of Europe. During his stay in Paris he was in constant communication with the most eminent French philosophers, and he was surprised at the wide spread infidelity and even atheism that prevailed among them. They also were astonished that he should claim to be a Christian, while he denied most of the doctrines usually associated with Christianity. In 1780 he removed to Birmingham, and became one of the ministers of the New Meeting, where he remained for eleven years, and was very happy. Here he published two volumes on light and colour, and "A History of the Corruptions of Christianity." The latter work led him into controversy with Dr., after Bishop, Horsley. He was a member of the Lunar Society, to which Watts, the engineer, Erasmus Darwin, and others belonged. This society met monthly, at the time of the full moon, for the sake of the light which enabled them to get more pleasantly and safely to their homes. The French Revolution took place in 1789, and the shock of that mighty convulsion reached England. Priestley was known to hold liberal and advanced views, and he was believed to be in sympathy with the leaders of the revolutionary movement. In 1791, during a time of political excitement, an infuriated mob destroyed considerable property in Birmingham, set fire to Priestley's house, burnt it to the ground, and he narrowly escaped with his life. He rode on horseback to Worcester, where he secreted himself for a few days. He eventually made his way to London, and was tutor at New College, Hackney, for three years. His feelings were very much hurt by the removal of his name from the Royal Society. As party spirit ran high in this country, for his personal safety he thought it better to leave, and find a home in the New World. He started for America in 1794, and settled in a secluded spot a few miles from Philadelphia. He was engaged in literary labour to the last. In 1804 his health declined very much. He suffered from stricture of the œsophagus, and could only take fluid food. He died calmly and peacefully, sustained by a firm faith in God and the immortal life. He wished very much to be buried in England—the land that he loved so dearly, though an exile—but this wish was not gratified.

Dr. Richardson concluded with an eloquent tribute to Dr. Priestley's love of truth, and his honesty and fearlessness in proclaiming his convictions, and held him up as an example to all. He said that as a scientist he would bear comparison with Sir Isaac Newton, for courage and intrepidity of character he was like Washington, and for gentleness and piety he ranked with Dr. Channing.

He might have mentioned that England now appreciates the son once treated so badly. His statue has a place of honour in the museum of one of our oldest universities; and another statue invites the attention of the passer-by in one of the busy thoroughfares of Birmingham.

J. S.

SIR ERASMUS WILSON has informed the Senatus of Aberdeen University of his intention to found a chair of pathology there, and to endow it with a sum of £10,000.

OUR MANCHESTER LETTER.

The meetings held in the Memorial Hall last Tuesday were about the most successful which have been held for many years. The business meeting was a business meeting, in the true sense of the word, the record of which I refer your readers to for the details. In the evening a public meeting was held, Mr. T. Chatfield Clarke, a gentleman not "unbeknown" to you in London, presiding. And a capital chairman he made—genial and gentlemanly as an earnest Christian temper could make him. The hall presented a fine appearance, filled, as it was, with one of the largest audiences ever gathered within its walls, and every one was animated by the same purpose, and a bright hopeful spirit. It seemed a very heaven of peace and good-will after the stormy passions of the previous evening in the meeting of the Free Trade Hall, where I was present, and experienced certain sundry batterings from our Irish brethren, who love peace so well that they seem determined none of it shall ever be used where any of them are.

The Chairman's opening remarks were of a nature to give a practical and useful turn to all that followed him. In certain parts of them he was specially suggestive, and provocative of thought. As a personal friend of the late Dr. Raleigh he spoke with feeling of him as one who was a model minister of the Gospel. He was not a man of genius, he said, but simply by devotion to his work, and his earnest piety, he had succeeded wonderfully in the great object of his life. In another part of his remarks he said that "according to his experience, it was yet somewhat of a mistake to suppose that prejudices with regard to liberal and rational religion had quite died out. On this ground a large sphere was open to Unitarian ministers." Now, of this the present writer had had ample proof within a very few days of these words being spoken, even in what Mr. Clayden calls "the metropolis of Unitarianism." Now, two thoughts are suggested by these averments. The first is, that if Unitarians conclude that their negative work is done they are under a great mistake; and the second is, that when the wonderful success of some pious and earnest orthodox minister is pointed out as an incentive, I think there ought to be some qualification introduced, inasmuch as the great probability is that even Dr. Raleigh's success would have been much less had he happened to see the truth of Christian Unitarianism, and acted on his convictions. At least, I know men who are Dr. Raleigh's equals in all the high qualities of Christian worth, and who have more learning; who, while they were orthodox in their doctrines, could attract far more than they can do now as exponents of a loftier truth, and a far more pure gospel. In pointing out the hope of the future in the ever-widening spread of education, the chairman referred to the evidence of the fast declining influence of the harder and coarser elements of the older theology. The preacher of the liberal faith has a great future, he insisted. Everything tended to make us more hopeful as to our being able to instil into the minds of the people views of the love of God, the immortality of the soul, the absolute supremacy of the conscience, and views which were at the same time simple, deep, catholic, and Christian, and which were calculated to have a great future in this country. At the same time, "anyone who read the literature of the day, the reviews of all kinds and degrees, could not but see that there was a widespread non-recognition of religion, going far beyond any belief in Christianity, as even the Unitarians held it in its wide and rational sense." In a large and serious sense this is sadly too true; still I for one am inclined to think that this part of our present state is not seldom overrated, both in its extent and intensity, and I do not speak without some little knowledge of what I am saying. An aggressive party is naturally a very demonstrative one, and religious sceptics, like social levellers, make a great noise, and often alarm the public mind out of all proportions to their real numbers and influence. What I fear far more than the openly professed enemies of religion is the great inert mass of indifference that forms a weight of resistance to the upward tendencies of society against which reformers often seem to toil in vain. If the solidity of this mass could be effectually broken into, and something like an interest in the higher concerns of life roused among them, the aggressive speaking, writing! scepticism of our day would do little but prepare the ground for the higher forms of religious life by sweeping away the lower ones.

Mr. Harry Rawson's speech is always welcome on these occasions to those who like clear statements, telling sentences, and sound sense, in short, good business informed with spiritual life. In remarking on the additions to the curriculum of the Board, and the increased rigour of the entrance examinations, he pleaded for the thorough equipment of those who had to go out of college to an ever better educated people. One feature that had been added to the curriculum was of a very important nature. I refer to the appointment of a teacher of elocution. Considering that a large part of a minister's work consists in speaking before the public, and that the effect of good matter is so often marred by a poor delivery, I think this is a wise step indeed that the committee of this institution has taken. Not long ago I was at a meeting where one of the speakers specially interested me, his words contained more solid matter than all the rest of the speakers combined, and yet the audience generally would hardly listen to him. I expostulated with some of those about me, and showed the important points he was making, when one elderly man silenced me by saying, "If he thought so himself he would show more interest in what he was saying." The fact was he was in earnest, and he was thinking most intensely, but he mumbled in his speech, and his attitude was awkward altogether. One other speaker had won applause simply because he said gracefully the little he had to say, though he did it in many words. Mr. Rawson told an anecdote to show how awkward a man could be in trying to express extempore thought without previous training. He showed also by the number of theological books published during the year 1881, outnumbering any other class of literature, the present wakeful interest in theology, and he thought that the theological student should be fully armed in every way for the work this increasing interest called upon him to do. In words of touching pathos, and with characterisations of the most happy nature, the speaker referred to the great loss the Liberal world has suffered from the deaths of Samuel Sharpe and Edward Wright. Beautiful and noble must have been the lives of men who could call forth such words from one who knew them so well. Mr. Rawson spoke with every sentence warm glowing from his heart, tempered by the fine judicious sense he so largely possesses. He spoke, too, some wise words as to how the directors of the Board, while radical in their principles of progress, were also truly conservative of the best life of the past in the institution. This is truly English, and ensures safe progress.

Mr. Clayden's speech was marked by the best qualities of that gentleman as a speaker. It is years since I saw him, for our spheres of labour have been widely separated for a long time past; but I was glad to see the Mr. Clayden of old days so little changed in any way. He still retains the ardour of his younger time, and still there is no uncertain sound in his trumpet when he blows it in the battle of thought. He pleaded for a larger infusion of lay help in the services of our churches. "A religious census had been taken in many towns of late by newspaper proprietors, and from the results which had been published it appeared that the only churches which had been really successful in late years were those which made the greatest use of lay help. This fact had led him to the conclusion that if the Unitarian body wished to carry on its work successfully and effectively it must make a greater use of its lay members. Let the ministry be enlarged as far as possible, and when all had been done that could be done in this respect there must of necessity be still a vast field for work, and that ground could only be occupied and the people brought in by a great infusion of lay agency in the ministry." There was sense in what he said, and I give this point more prominence because I have noticed of late, even in Lancashire, a decline in the interest of having laymen in the pulpit. Perhaps this may arise from the fact that our churches are better supplied with ministers than formerly; and that our pulpits are so well, and, speaking generally, so ably filled; but there are many districts throughout our land which need missionaryising where zealous laymen might do good work with the occasional help of ministers, and of our colleges in preparing the ground, and in building up churches where regular ministers would in time be needed. I know several instances of the kind where this has been the case already. But I was most struck with Mr. Clayden's remarks on the question, "What shall our ministers preach about?" It strikes me that this is a very simple matter indeed. Keeping in mind that the one great end of our churches is to develop the religious life of their members, the form and mode by which this end shall be sought depends very largely on the individual preacher's idiosyncrasies, and on the special needs of the congregation. What would be the cause of decay in one would be the cause of life and progress in another. And in view of such a fact consists the vital importance of the flexibility of our Free Churches, which differs so largely in opinion, form of government, and administration. The late Mr. Sharpe used to say to Mr. Clayden that the great purpose of the services in our Churches ought to be to make men feel that they had a God to serve, and an immortality to live. And we have the root of the matter in these words. Mr. Clayden further insisted that the learning of the preacher should not appear in his sermon, though it should be there under all he said. I suppose that he meant that it should be thoroughly assimilated, and show itself in mental force and beauty, as our food, the beef and bread we eat show themselves in the form of nerve-energy and muscular strength. It should not be thrown in a wide undigested form, but transformed into mental activity.

Mr. Black indulged in retrospect, in order to show how he had been led away from the Confession of Faith to the adoption of Unitarianism, and to prove that Unitarians made the mistake of supposing that liberal minds in other Churches were Unitarians when they were not. "These people had not such Unitarian views as were imputed to them, and certainly could not say that they were out-and-out Unitarians. This fact imposed on their body the duty of being clear, definite, explicit in the expression of their views, and of taking up an attitude of sympathy towards others." Perhaps Mr. Black was right in what he said, but I should like to have asked him in what sense he used the word Unitarian, since he also insisted on the great differences that no doubt prevail in our body. Besides, fifteen years ago, when he left the Orthodox body in Scotland for the ranks of Unitarianism in England, the controversy differed very largely in its aspects. It is only occasionally that one now hears the war cry of the Trinity, and other doctrines specially bound up with it, doctrines which seem to me, as clear eyed understanding and higher faith grow, to cease to have importance. The battle now rages more specially round the Bible, and according as this is decided by an individual does he really belong to one side or the other. If he accepts it as the master of reason, as the dictator to conscience, he will also in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred submit to the orthodox canon of interpretation which see the Trinity, and many other things besides in its pages. But if, while prizing it as a book of wonderful instruction, as an inspirer of the moral sense, and containing the grandest utterances and exemplifications of the religious life, he holds that his individual conscience is to him the supreme authority, why then he will be likely to interpret it by the light of reason and discover very little therein that has to be read in before it can be got out. In all probability the result will be that he will be Unitarian. And there is little question there are many in the orthodox churches who have come to these conclusions, who yet stay in for family reasons, or because of their associations with some one particular church, or that they "sit under" ministers who seldom vex their ears with doctrines they deem false or immoral—such as never-ending hell, or natural depravity. Be all this as it may, I am compelled to acknowledge that Mr. Black put very finely the work that Unitarians have to do. Their work, then, was mainly to reconcile under the roof of one temple the hearts and minds of men. That was the lesson they were learning for the benefit of the world at large, and he hoped their position was becoming more and more clear to them. All their other work must not interfere with their work as congregations.

Mr. Felix Taylor, the senior student, speaking on behalf of his fellow-students, made a very good speech indeed, full of promise for the future, and with words of thanks brought one of the best meetings I have had the pleasure of attending for a long time to a conclusion. He proved that the right spirit is in the institution: that it is doing a good work for our liberal faith; and that it deserves the earnest and practical support of everyone interested in the welfare and progress of true religion in our country.

Occasional Notes.

The successor of F. D. Maurice at St. Peter's, Vere-street, shows much of his broad and tolerant spirit. In the course of his sermon on Sunday last the Rev. W. Page Roberts said: "You know I am no friend to pulpit politics, but if politics are out of place in the pulpit, thank God morality is not out of place there, and when we see immorality like that which now disgraces Russia, it is our duty to call attention to it, and boldly to condemn it. It is for us, with others, to do what we can to keep the national conscience sensitive, to maintain a high moral public opinion, and such an opinion will not be without power. The public opinion of its neighbours may be a real strength to a right-minded Government. We may not think that the outrages from which the Jews are suffering in Russia have the countenance of the Government. But they have not been instantaneously and sternly repressed, and once more we see this singular people the victims of unengendered barbarism. How much the world owes them, and with what strange coin it has paid them for their services! Why, we owe more to them than to any nation in the world. Greece and Rome are nothing to Jerusalem. I need not think of eminent men and services in modern days, nor yet of the time of which it has been said that together with the Spanish Arabs 'they kept alive the flame of learning during the deep darkness of the Middle Ages.' I take the Bible, Old and New Testament, as a contribution to the wealth of the world, which should make us look upon a Jew with gratitude whenever we see him. What are Horace and Cicero to Isaiah and Paul? We are indebted for our religion, and herein for our civilisation, to the Jews. And yet this is the nation which Christians have ravaged in almost every century. We may blush for the crimes of rabble crusaders, for those of our own country in the time of John, and for those of Spain at the close of the fourteenth century. But is it not time that these things had come to an end? Do these burning ravaging Christians know that their Saviour—the God they worship—was a Jew? We may plead semi-barbarism as an excuse for the past. Well, perhaps it may be pleaded for the Russia of the present. But at least no such plea can be put up for Germany, which lighted the conflagration which now devastates Russia, and for her must remain the sterner condemnation. Humanity, gratitude, and the Christian religion alike, call upon us to denounce the crimes from which an eminent and helpless people are now suffering."

CANON FARRAR, in a letter supplied to several London and provincial papers on Monday, takes the same tone, and concludes with the following practical suggestion:—"It would be a most happy result of the present troubles if the Jews, like the Greeks, could be restored to the dignity of an independent and self-governed nation in their own Holy Land. There they might learn the absolutely immeasurable inferiority of their Talmud to their Bible. There they might free themselves from the less honourable tendencies into which they were mainly driven by the disabilities which closed every other career against them, and deprived them for so many ages of the fair rights and dignities of citizens. If this cannot be, then, while we trust that they may themselves be led in every country of Europe to lay to heart, and to profit by, the bitter lessons of misfortune, we trust also that every Christian nation will recognise that the treatment to which they are now being subjected is not only the worst possible 'summons to Christian fellowship,' but also that it constitutes in itself an indelible blot upon the annals of that religion which claims to be, above everything else, a Gospel of Christ, and therefore a Gospel of mercy and humanity; a Gospel which preaches that love to God our Father is best shown by love to our brother-man." But as a simple matter of fact, the leading Jewish families of all nations, as we have always understood, have not the slightest wish to be restored to the Holy Land, and feel much more at home in London, Paris, and Vienna. They are by no means we believe, ignorant of the "immeasurable inferiority" of their Talmud to the Old Testament. A modern Jew is much more an Englishman or a Frenchman than he is a Jew, and would probably feel much less at home in Palestine than a colony of sturdy agriculturists of no particular religious persuasion.

WE are glad to see the healthful activity of the Sunday School Association. Three new books and one new edition are advertised in our columns this week.

A CENSUS was taken on Sunday, at the suggestion of gentlemen interested in Christian work in Glasgow, especially to ascertain the actual attendance at the various Evangelical churches in the city and suburbs. As a rule, the enumeration was made in the afternoon. There were in all 33 districts, and the number of Evangelical churches was 324, with an aggregate attendance of 115,292, and 20 Roman Catholic churches, with an aggregate attendance of 15,871. The population of the city and suburbs included was, at the last census, 704,436. The census takers decline to give the denominational figures, on the ground that they might be used for political purposes.

THE result of the first matriculation examination of the Royal University of Ireland was laid before the Senate at the meeting on Friday week. It appears that of 740 candidates who had given notice of their intention only 614 presented themselves at the centres assigned for examination, of whom ten early withdrew from the work, leaving 604 who went through the ordeal. In round numbers 400, or about two-thirds, took pass, and 200, or one-third, honour papers. Of the 604 candidates no less than 537, or 89 per cent., have passed the matriculation. As only 340 students matriculated in the Queen's College in the session 1880-81, the muster from the outside colleges and schools is 50 per cent. more on this the first matriculation in the Royal University.

THE newly-constituted Faculty of Theology of the Irish Presbyterian Church has just issued its "Regulations for the degree of Bachelor of Divinity," having been empowered by Royal Charter to confer such degrees. The course includes Hebrew, Church History, catechetics, Christian ethics, Biblical criticism, and systematic theology. No one can be admitted as a candidate for the B.D. degree unless he be a graduate in Arts of one of the Universities of the United Kingdom, or has passed a three years' course in Arts in Trinity College, Dublin, the Queen's College, or Magee College. This will exclude many of the older ministers, who prepared for the ministry in the days before the Queen's College, and who are, for the most part, without University degrees.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE.—The Local Committee at Liverpool have engaged the Philharmonic Hall for the whole of the proceedings of the Conference. The Rev. Joseph Wood, minister of the Wycliffe Independent Church at Leicester has undertaken to conduct the devotional part of the religious service, with which the Conference will open on the evening of Tuesday, 18th April. It will be remembered that he made an excellent speech at the recent Provincial Meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association at Leicester.

THE LONDON SCHOOL BOARD held its usual weekly meeting on Thursday. The Industrial Schools scandal was again discussed at much length. The result was that a letter from Mr. Scrutton intimating that the matter was to form the subject of an action-at-law was referred to the Special Committee on the St. Paul's Industrial School, with an instruction to suspend further proceedings pending the result of the action. The debate as to the proposed sale of the training-ship Shaftesbury was resumed and concluded. The proposal was rejected by a large majority. The estimates for the year were presented.

ACCORDING to a decree published in the official journal, the intended religious census of France has been abandoned. The interrogatories concerning the religion of the population will, consequently, be expunged from the census papers.

Reviews.

RICHARD COBDEN.*

In the year 1840, just two years after the formation of the Anti-Corn Law League, and two years before the passing of the Act for the gradual removal of the tax on the food of the people, and while the agitation in favour of repeal was at its height, the total value of the imports and exports of the United Kingdom was £123,312,740, or £5 0s. 7½d. per head of the population. In the year 1880 these figures had risen to £697,644,031 and £20 4s. 10d. respectively. In 1840, too, distress was prevalent all over the country, fresh meat was rarely tasted more than once a week by large masses of the population, and what are now to the very poor almost necessities of life, such as tea, coffee, and sugar, were then luxuries beyond their reach. For the nine years 1840-8, during which the Old Corn Law was in existence, the amount of wheat flour and other grain imported into the United Kingdom was 167,620,657 cwt., or nearly nineteen million cwt. per annum; for the twenty-one years 1849-69, during which the importation of foreign food was subject to a shilling duty, the imports were 1,046,123,490 cwt., or just fifty million cwt. per annum, and for the eleven years 1870-80, during which the Corn Laws have been wholly repealed, the imports have risen to 1,215,465,590 cwt., or nearly one hundred and eleven million cwt. per annum. Uninteresting as figures are as a rule to the general reader, there is about these, which we have taken from that very useful publication, the Financial Reform Almanac, a convincing eloquence, as well as a triumphant justification of the policy, the adoption of which has led to these great results. And this policy, the policy of Free Trade, is inseparably connected with the name of the man whose name is placed at the head of this article, whose biography has recently been given to the world, by Mr. John Morley. This biography is a real addition to the literature of this country, and Mr. Morley has placed the reading-loving public under a great obligation for the two fascinating volumes, in which he tells the story of the life and labours of the Apostle of Free Trade. We can echo the wish expressed some short time back by Mr. Bright, that the time may not be far distant when Mr. Morley and his publishers can see their way to issue a cheap edition of this life of Cobden. Especially do we commend it for the reading of every young man who is fired with the slightest ambition to serve his country and his fellowmen, feeling certain that the disinterested labours of Richard Cobden, told as they are with vivid simplicity of style, must leave on his mind an abiding impression for good.

Richard Cobden was born on the 3rd June, 1804, at Midhurst, in an old farmhouse called Dunford. His father, William Cobden, was a small farmer, with little fitness for business, but possessed of a soft and affectionate disposition. His mother, whose maiden name had been Millicent Amber, was endowed with far more force of mind, and possessed much shrewdness and native sense. Cobden's childhood was a hard one. The farm had to be sold, and while kind relations helped to maintain the dozen children who called William Cobden father, Richard was taken to a school in Yorkshire, where for five years he was ill-fed, ill-taught, and ill-used, and never saw parent or friend. When he had attained his fifteenth year Cobden was taken from school and placed as a clerk with his uncle, a warehouseman in Old Change. Between the uncle and nephew there was but little sympathy, and at one period the latter meditated a change of his position. Owing, however, to his father's opposition he abandoned his intention, and he remained with his uncle until the failure of his house, in 1826. It is interesting to know that by his industry, cheerfulness, and skill he had overcome the difficulties of temper that he had experienced at his uncle's hand, and by the time he had reached twenty-one he had been promoted from a clerk's position to that of traveller, a position for which he was in many ways peculiarly adapted, and, as Mr. Morley says, it was specially welcome to Cobden, because of the gratification that it offered to the master passion of his life, an insatiable desire to know the affairs of the world.

In 1826, as we have said, his employer's house failed, and for some little time he had nothing to do, save to look out for employment. This he obtained within a few months, and continued in it for two years, when he determined, along with two friends, to go into business on their own account. They had but little capital of their own, but they were able to inspire confidence in their ability and integrity, and in a year or two they owed one house alone forty thousand pounds, for goods sent to them for sale on commission, as Cobden says, "upon no other security than our characters and knowledge of our business." The undertaking proved successful, and it enabled him to do much for the rather crippled family of which he was a member. In 1831 they determined to enlarge their business; they took over from the house, to which reference has just been made, an old calico-printing factory at Sadden, not far from Blackburn. The year following he was joined by his brother Frederick, who had hitherto made a poor hand of business at Manchester, where and in London the business of the partnership was carried on. It was at Sadden that Cobden first began to interest himself in the welfare of others besides his own immediate friends and relations. He and his partner, Mr. George Foster, erected a little stone school-house, where there had previously been nothing of the kind, and where "the only agency for bringing," as Mr. Morley puts it, "the great religious tradition of the Western world" to the inhabitants of the valley, was a diminutive Baptist chapel.

In 1833 Cobden for the first time went abroad, visiting Paris for the purposes of his business. Two years later he went to the United States. His letters to his brother Frederick, dealing as they do with themes that are now rather hackneyed, contain descriptions of his visit which are still vivid and interesting. In the autumn of 1836 he was obliged, on account of the state of his health, to winter abroad. He went to Spain, Egypt (where he had an interview with Mehemet Ali, the "rapacious tyrant" who was the author of one of the most atrocious massacres of modern times, and then ruled Egypt), Constantinople, Smyrna, Greece, and Malta, and returned after an absence of six months. His diary describing his wanderings is full of interest, and indicates the shrewd and observant nature of the man, making it clear that his stock of political knowledge was considerably increased.

Cobden had already come before the public as a politician in the publication of two pamphlets, one entitled "England, Ireland, and America," and the other "Russia," in both of which he advocated very strongly the doctrine of non-intervention in foreign politics. These pamphlets were no doubt written with an eye to bringing his views before the public in another and more important fashion, and at the election of 1837 he contested Stockport, but was defeated. It was perhaps just as well for his private affairs that he was unsuccessful, for he was thus enabled to devote himself to consolidating his business, which had now grown so large as to require a capital of £80,000. But mere money-getting was not to Cobden's taste, man of trade as he was. Writing to his brother Frederick we find him saying:—

At all events, let us remember that to live usefully is far better than living long. And do not let us deprive ourselves of the gratification at last, a gratification which the selfish never have, that we have not embittered our lives with heaping up money, but that we have given a part of our time to more rational and worthy exertions.

These are the expression of a noble and unselfish aim, and they are but typical of the work of Cobden's life.

The moving spirit in the agitation, which ultimately resulted in the charter of incorporation, which was to make Manchester one of the great examples of the advantages attaching to municipal life, was Cobden, and at the first election he was chosen alderman of the city. We now approach the period which saw the rise and progress of the great agitation which led to the repeal of the Corn Laws. Cobden did not originate this movement, but he joined it in its infancy, and very soon became its leader and guide. We do not purpose, however, telling again the oft-told story of the League; our concern is principally with the man who was so largely associated with its fortunes. In 1839 the partnership which had hitherto subsisted was dissolved, and a new one was formed between Richard and Frederick Cobden for carrying on the Manchester warehouse and the print works at Crosse-hall, near Chorley, and during the whole of the Corn Law agitation this arrangement continued. Frederick Cobden was scarcely fitted to manage such a business, and we cannot, therefore, be surprised that, owing to the absorption of the real head in matters of larger interest, it did not prosper. Shortly after the new business arrangement had been perfected Cobden married. That he was much attached to his wife there can be little doubt, as his letters testify; whether she fully sympathised with him in his public career it is not easy to say; as Mr. Morley says:—"It would seem that to be the wife of a prominent public man is not always an easy lot, . . . unless the woman be of more than common strength of public zeal, the thousand lonely days and nights, and all the swarm of undivided household cares may well put temper and spirits to a sharp strain." Mrs. Cobden herself said to her husband, in the last year of his life, and the story tells a pathetic tale, "I sometimes think that, after all the good work that you have done, and in spite of fame and great position, it would have been better for us both if, after you and I married, we had gone to settle in the backwoods of Canada." And Cobden, we are told, could only say that he was not sure that what his wife had said was not too true. Cobden was ill when he said this, and his worldly affairs were not prosperous, else we feel sure he would not have taken so gloomy and selfish a view of the matter. The opinion he expressed to his brother Frederick, and which we have already quoted, was a healthier and truer aspect of duty. On the other hand, Cobden, writing a letter to a friend in 1856, says of his wife:—"God knows how much the comfort and regularity of her domestic life have always been made subservient, willingly and meekly so, to my political engagements, without one atom of ambition to profit by the privileges which, to some natures, offer a kind of consolation for family discomfort." The man's excuse in the parable, that he had married a wife, and therefore could not come to the feast, has always struck us as about the shabbiest and meanest a man can give; and the wife who prevents, or does her best to hinder her husband in his duties to those beyond the home circle, falls short of being a true wife and helpmate.

Cobden entered Parliament in 1841, after the dissolution, consequent upon the vote of want of confidence in the Melbourne Ministry, brought forward by Peel, and carried by a majority of one only. He was then thirty-seven years of age. It seems that he was not especially desirous of standing, but his friends of the League strongly urged him to contest the same constituency that he had wooed unsuccessfully four years previously. The result was a triumphant success, and Cobden entered the House of Commons as one of the members for Stockport. His maiden speech was made in the course of the debate on the Address to the Queen's Speech, the amendment to which was carried by a majority of ninety-one, and led to the resignation of Lord Melbourne, and the formation of the first Peel administration. His speech dealt with the subject which he had gone specially to ventilate. While the party men on both sides were desirous of keeping the Corn-law question out of the debate, Cobden insisted on this being the question of the day, and the only one worth debating. His friends were well pleased with his effort, and, wisely enough, he was content to observe, rather than to mar his success by frequent attempts to address the House. In a letter to his brother, written in September, 1841, he says:—

My style of speaking pleases the gallery people, and has attracted the notice of the Radicals out of doors. But the Tories, especially the young fry, regard me in no other way than as a petard would be viewed by people in a powder magazine, a thing to be trampled on, kicked about, or put out in any way they can.

That this should have been so we cannot be surprised. There was a keen directness about his oratory which went home, and must have made many of his hearers wince. In one of the speeches delivered during his first session he said, turning to one negroophile and to another a friend of the Church Establishment:—

When I see a disposition among you to trade in humanity I will not question your motives, but this I will tell you, that if you would give force and grace to your professions of humanity, it must not be confined to the negro at the Antipodes, nor to the building of churches, nor to the extension of Church establishments, nor to occasional visits to factories to talk sentiment over factory children; you must untax the people's bread.

It was in the autumn of this same year that Cobden made that compact with Bright that they would "never rest till the Corn Law is repealed," which was the beginning of the friendship between them which existed until the death of Cobden. For the next four years he was indefatigable in his exertions, as well in the House as out of it, in enforcing the arguments in favour of Free Trade. In the session of 1843 occurred the memorable scene when Peel assumed to believe that Cobden in a speech had held him personally responsible for the state of the country, and viewed it as a direct incitement to assassination. Peel came out of the affair badly at the time, but his subsequent treatment of Cobden made amends for his foolish conduct. Of course, Cobden did not confine his votes in Parliament to the question of Corn-law repeal. On the Ministerial proposals that arose out of the litigation connected with Lady Hewley's bequest he supported the Government—he "never entertained an idea of voting for the monopolists in matters of faith." He supported, too, the Maynooth Grant simply and purely as one for extending education.

All this time he was terribly harassed by the state of his business affairs. These had been going very badly for some time, owing to the want of a head. At last, in the year 1845, things had come to such a pass that ruin stared him in the face, and the only way to prevent it was to give up his public career. In September he determined to adopt this course, and wrote to Mr. Bright announcing his resolution, and fully describing the causes that led to it. The letter itself was, at Cobden's request, burned immediately on its receipt, but we gather its purport from the reply, which is given in full. Mr. Bright was travelling in Scotland, and he immediately wrote to Cobden, strongly urging him to reconsider his determination. A day or two after he followed up his letter, by coming to Manchester, and, with the help of a friend or two, succeeded in raising a sum of money sufficient to tide over present difficulties, and Cobden was free to devote his services to the great purpose he had set himself to accomplish.

This was nearing completion. Nature came to the assistance of the League; the failure of the potato crop in Ireland and the bad harvest in England gave a force to the arguments of Cobden and his friends, which was irresistible. Peel, whose mind had for some time been tending towards repeal, finally declared in favour of the gradual adoption of the League principles. To some extent this was precipitated by Lord John Russell's letter to his constituents, written from Edinburgh, calling upon them to "unite to put an end to a system which had been proved to be the blight of commerce, the bane of agriculture, the source of bitter division among classes, the cause of penury, fever, mortality, and crime among the people." But the facts and arguments that converted Peel had not operated in the same way with other members of his Cabinet. The Duke of Wellington and Lord Stanley were as much opposed to Free Trade as ever. Pressure was wanted from outside, and this the League bestirred itself to give. Meetings were held in all the large towns, and Cobden and Bright took their share in stamping the kingdom. In the course of one of his speeches Cobden spoke so strongly of Sir Robert Peel, going so far as to say that he should forfeit his self-respect if he ever spoke a word with Peel in private, that several of his friends remonstrated with him for his language. The fact is that Peel's conduct, to which we have previously referred, had greatly embittered their relations, and Cobden felt he had been treated badly. A few weeks after this speech, Mr. Disraeli, by way of excuse for a vulgar attack made by another member upon the Chairman of the League, justified it by reference to Peel's attack upon Cobden. This called up Peel, who rose to explain that he had intended at the time to relieve Cobden of the imputation he had, in a moment of misapprehension, put upon him, and that if he had not done so as unequivocally as he ought to have done, he begged to do so now. Cobden at once accepted the Minister's disavowal, and expressed himself glad of the opportunity thus given to him to express his own regret at the terms in which he had often referred to Sir Robert Peel. That these expressions of mutual regret were not mere compliments is shown by the fact that when a few months later the repeal of the Corn Law had become an accomplished fact, and Sir Robert Peel's ministry fell on an adverse vote in relation to his Irish policy, he took occasion, in announcing his resignation of office, to refer to the passing of the great measure, and to the part Cobden had had in it. "The name," he said, "which ought to be, and which will be associated with the success of these measures is the name of a man who, acting, I believe, from pure and disinterested motives, has advocated their cause with untiring energy, and by appeals to reason, expressed by an eloquence, the more to be admired because it was unaffected and unadorned—the name which ought to be and will be associated with the success of these measures is the name of Richard Cobden. Without scruple I attribute the success of these measures to him." Cobden, too, on several occasions made amends for any bitterness he had felt.

Now that the objectionable law was repealed there was no longer any need of the organisation that had done so much to effect it. There remained but one thing to be done. To recognise in a substantial manner the efforts of those who had done so much to secure the victory was only a fitting and proper thing. Especially did Cobden deserve this. He had sacrificed ease, comfort, health, and business for the sake of the cause, and this without the hope or expectation of reward. A subscription was set on foot, and a sum of nearly eighty thousand pounds was raised, a sum which enabled him to put his business affairs again on a proper footing, and to purchase the old farmhouse at Dunford where he was born and where he continued to reside till his death. He was once taunted with this gift as if it were a matter of reproach. Addressing a meeting at Aylesbury he happened to refer to his little estate, and some one in the crowd in a sneering tone asked him how he had got it. The reply was worthy of the man:—"I am indebted for it to the bounty of my countrymen. It was the scene of my birth and infancy; it was the property of my ancestors; and it is by the munificence of my countrymen that this small estate, which had been alienated from my father by necessity, has again come into my hands, and enabled me to light up afresh the hearth of my father where I spent my childhood. I say that no warrior duke, who owns a vast domain by the vote of the Imperial Parliament, holds his property by a more honourable title than I possess mine." One thing must be said as to the League which commends it especially to our attention, and that is that while it sought to get rid of a system protected by law, it did so in the most approved constitutional manner, and never could it be laid to the charge of any of its members that they attempted to substitute any code of their own for the law of the land. Even when famine might have proved a sore inducement to outrage, the work of the League went on as peacefully as from the first.

Rest was now much wanted for Cobden, or rather that rest which is produced by change of scene and foreign travel. This he now sought, and made an extended tour in Europe. He, however, never forgot that for the principles of Free Trade to be wholly successful it was not sufficient that they should be adopted by England alone. With never flagging energy he persistently preached the doctrines of Free Trade, and in his interviews with many of the principal Statesmen and rulers of the countries he visited he lost no opportunity of dwelling on the advantages likely to flow from it. He visited France, Spain, Italy, Germany, and Russia, returning, after an absence of fourteen months, in the month of October, 1847. During his absence a general election had taken place, and he had the honour of a double return—for Stockport and the West Riding of Yorkshire. He elected to sit for the latter constituency, and continued to represent it until the appeal of Lord Palmerston to the country in 1857 to endorse his China policy, when Cobden, Bright, Gibson, and many others experienced the ingratitude of their respective constituencies. Two years later there was another election, and Cobden was returned for Rochdale without a contest, which borough he continued to represent for the rest of his life.

We do not purpose following Cobden's further career minutely; those who desire to do this must study Mr. Morley's volumes. We can only refer briefly to the part he took in some of the subsequent incidents of our history. As a corollary to the principles of Free Trade, or rather as flowing from them, he upheld the doctrine of non-intervention in the affairs of foreign countries, and the substitution of arbitration for war, in the settlement of quarrels between nations. At the same time, he was not a peace-at-any-price man, though he strongly condemned the foolish policy expressed in the saying Bellum para, si pacem velis. It was owing to his taking this attitude that he was brought into continuous opposition to Lord Palmerston, whom he regarded as the embodiment of a mischievous and vicious policy. In 1857 Lord Palmerston scored a victory, but later on the principles advocated by Cobden had begun to take effect. By them we were kept out of a war on behalf of Denmark against Prussia; by them we were enabled to settle our differences with the United States; and later still by them the nation managed to prevent an active intervention in the quarrel between Russia and Turkey. At the time of the Crimean war, however, these principles had not unfortunately obtained much hold, though Cobden and his friends did all in their power to stop it. Another thing, too, was effected by his instrumentality, and that was a change in the constitution of our ministries. Up to his time, in one sense, it mattered but little which party ruled; in either case the rulers were chosen from the ranks of the aristocracy or the great landowners. Commerce, trade, and manufacture had no representatives. But the action of the League caused the representatives of these great interests to be a power in the State, and when in 1855 Mr. Milner Gibson became President of the Board of Trade the thin end of the wedge was inserted, which has gradually widened the opening thus made.

Cobden was a member of the Liberal party, but an independent member. He always sought to raise all political questions above the level of party, and it is this high moral purpose which is the distinguishing trait of his career. We do not mean to say that no such purpose had ever before animated the minds of politicians, but we do say that it was a very prominent one with Cobden. As an instance of the way in which he would bring this spirit to bear upon matters in which it is likely to be overlooked, take his speech upon foreign loans in the year 1850. Not only, he said, was such a system a waste of national wealth, an anticipation of income, a destruction of capital, all of which are purely questions of political economy, but it was a direct connivance at acts and a policy which the very men who were thus asked to lend their money to support it professed to dislike and condemn. The men who lend their money for such purposes are destitute of the many excuses by which many men seek to justify the use of the sword. It is the cool calculation of the chances of profit and loss in a game in which human lives are at stake. This is a lofty morality, and one too frequently lost sight of in dealing with questions of money.

His independent character he preserved to the last; though more than once he was offered a place in the ministry, he always felt an insuperable objection to accepting it, believing he could best serve his country out of office. His negotiation of the French treaty was a wholly disinterested piece of work, and, though not carrying out to the full the principles of Free Trade, yet it was done in the hope that the mutual interest of the two nations would ultimately lead to the complete adoption of those principles. Whether he was right in refusing office we do not presume to offer an opinion. His great friend, Mr. Bright, held that he was, but Mr. Bright has since held office himself. With the opinions Cobden held of Lord Palmerston, we confess that we do not think that he could have worked harmoniously, and, therefore, probably he judged rightly in refusing.

Some questions have been raised as to whether Cobden was a religious man. We do not quite know how such questions have come to be raised, unless it be due to an expression of Mr. Morley's, to the effect that "on religious questions he was for the most part silent." Nominally he was a member of the Church of England, but he was no great admirer of the Establishment, and even if he had been, the fact would not in itself have constituted him a religious man. In early life he was a great admirer and a frequent correspondent of George Combe. One, who knew and loved him well, has told us that his life was, to a large extent, based upon the Sermon on the Mount—"his was a life of perpetual self-sacrifice." Mr. Bright, when he said this, knew what he meant, and we confess that with this testimony before us we do not care to inquire very minutely into the actual creed he professed. There came a period in his life when a terrible bereavement sorely tried him, but we find him submitting to it with a most tender humility, and deprecating the harsh judgment of those who would condemn his wife for a rebellious spirit. Of course all this might have been the result of a purely philosophic coldness, or the calm resignation of an Agnostic, but there is nothing to justify us in so believing.

A spiteful critic has spoken of these volumes as the "Life of a Bagman, by a Cockney." Never was this double sneer more distinctly misapplied. That Cobden was a man of trade no one for a moment disputes; that he brought a spirit far above sordid money getting to bear upon political questions is abundantly clear. Mr. Disraeli had no special reason to love Cobden, yet he has said, "there is this consolation remaining to us when we remember our unequalled and irreparable losses, that these great men are not altogether lost to us, that their words will be often quoted in this House, that their examples will often be referred to and appealed to, and that even their expressions may form part of our discussions. There are, indeed, I may say, some members of Parliament who, though they may not be present, are still members of this House, are independent of dissolutions, of the caprices of constituencies, and even of the course of time. I think that Mr. Cobden was one of these men." With this testimony we can afford to allow the critic to spit his venom at the dead Cobden. Living, he served his country; dead, the principles he did so much to advocate, the spirit he brought to bear on matters affecting the common weal, continue to make his influence felt, and to hand his name down to posterity as a true patriot, and one of the most distinguished ornaments of the Victorian age. Our Little Life, Essays Consolatory and Domestic.
Longmans. 1882.

This is another of the pleasant little books in which our mild essayist "A. K. H. B." meanders in his usual way over the surface of modern ethical questions. Most of the essays, we believe, have appeared in the periodicals, and there is little to distinguish them from nineteen previous works of just the same class by the same writer, except that he recognises that he is at last growing old, and that that fact has given a ripper and welcomer tone to his reflections on the duties and burdens of life. "After all these Years," "Of Parting Company," "Concerning the Cheerfulness of the Old" are the results of the experience of the author's advancing years; and there is a healthy cheerful tone about them which makes us like and respect the author notwithstanding his weaknesses. There is a liberal tone, too, in religious matters, which shows that the writer—cautiously—sympathises with the Broad Church school in the Establishment, and all the references to English cathedrals and the dignified ceremonial of the English Church indicates that he is in these matters something of a High Churchman, wherein again we thoroughly concur with him, heterodox Nonconformists as we are.

The longest essay in the volume is that on "Lord Campbell," a review of the recently-published memoir, containing also some pleasant local reminiscences. It is interesting to read that the writer was himself brought up for the legal profession, and came into contact early in life with some of the famous leaders of the English Bar. We gather from more than one occasional allusion that he almost regrets the exchange of his profession. It is a singular and sad fact, he says, that nearly all the best men in his present profession are profoundly dissatisfied, and regret that they are there. Many a time has he heard the words "If I had to begin my life again it would not be here." And, he adds, with much truth, that "a system is in a bad way which, to conciliate the stupidest and sourest of its supporters, alienates all its best and worthiest sons,"—an evident allusion to the heresy cases, which are enough to disgust the Liberals of the Scotch Church.

The essay on "The Ideal of a National Church" is an interesting plea for comprehension on very much the same lines as those laid down by Dr. Vance Smith. The author himself calls it "an impractical imagination," but if theologians, and laymen, too, were a little more reasonable and a little less prejudiced it would be quite within the range of practical ecclesiastical politics in Scotland, where the leading sects have separated from the Establishment only on infinitesimal points of Church discipline, and are substantially at one with it in theological doctrine. In his imaginary scheme the writer would have varieties of modes of worship recognised and included—both the liturgical service, "which must evermore commend itself to the more cultivated, and the extemporaneous, flexible service, with its great power of adaptation to present circumstances, which will always attract the poor." As to Church government, he adopts the broad principle of Hooker, that the most useful government is that which governs best, whose practical conveniences and advantages are greatest; and he disclaims belief that any Church government is of Divine authority in such a sense as to make every other Church government wrong. His general conclusion is that in the ideal national Church there should be as little governing as possible, unless by appeal to that law which is open to all; and that what governing is needful is best exercised by a hierarchy, whether Episcopalian or Presbyterian. He evidently has a lingering affection for the Episcopalian system and a scarcely confessed hankering for the flesh-pots of Egypt, the dignities, and palaces and incomes and social position of the higher clergy of the Anglican Establishment. He relates plaintively that he has seen at a quasi-public dinner, north of the Tweed, the poorest squire carefully provided for at the high table, while a learned ecclesiastical dignitary—was it "A. K. H. B.?"—was left to struggle with the ruck and to fight for sitting-room; and he adds, "it is evil where the parson is in contempt," and he laments that such a man as Chalmers "walks into dinner behind the shabbiest honourable," while men and women, old and young, bow humbly to "his Grace the Archbishop." All this he allows is trivial enough, but it is only too evident that in his heart he hankers for the ecclesiastical dignity and social prestige of the benefited English clergy. The essay, interesting as it is, is not a particularly valuable contribution to the settlement of an important question—which, in Scotland, at least, will probably be soon solved by Disestablishment.

There are some good stories in the book; one of the best is the following:—

There was a decent man in recent days who had published certain volumes of inexpressibly unreadable verse. On a certain occasion he was conversing with a friend, and, as was his wont, he led the talk to that which was to him the greatest of all things; to wit, Himself. With a sigh he said that it behoved him to be diligent in making the most of the time that remained to him, forasmuch as his time was short. His friend asked with awakened curiosity what it was he meant. "Ah," he replied, mournfully, "you know all great geniuses die at thirty-seven." The friend, eager to comfort him, entreated him to discard the notion that he was to be prematurely cut off, assuring him that he did not run the smallest risk of dying at the peculiar age to great geniuses. But the friend informed me that, instead of being cheered by the communication and grateful to him who conveyed it, the poet glowed with indignation.

The Westminster Review. Triibner and Co.

The January number of this able Quarterly opens with an article on "The Early Progress of Christianity," endeavouring, after the manner of the celebrated fifteenth chapter in Gibbon's History, to trace the natural as contradistinguished from the supernatural causes conducing to the rapid spread and general acceptance of the Christian religion during the first three centuries of its history. The tone of the writer is sufficiently indicated by one of his first sentences, in which he speaks of the Christian religion as "founded by Jesus of Nazareth, a young Jew, whose parents were of high and ancient descent, and of good social position." He is assumed, without much evidence, to have "associated himself with one or other of those numerous philosophico-religious sects with which at that time Judea abounded." His announcement of the kingdom of heaven is characterised as "the splendid yet egotistic dream of a self-deluded enthusiast." The writer concedes, however, that if we strip the religion of Jesus of one or two excrescences we must pronounce it to be animated by a pure and high morality and aiming at a useful and practical virtue. The Essayist then proceeds to attribute the extraordinary and rapid progress of the Christian faith, first to causes predisposing the Roman world to receive a new religion arising from a wide-spread dissatisfaction with the forms of the traditional religious beliefs, and the powerful development both of religious emotion and mental activity; secondly, the wide dispersion of the Jewish race, the character and devotion of the earlier professors of Christianity, and the expansion of their religion under St. Paul's influence from Judaic sectarianism into Christian Catholicity; and thirdly, the moral and spiritual excellence of the religion they preached. The essay is ably written, and is well worth reading and comparing with Gibbon's famous chapter, however inadequate may be the causes assigned for the early progress of Christianity.

We pass on to a kindred subject in the scholarly Essay on "The Stoics," of whose philosophical and ethical system an interesting account is given, based on Zeller's recently translated "History of Greek Philosophy." Then follows, almost by natural transition again, an article on "George Eliot as a Moral Teacher," the conclusion from a comprehensive review of her works being that "she breathed an elevating spirit into every subject that she touched, and that her highest claim to our gratitude is not her literary excellence, great as that is; not her wit, humour, or pathos; but the noble purpose which gave to her genius a larger life."

"The Coronation Oath no Bar to Legislation" is an elaborate historical review, showing that in all ages of our history the monarch, whatever his or her private views or feelings, has been bound to govern us "according to the statutes in Parliament agreed on," and that, therefore, the Coronation Oath can never be used by monarch or minister, and should not be invoked by educated people to block the way to any Parliamentary enactment, howsoever great the issues involved. This looks very much like an elaborate proof of what all educated people are thoroughly agreed upon; and we should have been more interested in an article showing the inutility of all Parliamentary oaths and declarations, and vows of allegiance to the reigning monarch.

The remaining articles are, "The Basis of England's Power in India," the main object of which is to show that the discordant races of India must all submit to one dominant race, and that ours is the most tolerant of all rules; "India and our Colonial Empire," a critical survey, going over the widest ground in a necessarily brief and superficial way; "Working Class Insurance as it is," exposing the shameful mismanagement of a vast number of Friendly Societies; "Town Smoke and Town Fog," waging relentless warfare with the two demons that now tyrannise over us; and "Richard Cobden," another valuable review of John Morley's "Life," adding some particulars from other sources not hitherto generally known.

The number closes with the usual critical survey of "Contemporary Literature," beginning with a review of Dr. Davidson's new edition of his invaluable "Introduction to the New Testament."

The British Quarterly Review. Hodder and Stoughton.

The January number of this always able Review does not interest us so much as some of its predecessors, and there is no article that stands out in special prominence over the others. All the Quarterlies must have a hard struggle for life, when there are three monthly Reviews of commanding ability competing with them on their own ground, and dealing with subjects of the day in all the freshness of living interest.

The first article, "The Literary Clubs of Paris," is a lively sketch of several long-forgotten societies of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, which reads curiously out of place in the sedate organ of cultured Dissent.

More in accordance with the character and objects of the Review are the next two articles; one, "A Sketch of Individual Development," by George Macdonald, in which the accomplished novelist traces the birth of the will, the influence of poetry and science, the revelation of love, the mysteries of life and death, in the style of the sermons scattered so profusely through his fictions; the other, an antiquarian article on "The Culdees and their Later History," that is, the old extinct Celtic Church in Ireland, which became extinct at the beginning of the sixteenth century.

There are two other articles bearing on ecclesiastical and theological questions—"Count Campello," a singularly unfavourable sketch, by Mr. T. A. Trollope, of the latest convert from Rome, whose autobiography we recently reviewed, and who, if the facts alleged are correct, is no great loss to Rome, and no desirable acquisition for any other religious communion; and a not very profound review of "Westcott and Hort's Greek Testament," concluding with a wholly inadequate rejoinder to Dean Burgon's tremendous onslaught on the new Revision and its text in the last number of the Quarterly Review.

There are two articles of a political and sociological nature, which, to our mind, are decidedly the most interesting in the number. The first is a review of John Morley's recent "Life of Richard Cobden," by our friend William Clarke, of Cambridge, formerly one of our own contributors, and is quite the best account of the book and estimate of Cobden's character and work that we have yet seen. The other article is an extremely valuable and almost exhaustive statistical account of "The Industrial Resources of Ireland," from the pen of Mr. F. R. Conder. The writer's main conclusions are that Ireland may safely challenge any European country north of the Alps for wealth in natural resources; that she possesses in each of the three kingdoms of nature, in the products of air, water, earth, and what lies under the earth, the chief of those treasures which elsewhere are not found together; but—that fatal "but!"—these great natural stores of wealth are unsolicited by human industry; and the "Island of the Saints," which might be made a terrestrial paradise, is certainly something quite the reverse.

The number is brought to a close with the usual copious notices of "Contemporary Literature" of the quarter.

Short Notices.

The Clerical World has in its first number for the new year a capital photograph of Archbishop Tait, cabinet size, together with an interesting biographical sketch. There are also sermons by the Revs. Phillips Brooks, of Boston, U.S.A., and Dr. Horatius Bonar. A new feature in this number is a "Symposium"—what, another!—on the subject, "Within What Limits are Schools of Thought Desirable in a Religious Community?" The Rev. A. Plummer, Master of University College, Durham, opens the discussion, and states his position as follows:—

"It would seem to be manifest that a religious community which values its existence must require its specially authorised teachers to avow in plain and solemn language a loyal adherence to its formularies. This is the least that can with safety be required; and this minimum is perhaps all that it is wise to require. After the teacher has once subscribed to the articles of faith, it will be best in the long run to leave the interpretation of the subscription to his own conscience, at least as far as penalties are concerned. The cases in which a man who has subscribed to a creed, flagrantly contravenes it in his teaching, are not common, and they may safely be left to public opinion and public controversy. It is not often that a person holding the opinions of Mr. Voysey wishes to remain a clergyman in the Church of England; and when he does, he wins far more influence and sympathy in the attitude of a martyr than in that of a discredited cleric. Englishmen respect freedom of thought, but they respect honourable practice also; and they may be trusted to condemn a man who takes a salary for teaching one thing while he teaches the very opposite.

"A Church whose ministry is fenced in this way, and whose laity is left practically unfettered in the matter of external restrictions on belief, has far more to hope than to fear from the very large amount of liberty that it permits. Reasonable security being taken that the great central truths professed by the community shall not be contradicted by its official teachers, far more good than harm will come from each teacher being allowed to insist upon whatever subjects he may consider to be most edifying, and to treat even these central truths in his own way. Truth is infinite in range, and the modes in which its many aspects may be presented are inexhaustible. Let each teacher take the side which impresses him and deal with it as his reason and conscience may dictate. With the widest division of labour and the greatest variety of exposition we shall still have much that has been only most imperfectly and obscurely presented. From various points of view we find the three great schools, High, Low, and Broad, presenting themselves; and that religious community is impoverished in vital power, and out of trim in balance, which does not possess all three. Truth may be considered in three relations; to the whole body of believers, to the individual soul, to humanity and the universe at large. In teaching the truth we may appeal to authority, to the emotions, or to reason. We may base our doctrine and practice on antiquity, on private interpretation of Scripture, or on enlightenment. Everywhere we are confronted by the characteristics of the three prevailing schools. They are not in themselves mutually exclusive; and disruption and decay will be the result of artificially making them so. Rightly understood, they mutually imply one another; and each is the natural complement of the other two. The fact that the existence of all three side by side involves much friction produces far more gain than loss. In the world of thought, as in the world of action, there is no life without friction. The dangers of liberty in religion may be great: but the dangers of bondage are far greater. The one may lead to extravagance and error; the other is sure to end in stagnation and deceit. Sloth and falsehood are the natural vices of the slave. Far better that the Church should admit some error, than that it should lose its interest, and cease to make progress, in the truth. Far better that a man should conscientiously teach what is erroneous, than that he should deliberately profess a belief which he knows that he does not hold.

"The principle of limitation, therefore, would seem to be this:—that each religious community should have its own creed, a plain statement of beliefs which it holds to be central and vital; and that its authorised teachers should be required to subscribe to that creed, and promise not to teach what contradicts it. Beyond this, all teaching and all acceptance of teaching should be left to the conscience of the individual and the influence of public opinion in the community."

Literary Notes.

THE University of Würzburg intends to celebrate in August the tercentenary of its foundation.

A CHAIR of Celtic has been instituted in the College de France; and M. de Jubainville has been appointed to fill it.

THE jubilee of Chambers's Journal will be celebrated in February. Dr. William Chambers, one of the two original projectors of this venerable and still highly successful periodical, continues to edit it, being assisted by his nephew, Mr. Robert Chambers.

A STATUE of Zwingli is to be erected at Zurich, at a cost not to exceed £80,000, and sculptors of all nations are invited to compete.

MESSRS. LONGMAN announce "Reminiscences of Oriel College and the Oxford Movement," by Mr. T. Mozley, formerly Fellow of Oriel.

H.R.H. THE PRINCESS LOUISE is about to contribute to Good Words a series of drawings illustrative of Quebec and its neighbourhood. They are now being engraved, and will be published immediately, along with historical and descriptive notes, and a long poem on Quebec by the Marquis of Lorne.

MR. BLANCHARD JERROLD is engaged on a work on Egypt, which will be published shortly, and will be entitled "The Belgium of the East."

THE two volumes of Mr. Froude's "Life of Carlyle," which will be published in the spring, will not be a complete biography, as some of the papers have supposed, but will be confined to the first forty years of his life, 1795-1835.

WE quote from the New York Publishers' Weekly two regulations of the Post-office department of the United States affecting post-cards:—"There is nothing in the postal law prohibiting a 'dun,' or a threat of prosecution, being sent in the mail by a postal card. It is the duty of a postmaster to examine postal cards, and to see that they contain no improper matters; but they [sic] must not disclose the contents."

THE Academy says that Mr. E. A. Freeman's lecturing tour in the United States promises to leave some results of permanent value. At many of the towns the librarians of the public libraries have issued what may be called "bibliographical helps," indicating the books that illustrate the subject of Mr. Freeman's lectures. At the suggestion also of Mr. Freeman and Mr. Bryce the Historical Society of Maryland has petitioned the Legislature for an annual grant towards the publication of the State Records.

MR. HENRY WOODS, painter, and Mr. G. F. Bodley, architect, have been elected Associates of the Royal Academy of Arts.

WE are authorised to state that "Pendal Hyndburn," the admirable autobiographical story by the Rev. W. Mitchell which has appeared in successive numbers of the Unitarian Herald, will be published in a book form as soon as a sufficient number of subscribers can be obtained.

MESSRS. LONGMAN announce as nearly ready two volumes of Lord Beaconsfield's speeches, which are to be edited, with notes and a preface, by Mr. T. E. Kebbel.

MR. JOHN JONES, who died a few days ago at his residence, 93, Piccadilly, in his eighty-third year, has bequeathed to the nation a large and valuable collection of works of art.

PROFESSOR HARNACK has just completed a work on the Greek Apologists of the Second Century, according to the Church tradition, which will, no doubt, throw much light on this important subject.

SIGNOR GALLEYA will shortly publish a work in which he will give an account of his recent travels in Russia. He was unfortunately prevented from visiting Siberia.

THE editor of the Burlington has received a characteristic letter from Mr. Ruskin upon the article "True Aesthetics" in the current number of the magazine. The world knows his opinions upon the subject, but he fears it is labour in vain to open blind eyes to the great truth that the perceptive of beauty ought to include moral as well as physical perfection.

BOURNEMOUTH.—On Sunday, January 8, Unitarian services were commenced at the board room of the town-hall here, when the Rev. F. T. Reed, of Poole, preached. The attendance on this occasion was small, owing to the unfavourable weather and the short notice given. On the 15th inst. the service was conducted by one of the local friends, and the audience numbered sixteen residents, besides a few friends from Poole.

CHELMSFORD.—A very kind gift of £20 has been sent to the Secretary of the congregation here, in the name of the late Samuel Sharpe. The £20 thus received and subsequent donations, the result of the kindly interest of Mr. Edwin Lawrence, will materially aid in the endeavour to clear off the expenses of the late improvements.

LIVERPOOL: HOSPITAL SUNDAY.—The complete returns of collections in our Liverpool churches on Hospital Sunday are as follows:—Renshaw-street, £493 18s. 3d.; Hope-street, £71 7s.; Hope-street, Sunday-school, 16s.; Gateacre, £33 6s. 5d.; Ancient Chapel, Toxteth-park, £17 6s. 5d.; Hamilton-road, Everton, £4 2s. 9d.; Beaufort-street, Domestic Mission, £2 1s. 1d.; Bond-street Domestic Mission, £1 5s.

THE TAUCHNITZ LIBRARY.—This library, by means of which the most remarkable productions of British authors during the last forty years have been made known all over Europe, now numbers 2,000 volumes. The last on the list is a view of "English Literature in the Reign of Victoria, with a Glance at the Past." It is from the pen of Professor Henry Morley, whose qualifications for the task have been amply demonstrated by his previous writings on this subject. By reason of its size the work is necessarily more in the nature of a catalogue raisonné than an elaborate analysis, but in many instances the distinctive characteristics of a writer are clearly described. The value and interest of the volume, which is published in England by Messrs. Sampson Low and Co., are enhanced by a frontispiece comprising fac-similes of the autographs of those who have contributed to the Tauchnitz collection, and among whom are Dickens, Thackeray, Carlyle, Macaulay, Robert Browning, George Eliot, Lytton, Cardinal Newman, Lord Beaconsfield, Washington Irving, Kingsley, Ainsworth, Douglas Jerrold, Shirley Brooks, Alexander Dyce, Hepworth Dixon, Charles Lever, the Hon. Mrs. Norton, "Ouida," E. A. Freeman, Charles Reade, Mackenzie Wallace, and last, but not least, Mark Twain.

A BILL to legalise marriage with a deceased wife's sister will be introduced in the Canadian Parliament during the present session.

DISESTABLISHMENT IN SCOTLAND.

The Times, writing on the attitude of the churches in Scotland towards the Disestablishment question, says:—

It is not always easy to make out what the Free Church position is. There is no doubt as to what it was at the beginning. The Free Churchmen deliberately and for conscience sake separated from the Established Church, accepted the duty of supporting the ministers whom they claimed the right to choose for themselves, and asked only to be left alone to worship in their own way, and to administer their own affairs after the best and most approved model. The demand was moderate and it was irresistible. They have had their own way as a matter of course, but it has not led in quite the direction they fancied it would. Their credit and influence have not grown as they ought to have done in accordance with established precedents. The Church they left has got on very well without them. The decline has been in their own ranks. The ideal which they were one day to realise—that of a pure Church conterminous with a Christian State—has not been fulfilled. The Free Church has always been in a certain sense an aggressive body in will and purpose, thought not in act. To be a free Church in a free State has not been enough for it. As the depositary of the truth it can claim more from the State than a cheap and barren toleration. Disestablishment all round would have had a certain fairness about it, but it is only as a choice of evils that the voice of the Free Church has been given for it. As things have turned out it has become every year more and more evident that the Free Church was not the Church of Scotland. The victory and the spoils have gone together. The Established Church has managed to obtain both of them. The Free Church has thus, in addition to its freedom and its purity, the solid possession of a grievance. This treasure it will not suffer to be unemployed. It may not be possible to use it for the direct benefit of its owners, but it may none the less be found available for doing mischief to somebody else. Establishment, as the Free Church admits, is a good thing in itself, but it is the saints, and not the sinners, who have a right to it. Better no establishment than a bad one, says Principal Rainy; and an establishment which does nothing and promises nothing for the Free Church is so obviously bad that it carries its own condemnation with it, before a Free Church meeting at all events. The Established Church, to Principal Rainy's view, can hardly present itself as a Christian body at all. It does not represent the religious life of the nation; it is not in harmony with Church principles, or, what comes to much the same thing, it embodies a denial of Free Church principles. It is too bad to be reformed. It is fit only to be swept away so as to make room for the Church of the future, a strong, united Presbyterian body, able to put pressure upon the Government and to get something more than fair play. For Dr. Begg, too, the proper type of things is a national religion embodied in a State Church. But this religion must be something more than national. It must possess the characteristics, not of the State Church as it is, but of the Free Church. To Dr. Begg, no less than to Principal Rainy, the Established Church is past hope of improvement. The difference between these two authorities seems to be that Dr. Begg is the more sanguine as to getting the State to side with him. Principal Rainy will be content if the State will smite his foes. The blow is to be one from which the Free Church can have nothing to apprehend. Cantabit vacuus. The Establishment alone will suffer from it.

At the time of the Free Church schism or separation, or whatever we are to term it, Lord Cockburn ventured on a prediction which seems in fair way of being fulfilled. His view was that the Free Church would gain in many ways by the change, but that it would become more fanatical. We make no question as to the earnestness of the present Free Churchmen, or as to various other spiritual gifts which they claim and, no doubt, possess. There is one virtue in which they are a little wanting, and one, too, which we have good authority for preferring to all others—the virtue of charity. The virtue of minding their own business is of a lower and more mundane kind, and for this, too, they are just as little conspicuous. For a pretty complete example of fanatical and uncharitable meddlesomeness we need not look further than to the late proceedings of the Metropolitan Presbytery. The model is far from being an attractive one, nor do we think the Scotch fancy will be much caught by the hope that if the views of the Presbytery are adopted it may prove by and by the universal model to which all Scotland will be bound under penalties to conform.

RELIGION IN NEW ENGLAND.

The Boston Sunday Herald speaks encouragingly of the "Religious Situation in New England":—

The changes in religious opinion at present operative in New England communities are chiefly in one direction. Whatever may be the ecclesiastical fold in which people are gathered, the drift is unmistakable. It is believed that the statistics go to show that the membership of the churches, as compared with what it was half or a quarter of a century ago, indicates a positive advance upon the ratio of population, but the members of the churches, like the people outside of them, have insensibly changed their religious belief. Thousands who regarded church membership as the securing of a religious home are hardly affected by changes in religious opinion. They enjoy the ethical and emotional part of religion, and think of nothing else. Not so the thoughtful people in the community. They have shifted their base. The old theology of New England has been superseded, and the system by which three separate Gods were conceived to govern the world is now essentially exchanged for the system by which one God rules the heavens and the earth. . . If theism has succeeded in any large sense to the Puritan conception of Christianity, it is a theism which does not mean an attack upon Christianity, but an attempt to present the fundamental truths of religion afresh to the minds and hearts of men. The old hostility has passed away, and the day is bright with such enthusiasm for humanity that the divine Father seems nearer to men than he did at an earlier day. Then, again, it seems as if the existing denominations were reaching out to a larger grasp of the truth, a larger social and ethical sympathy, a larger sense of what Christianity means for the active life of the world, than before. It is the unconscious purpose, working secretly in men's minds and hearts, to place Christianity anew upon the free and broad basis of the great historical creeds, and to broaden the interpretation of these creeds until they include all that belongs to the free, full, and conscious life of men. In both the Theistic and the Conservative directions the religious situation in New England is more encouraging than perhaps at any time in the last fifty years. The long reaches of a process of development are beginning to manifest themselves.

A VISIT TO TRANSYLVANIA.

The Rev. J. H. Allen, of Boston, U.S.A., has given an interesting narrative of his recent visit to Transylvania in four letters to the Christian Register. He describes the meeting of the Consistory of Kolozsvár, of which our Hungarian correspondent, Professor George Boros gave a more extended account, and in his last letter sums up his general impressions as follows:—

Transylvania is a territory something more than twice as large as Massachusetts. For nearly a hundred and eighty years it has been incorporated in the kingdom of Hungary, being that part of it which rests, to the east and south, against the old frontier of Turkey. Hungary itself is, to most intents and purposes, an independent constitutional kingdom, having for its king the Emperor of Austria, Francis Joseph, who appears to be well-meaning and honest in dealing with this part of his dual empire, and to be personally popular and esteemed. The territory of Hungary is in all just about as large as New England, New York, and New Jersey put together; its population considerably less, being about sixteen million. Of these about half are of Hungarian or Magyar stock,—a race of great vigour, of great national pride and independence of temper, and bound together by the tie of a language which completely separates them (so far) from the rest of Europe, and which they cling to with proportionate zeal and fondness. Not only is it the popular tongue everywhere spoken, but it is fertile in books, newspapers, journals,—in short, a native literature, vigorous and abundant. We must begin, then, by understanding that this is the race with which we have to do, and that their language is the medium through which our friends propose to do their work.

The other half of the population is made up of a great mixture of races, who do not mingle and merge together, as the different populations have done so extensively among us, but keep up distinctions of blood and language, which are a source of incessant jealousy and anxiety; of dangerous and threatening hostility, too, sometimes, as in the revolution of 1848-49, and in the dread of a Pan-Slavic crusade during the agitation of the Eastern war so close upon their boundaries. To say nothing of others, there are the two great stocks, Slavic and German. Of these, I may say, perhaps, that the Slavs are regarded with more distrust, as a large and growing population, ignorant, unambitious, abject subjects of the Eastern Church, and the likely tool of Eastern political intrigues. They have also shown themselves, as in 1849, capable of great ferocity and treachery toward their Hungarian masters, having doubtless some old scores of blood-feud, or memories of oppression, to wipe away. Especially under the name Wallachian, or (as they call themselves) Roumanian,—i.e., the assumed descendants of Roman colonists—they make a decided majority in Transylvania, where they do the most of the farm-labour, and where their swarthy complexions, black elf-locks, and occasionally the beauty of face and bright costume and gay head-dress of the peasant-girls, make a picturesque variety to the eye.

The German population, not quite so numerous as these, I take to be invaluable, industrious, intelligent, and peace-loving people, objects of jealousy chiefly (if at all) on the one ground of the strong desire of national independence, which chafes at the comparatively loose and easy tie that links the Hungarian kingdom to the military empire of the Hapsburgs. The Germans, or "Saxons" as they are called, of Transylvania were invited there as colonists, about seven hundred years ago, to fill the void made by wars and invasions and the waste of men in the Crusades. These may be regarded as thoroughly nationalised and thoroughly loyal.

Again, the native Hungarian or Magyar population in Transylvania consists mainly of the Szeklers, whom we may call the Highlanders of the district, as having their home in the mountainous country toward the eastern boundary, in number something over half a million. These are the singularly vigorous, sturdy, and valiant race of which I have been speaking, mostly, all along. We shall not mistake very far if we call them the Yankees of Hungary. They regard themselves (if I may say so) as the pith and core of the Magyar stock, and as the oldest settled population of the country, if not of modern Europe; having, as they claim, held their seat among these hills at least since the invasion of Attila, early in the fifth century. I do not pretend to decide what was their source, originally. They are commonly said to be of Tartar or Hunnish stock, and appear to think so themselves; saying, however, that the old historians, in terror of their invasion, made a frightful caricature of the race, which has figured as their likeness ever since, and which we find, vigorously copied, in the pen-and-ink portrait drawn by Gibbon. Philologists, too, say that their language is allied to Turkish and Finnish, and set them down as "Turanian." But I have seen somewhere mention of a tribe living in Western Asia, not far from the Caspian, that was caught up and swept on in the great Hunnish inroad, and may have made this stock of mountaineers. At any rate, they have no one trace of what we commonly think of as Turanian or Tartar, and, if they are not pure Caucasian, then (to my thinking) they ought to be.

Now, when the Reformation was proclaimed in Germany, three hundred and fifty years ago, the eager intelligence of these people quickly caught the movement, and Hungary became very largely Protestant. Moreover, within a few years, the Unitarian doctrine had been preached there to such effect—favoured by the national genius of the people, more Asiatic (they think) than European—that it became the ordinary type of Protestantism throughout Hungary. The State religion, however, remained Catholic; and, under the repressive policy of the Hapsburgs, Unitarianism was gradually crushed out in the great Hungarian plain. It survived, however, in a vigorous and staunch community, among those sturdy mountaineers; and though at this day they number not so many as sixty thousand in all, they are as true to their faith and their organisation as the most devoted church or sect or population to be found anywhere. Their one hundred and six congregations, with very modest ecclesiastical properties (most of which were seized and turned to Catholic uses by the Government in 1716, and for a few years later), have held their own in a quiet, inviolable way, which shows their determination to do their own work, and do it well, in absolute indifference whether their numbers are to be reckoned by hundreds or by millions.

They do this under one strong conviction, which we, at least, can thoroughly understand and honour. It is that the education and the intellectual destinies of the Hungarian nation are in great measure in their hands. Their attitude towards the nation at large is thus exactly the same as that asserted for the descendants of the Puritans in America; or, still more precisely, what is claimed for the Liberal or Unitarian movement in New England, in its working out on the opinions and ideas, the education and philanthropies, of the United States.

And this position seems to be conceded to them with a frankness and a lack of jealousy that we should hardly expect. Religious bigotry does not appear to be a besetting sin of these Eastern populations, certainly not of those who live so near the shadow of a great ecclesiastical despotism. Accordingly, we find that a majority of the pupils in the schools which our friends maintain are sent to them from other communions, and that their primacy in the great work of education is cheerfully conceded by their neighbours. Their religious community, then, is first of all the fountain-head, singularly pure, simple, and domestic in its type of character, of an influence that flows, widening, through the veins of the most vigorous and intelligent race of South-eastern Europe.

And this work they will continue to do, as they have done, absolutely independent of whatever sympathy and aid they may receive from abroad. If they have ever laid any claim upon our aid, it was not in virtue of their impotency, but of our opportunity. For pure missionary service, economised to the last penny, and sure to go in the direction of the utmost benefit to a great people, whose history—at least, the most important phase of it—may be said to be just beginning, it would be hard to show anywhere a stronger claim or a surer economy than here.

I say this very confidently; because, though my stay among them was fewer days than Mr. Morrison's was weeks—and he can testify to a thousand details, of which I know nothing, as to their family and church life—yet I had large opportunity of conversation, at the best central point of view, with those best able to instruct me. I seemed to find lines very closely parallel between their currents of thought and ours. The same questions, anxieties, duties, anticipations, seemed to beset their path that we are familiar with in ours. The training of some of the best of their younger men in England, and their eager study of modern thought, through the medium of English speech, count for much in all this. But the general result is the same—a sense of fellowship, a directness of sympathy, a community in work and in hope, that ought to make their cause very dear among us.

THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—With reference to criticisms which a programme like that for the National Conference may expect to incur, will you allow me to say that our Committee will anxiously consider any practical plan that may be brought before their notice for increasing the usefulness of the Conference? In matters hitherto arranged they have necessarily acted on their own judgment, and cannot, of course, reconsider questions finally settled; but they will welcome any suggestions by which their plans can be amended and improved.

Meantime I am gratified to say that almost every post brings me many letters of encouragement and adhesion from ministers and congregations in all parts of the United Kingdom; and that an influential Local Committee has been formed at Liverpool, which is taking action steps to endorse the success of the Conference.

A. W. WORTHINGTON.

Old Swinford, Stourbridge, Jan. 13.

P.S.—To the above letter I should like to add that "A Country Pastor" will find, on communicating with the secretary of his congregation, that his thoughtful suggestions have been practically anticipated by the Conference Committee.

SACRAMENTAL WINE.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—In a recent number of the Disciple there was a valuable article on "Sacramental Wine." I do not think the subject should be allowed to drop. I am sorry to find no reference to it in any subsequent number. It is, indeed, singular that at the Lord's Table there should be in use a wine so "heavy and heavy"—a "tinted, branded compound," as the writer says, "few persons now think of introducing at their own board." The case is too strong to be passed over in silence. The teetotal doctrine has now widely spread. Even Dr. Clarke declares perfect health to be incompatible with the habitual use of alcoholic liquor. Some change, then, must be made, or else the Communion Service will be still less acceptable than it now is. Here half measures, such as the writer advised, cannot answer. Any alcohol is known to be morally dangerous to those who have once exceeded. The very sight and touch of it is allowed to be, to them, truly dangerous, destroying the power of their will. Truthfulness is not to be expected from those who are under the influence of the poison. The writer did not believe in the existence of unfermented wine. But it is certain that the pure "fruit of the vine," or "blood of the grape," may be now easily obtained for the celebration of the Lord's Supper. Wine of this nature, proved to be genuine, is made by Frank Wright, High-street, Kensington. It is used by several churches in Belfast, as well as in England and Scotland. The matter has now been so thoroughly sifted by law courts that the genuineness of this wine cannot be doubted by any one who examines the evidence in its favour. The last witness, alone sufficient, is Dr. Norman Kerr, who thus spoke at a recent meeting in London of the Church Homiletical Society at the Chapter House, adjoining St. Paul's Cathedral, where Dr. W. B. Richardson was in the chair, and confirmed what was then stated:—

"It had been denied that unfermented grape juice could exist. [So thought the writer in the Disciple.] The lecturer felt bound to test the objection, and spent nearly a year in an extended and crucial series of experiments with grapes and grape juice. He found that grape juice could be preserved unfermented and unintoxicating by a variety of processes, and now showed a large number of these specimens both in a solid and a liquid form. By a diagram, eight different kinds of unintoxicating wine were shown to have been described by Greek and Latin writers, and the lecturer exhibited about twenty different samples of unfermented wine prepared by himself three years previously. A large assortment of pure unfermented grape juice, from America, France, Germany, Portugal, Australia, London, and other parts of the world, some sold by wine-growers as 'pure unfermented wine,' was also shown. The only unfermented wine in the English market at present, which he could recommend as genuine, was that made by Mr. Frank Wright, of Kensington. The lecturer also displayed liquid unfermented grape juice, imported by himself from the East, and ordered under the designation of a word which was one of the names for wine in two Eastern languages."

Since then I hear that many of the clergy have gone over the works of Mr. Wright, to be satisfied by sight and taste of the truth. I understand that Dr. N. Kerr's paper, with full explanation, is now to be had separately.

LOVER OF FACTS.

THE SUNDAY SOCIETY.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—Through the liberality of the Council of the Society of British Artists the Winter Exhibition of Paintings and Sculpture at the Gallery in Suffolk-street has been open to the members of the Sunday Society to-day, from four o'clock to seven p.m., the numbers attending being 466. Next Sunday (Jan. 22) the Exhibition will be open to the public, free, by tickets which will be issued by the Sunday Society to all persons making written application and sending stamped and addressed envelope for reply to the Honorary Secretary, 8, Park-place-villas, W. In order that these visits may be as instructive and interesting as possible, a cheap edition of the catalogue has been published. We beg you, by publishing this letter, to help us in giving publicity to this opportunity of spending a few hours on Sunday in a pleasurable and harmless manner.

THOMAS BURR, M.P., President; W. H. CORFIELD, M.A., M.D., Chairman of Committee; MARK H. JUDGE, Honorary Secretary.

SCARBOROUGH.—The Rev. A. Amos, of Southampton, has received and accepted a unanimous invitation to become minister of the Unitarian congregation, in succession to the Rev. Dendy Agate, B.A., who has removed to Gorton. He will commence his ministry on the first Sunday in April.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

COUNCIL MEETING.

The third meeting of the Council for the Session 1881-82 was held at the offices of the Association in Norfolk-street, on Wednesday afternoon; Joseph Lupton, Esq., J.P., of Leeds in the chair. There were also present the Revs. R. Spears, D. Amos, T. L. Marshall, R. Shaen, J. Worthington; and Messrs. Harwood (Pendleton), D. Martineau, H. Jeffery, R. Pincock, B. Lewis (Newport, Isle of Wight), C. J. G. Eiloart, J. T. Preston, T. C. Clarke, S. S. Tayler, Treasurer; and the Rev. H. Ierson, Secretary.

The minutes of the last meeting were read and confirmed. The Report of the Executive Committee of their work since the preceding meeting of the Council was also read and received, on the motion of Mr. S. S. TAYLER, seconded by the Rev. R. SPEARS.

THE REPORT.

The Committee regret that they have again to record the decease of several members of the Council since the last meeting, Mr. T. W. Bagehot, Mr. S. W. Browne, and Mr. C. Moore, Vice-Presidents of the Association; and the Rev. Goodwyn Barnby, one of its Home Correspondents. They have communicated to the relatives of these honoured friends the expression of their sincere condolence and respect, as also to the daughters of the late Dr. Bluntschli, who had been for many years on our list of Foreign Correspondents.

The Committee learn with pleasure from Mr. C. Derzi, the minister of the new Unitarian congregation at Budapest, that some accessions to their number have taken place, and that many non-Unitarians by profession attend the services with interest. The Bishop also gives a very encouraging report of the prospects of this new cause. He mentions that about £600 have been subscribed to the fund for the intended church building.

The chapel at Ashford, Kent, which was bought by the Kent and Sussex Association, with the view of establishing a Unitarian congregation in that place, has been offered by their Committee to the Association, they being unable from want of funds to continue the support to the Missionary hitherto given by them. This offer has been accepted, and the Committee hope that by renewed exertion the good work begun in that place may be extended and made permanent. Trustees have been appointed, who will engage to hold the property subject to the direction of the Association, and in the meantime upon an open trust for the worship of Almighty God. It is arranged that the engagement of the present Missionary shall terminate at the end of March, and the Committee are anxiously considering the question of whom to appoint as his successor.

It was not intended, when the regular Sunday services at Cambridge were discontinued, that no further effort should be made there, and the opinion has been frequently expressed that it would be desirable to maintain courses of lectures during terms. The Committee have endeavoured to arrange for the formation of classes for theological study in Cambridge, under some of our own Professors. This idea has not yet come to a practical issue, but in the meantime lectures have been given by the Rev. T. W. Freckleton and the Rev. E. M. Geldart, which were fairly attended. It is proposed to give another course in the term just begun.

The Provincial Meeting at Leicester on the 2nd November last was one of the most successful that the Association has ever held. The Committee were happy to acknowledge to the Rev. J. Page Hopps and to his congregation their deep sense of obligation to them for the cordial liberality with which they welcomed the Association on that most interesting occasion.

Visits have been made on behalf of the Association to Ipswich and Horsham at the opening of school and lecture rooms, at the dedication of the new church at Hull, and at the re-opening after some repairs and considerable improvements, at Chelmsford.

The work by Dr. G. Vance Smith, entitled "Texts and Margins of the Revised New Testament Version," has been published as the Council desired, and the reprint has been ordered of a tract, by Dr. Bellows, "God the Father, the only Proper Object of Worship." Copies also have been taken for distribution of a tract on "The Athanasian Creed," by the Rev. W. Birks, of Stroud.

The remaining stock of Dr. Channing's Works being five hundred copies on the better paper, the Committee have ordered them to be bound for sale or donation at the price (3s. 6d.) hitherto charged for the common edition. Thirty copies have been sent on application since the last report to ministers and theological students. The first five thousand of the shilling edition of the "Positive Aspects of Unitarian Thought and Doctrine" having been sold, another issue of the same number has been printed.

The remainder copies of sermons by the Rev. Robert Collyer on "Nature and Life," and "The Life That Now Is," in one volume, have been offered to the Association on advantageous terms, which the Committee are disposed to accept, with the approval of the Council, and with the object of selling the work at a much reduced price.

Grants of books have been made to the number of 370 since last October, partly to individuals, inquirers, and others, partly to chapel bazaars and libraries. Tracts also have been sent for distribution to Swansea and Merthyr in Wales, to Carlisle in Scotland, to Kentish Town, Portland-street, Walworth, Deptford, and Holloway, London, also to Southampton, Nottingham, Whitechurch, Trowbridge, Preston, Swinton, and Cambridge, besides packets of tracts and books to Budapest, New Zealand, and Simla, and a number of tracts given to inquirers through the office. The total number of tracts so distributed is over 13,600.

Grants have been made to seven ministers from the Bicentenary Ministers' Fund.

The ordinary mission grants for the year have been agreed to. Amongst these, numerous additions have been made to the list of recent years, amounting to about £600 over last year, in addition to £150 special grants to congregations and for lectures. Omitting the sum annually voted for the Hungarian student, the expenditure on Missions and congregations for the year, as at present arranged for, will be over £1,700. Larger help is to be given in some places; in some, grants that have been for a time suspended are renewed, and some are altogether new.

A communication has been received from the Secretary of the National Conference requesting the appointment of representatives of the Association to their meeting in Liverpool next April. The Committee, cordially appreciating the objects of the Conference, commend the matter to the attention of the Council.

Mr. JEFFERY moved, and Mr. HARWOOD seconded:—"That the Council heartily sympathise with the Committee in their expressions of condolence with the families of the late Mr. T. W. Bagehot, Mr. S. W. Browne, Mr. C. Moore, the Rev. Goodwyn Barmby and Dr. Bluntschli, and of deep respect for the memory of honoured friends whose cordial interest in its work has long proved of great service to the Association."

The SECRETARY read an encouraging letter from Bishop Ferencz respecting the new Unitarian church at Budapest.

THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

A communication was read from the committee of the National Conference requesting the appointment of representatives to their meeting on the 18th April next in Liverpool. A deputation specially nominated to represent the Council was appointed, together with the President, Treasurer, and Secretary, and such members of the Executive Committee as may be able to attend the Conference.

The preacher at the Whitsuntide meeting was then nominated, and some discussion took place in reference to the anniversary meetings past and future.

UNITARIAN STATISTICS.

The Rev. R. SPEARS called attention to the desirableness of collecting reports from the various churches of average attendance morning and evening, the institutions and trust funds connected with the church, the amount of money raised for all purposes. He moved:—"That it be an instruction to the Executive Committee to ascertain the numerical, institutional, and financial statistics of our churches, including trusts, with any other such information as might be of service to the Association." Mr. MARSHALL seconded the motion. A discussion ensued, in which Messrs. D. MARTINEAU, PRYNCK, and the Rev. D. AMOS took part. And the proceedings were brought to a close after a sitting of two hours, and ultimately the whole question was referred to the next meeting in the form of a notice of motion.

THE UNITARIAN HOME MISSIONARY BOARD.

The annual business meeting of the Unitarian Home Missionary Board was held on Tuesday afternoon in the Memorial Hall, Manchester. Mr. Harry Rawson, chairman of the Committee, was voted to the chair.

The Rev. C. C. COE read the twenty-seventh annual report, from which we make the following extracts:—

In presenting their twenty-seventh annual report, the Committee express their belief that the work of the past year will bear comparison with any of its predecessors in educational efficiency, and that the effort to raise the standard of instruction will be approved by the friends of the Institution, since it is calculated to meet the growing demand for culture in the ministry at large; while it will not be found, as their experience shows, to lessen the zeal for missionary effort.

The Rev. J. E. ODGERS, M.A., has, for some past, conducted a Latin class, at which attendance was voluntary. The students have shown their grateful appreciation of Mr. Odgers's services by presenting him with a handsomely-bound copy of Max Müller's "Selected Essays" (2 vols.). A resolution having been passed at the last annual meeting by which the teaching of the Latin language became a part of the curriculum of the Board, the Rev. C. T. Poynting, B.A., was elected Latin tutor. Mr. George Evans has undertaken the duties of teacher of elocution; and there is every prospect of good work being done in imparting to the students the power of effective utterance.

The report next refers to the results of the examination at midsummer, an account of which appeared at the time in these columns. Of six applicants for admission this session, only four presented themselves for examination, and of these only two were admitted, viz., Mr. Charles Roper, of Norwich; and Mr. John Ellis, of Bradford.

The Committee express their obligations to Dr. Shepherd Fletcher for his kindness in acting as medical examiner, and to Mr. George S. Woolley for gratuitously making up the prescriptions required for the students.

During the past year several works have been added to the library, and twenty copies of Griesbach's New Testament have been received from the Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

The Memorial Hall trustees have made their usual donation of £50. Mr. Earl has given £45, and Mrs. Booth, of Swinton, £400.

During the last year the Board has lost many earnest supporters. First among these must be placed Mr. Samuel Sharpe. He was deeply interested in the advancement of a practical religion, and of a simple Christian faith, and was well known for his labours in Biblical and Oriental studies. Hence, he not only sought to promote the general interests of this institution by a handsome annual subscription, but also stimulated the cultivation of Biblical studies by the contribution of prizes, which have been a source of honourable rivalry among the students during successive sessions, and a familiar feature of the annual examinations. His memory will long be cherished as one of the most prominent supporters of the institution. Miss Sharpe has forwarded to the treasurer the sum of £30, the amount of her late father's subscription, which she wishes to be entered in his name. At the same time the Committee received from her a communication asking for candid information as to whether the tutors and the Committee wished to continue the custom of giving prizes in connection with Biblical subjects. Having received a favourable reply, she forwarded an additional £10 to be expended in prizes. The new students have each received, from the same source, a copy of Mr. Sharpe's translation of the Old and New Testament. The Committee express their gratitude to Miss Sharpe for thus generously continuing the support so long extended to the Institution by her late respected father. The Committee also deplore the death of Mr. Edward Wright, of London, whose unobtrusive goodness will never be forgotten by those who had the privilege of knowing him. It was his delight to visit the sick and the distressed, and he was the sure friend and helper of all who needed his aid and advice. Although much afflicted himself, he was always cheerful, and ever ready to comfort others. Doubtless it was from the conviction that the Unitarian Home Missionary Board was fulfilling the object of its establishment by sending out men of like spirit with himself that he supported it during his life, and at his death bequeathed the sum of £100 to its funds.

During the past year, in addition to those already named, the following friends and supporters have been removed by death:—Messrs. Earl, Gargory, and Prime, of Birmingham; Mrs. Robberds, of Cheltenham; Miss Mary Bowring, of Exeter; Messrs. C. T. Taggart and Brown, of London; Mrs. Hodgkinson, of Mansfield; Messrs. Brown and Clayton, of Newcastle-upon-Tyne.

In conclusion the Committee express a hope that this institution may not exist comparatively in vain, but that there may be an ample succession of students willing to devote their lives to the ministry of the Christian religion; and that the public may be ready not only to educate the earnest students of to-day but to find for the faithful ministry of the future abundant spheres of philanthropic usefulness.

Mr. FRANCIS NICHOLSON (the treasurer) read the balance sheet, which showed that the year 1881 was commenced with a balance in the bank of £75 1s. 9d. The subscriptions amounted to £684, and the donations to £458. Other items brought the income up to £1,614. On the other side the expenditure on tutors' salaries and other expenses connected with the education of the students amounted to £1,209. The year was closed with a balance in the bank of £170. Mr. Nicholson remarked that the expenses of the year were less by more than £400 than those of the previous year, but this was to be accounted for by the fact that the number of students was less.

The CHAIRMAN moved that the report and balance sheet be adopted, printed, and circulated under the direction of the committee.

The Rev. ALFRED WORTHINGTON, of Stourbridge, seconded the motion. He said it seemed to him that the institution was admirably fulfilling the purposes for which it was intended, in providing a supply of ministers for the Unitarian body. It seemed to succeed, in the first place, in getting a number of students to college, which was not always possible in these days. In many denominations of late years there were complaints as to the impossibility of finding candidates for the ministry, but that did not seem to be the case among the Unitarians. It was somewhat satisfactory to the committee to find it to be their duty to limit the number of students entering the college, and to be able to raise the standard of admission and make it competitive. The percentage of those students at the college who, after leaving, did not proceed to the ministry was comparatively small, and it seemed to him that in that respect also the work of the institution was very successful.

The Rev. DENDY AGATE, of Gorton, moved the appointment of the officers for the ensuing year, including that of the President, Mr. Thomas Chatfield Clarke, of London.

The Rev. E. ALLEN, of Walsley, seconded the motion, and spoke of the valuable work the Missionary Board did in providing ministers for country congregations.

Mr. CLARKE returned thanks for the honour they had done him in electing him President of so useful and so necessary an institution, and said that he would gladly do all he could during his term of office to advance the interests of the Board. He held that the power and the necessity for preaching were as great at this moment as ever they had been, and, therefore, in training earnest and hard-working preachers, the Board were fulfilling a most useful and necessary work.

On the motion of the Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL, seconded by Mr. J. W. SCHOTT, and supported by the Rev. J. E. ODGERS, the thanks of the meeting were accorded to the Revs. R. B. Drummond, of Edinburgh, and Alex. Gordon, of Belfast, for their services as visitors to the students, and to Mr. W. H. Herford and Mr. J. Kendall, of Manchester, for acting as examiners for the Gaskell and Owens scholarships.

On the motion of the CHAIRMAN, seconded by Mr. FRANK TAYLOR, of Bolton, the thanks of the meeting were given to the Rev. Alfred Payne for his kindness in delivering the valedictory address to the students at the close of last session, and to the Rev. J. E. Odgers for conducting the introductory services to the same.

A vote of thanks to the Chairman, which was passed on the motion of Mr. ROBERT NICHOLSON, seconded by the Rev. E. HARRISON, concluded the proceedings.

EVENING MEETING.

In the evening the annual soirée was held in the Memorial Hall; Mr. T. CHATFIELD CLARKE, of London, president for the ensuing year, in the chair. There were also present the Revs. S. A. Steintahl, J. Black, J. T. Marriott, H. E. Dowson, C. C. Coe, P. W. Clayden; Mr. Harry Rawson, Mr. C. J. Herford, Mr. Felix Taylor, and other gentlemen. The attendance was large.

The CHAIRMAN said he was of opinion that the necessity of preaching the Gospel was as great at this moment as it ever had been. He believed, too, that there never was a time when Unitarians could hope more for the preaching of the views of which theirs was the type, because in the near future, at least, they could look forward to appealing to a people more educated, more instructed, intelligent, wider, and more able to hold rational views with regard to religion than in the past. According to his experience, it was yet somewhat of a mistake to suppose that prejudices with regard to liberal and rational religion had quite died out. On this ground a large sphere was open to Unitarian ministers. Anyone who read the literature of the day, the reviews and articles of all kinds and degrees, could not but see that there was a widespread non-recognition of religion, going far beyond any belief in Christianity, as even the Unitarians held it in its wide and rational sense. Therefore, if they valued their form of Christianity they were more than ever called upon to strengthen, encourage, maintain, and form convictions in the minds of those with whom they came in contact. There was a useful and efficacious work open for the Board to do in the future, and they must try to bring up their young men as ministers with power, united to deep spiritual piety and catholicity of heart. He thought, further, that Unitarian views ought to be especially acceptable to an enlightened public. They ought to have no want of faith, but that when they approached the masses of the people they would succeed in bringing rational conviction to their minds. He held the view which seemed to be expressed in the recent poem of Tennyson that the old views of Calvinism and Orthodoxy of many shades were passing away. What could be more hopeful as to their being able to instil into the minds of the people views of the love of God, immortality of the soul, the absolute supremacy of the conscience, and views which were at the same time simple, deep, catholic, and Christian, and which were calculated to have a great future in this country? He thought some steps should be taken in order to provide a better financial maintenance for their ministry, for in order that a man might be able to do his work in his congregation he should be free from carking money cares. He was glad to learn that this subject would be brought prominently before the Unitarian conferences at Liverpool!—(applause).

Mr. HARRY RAWSON spoke of the work done by the Home Missionary Board during the past year. There had been no diminution in the assiduity and earnestness of the students, none in their industry or in their success in obtaining academical honours both at Owens College and in their classes. Several additions had been made to the curriculum of the Board, and the rigour of the entrance examinations had been increased. The result had been that a better class of young men came forward and better ministers were provided. Doubts had been expressed as to whether this multiplication of academic studies would not possibly clash with that attention to religious and philanthropic duties, the combination of which with studies was a former characteristic of the Board, was, indeed, its foundation principle. He was of a decidedly contrary opinion, for it had been found that the most highly-cultured ministers were amongst those who had the greatest capacity of organisation and who gave most readily of their time to the promotion of good and religious pursuits, and were most active in promoting such institutions as Sunday-schools and the like. It was especially important that their ministers should be equipped with the newest and best results of criticism and learning, and the Board were striving to keep their students in every respect well-informed!—(applause).

The Rev. P. W. CLAYDEN (London) said it was always a pleasure for a Unitarian from the south to come to Manchester. Manchester was the metropolis of Unitarianism, and the centre of the progress of Unitarian faith. The beautiful churches erected in the Manchester suburbs contrasted but too unfavourably with many of the small and inconvenient edifices in other parts of England. The flourishing congregations which attended them showed that in this district Unitarianism was really exhibiting its power. The title of their institution was suggestive of some of the causes of this success. It was a Unitarian institution; and they had not been afraid to call it by the Unitarian name. This he believed was their true policy. If they had always called their institutions by this name the public would by this time have learned more fully to understand its meaning, and to associate it with the noble philanthropic work, and the true educational and religious service for which their congregations were everywhere known. The Home Missionary part of the title also indicated the sphere of our true activity. There was a vast mass of English people who held aloof from all religious organisations who were not connected with any Church or denomination, and he believed that if Unitarians vigorously carried on their home mission work and presented their rational faith to such people they would have a better chance of winning at any rate a considerable section of that alienated mass than any other denomination!—(applause). That we have before us so large a section of the English people absolutely unconnected with any denomination was a very serious fact. The censuses which had been recently taken in various towns showed that the attendance at the places of worship connected with the Church of England had scarcely increased at all since 1851, that Nonconformist bodies had more largely grown, but it was a singular fact that the increase had principally occurred in connection with bodies not organised according to the old-fashioned models, and which made the greatest use of lay agency. This fact had led him to the conclusion that if the Unitarian body wished to carry on its work successfully and effectively it must make a greater use of its lay members. Let the ministry be enlarged as far as possible, and when all had been done that could be done in this respect there must of necessity be still a vast field for work, and that ground could only be occupied and the people brought in by a great infusion of lay agency in the ministry. He was of opinion that they could not too far extend the curriculum of the Board, nor too thoroughly furnish their young men with all the polemical material which they would require in order to take their part in the controversies of the age; but it should be remembered that sermons should hardly bristle with learning and controversy. The great work of the ministry should be the building up of the people in their holiest faiths. He had often asked himself what was the permanent element in worship which had led mankind in all ages to erect temples and offer prayers. The idolatries of antiquity, the empty space or the ark in the Jewish worship, the sacrifice of the Mass in the Roman Catholic ritual, were different forms of one endeavour by the worshippers to realise the actual presence of their God. This should be the chief object of their own worship. Matthew Arnold had written some lines which seemed to him to apply to this subject:—

Though the Muse be gone away,
Though she move not earth to-day,
Souls erewhile who caught her word,
Ah, still harp on what they heard.

We may say the same of worship. Listening years ago to the Rev. William Foster he had himself often caught an echo of a holier world, and harped on what he had heard, and gone about all the week amidst business cares happier, stronger, better for that lifting influence. The late Mr. Sharpe used to say to him that what we wanted in worship was religion. So he would say to the Home Missionary Board. By all means give your students all the scientific and literary knowledge they can acquire; but impress on them that their work is to bring the power of unseen things to bear on the people's minds, to build up of God's people in their most holy place. And what a faith it was. That they were all children of God, that there was no favouritism with God, that there was no everlasting punishment, and that they were being led on through the discipline and sorrow of life to something they knew not of, but which would be unveiled to them in the great hereafter!—(applause).

The Rev. JAMES BLACK said he fancied that Unitarians were in some mistake in regard to the opinions of a large portion of the orthodox public who, certainly looked towards their body and views with considerable sympathy. These people had not such Unitarian views as were imputed to them, and certainly could not say that they were out-and-out Unitarians. This fact imposed on their body the duty of being clear, definite, explicit in the expression of their views, and of taking up an attitude of sympathy towards others. Within their own borders there were differences still. They had greater differences among themselves than had the orthodox churches between each other, a fact which perhaps tended to make them all the better representatives of a large mass of men. Their work, then, was mainly to reconcile under the roof of one temple the hearts and minds of men. That was the lesson they were learning for the benefit of the world at large, and he hoped their position was becoming more and more clear to them. All their work must not interfere with their work as congregations!—(applause).

Mr. FELIX TAYLOR (senior student) having addressed the meeting, a vote of thanks was passed to the Chairman, on the motion of the Rev. H. E. Dowson, seconded by Mr. E. WINNER.

At intervals during the evening several glees were admirably rendered by the choir, Mr. Thomas Rawson accompanying on the piano.

MANCHESTER NEW COLLEGE.

ANNUAL MEETING.

The annual meeting of the trustees of Manchester New College was held at the Memorial Hall, Manchester, on Thursday, the 19th inst., the President, JOSEPH LUPTON, Esq., in the chair. The treasurer's report showed a falling-off in subscriptions to the amount of £30 12s., this being only partly compensated for by new and increased subscriptions to the amount of £19 11s. On the resolution for the adoption of the report, Mr. R. NICHOLSON pointed out that there were several large towns in which there was no local treasurer, and from which there were few, if any, subscriptions received, and suggested that an attempt should be made to increase the number of subscribers. The President stated that in view of the uncertainty which had lately existed as to the plans of the trustees and the prospects of the college, it had not been thought desirable to make any urgent appeal to the public, but that when the matters now under discussion had been arranged and some plan determined upon, the appeal would be made, and he had no doubt it would be liberally responded to.

The report of the Committee showed an increase in the number of divinity students, there being now thirteen on the foundation, one Transylvanian student, two free to lectures, and two external students, making a total of eighteen—the previous session having opened with twelve. Four students had availed themselves of the offer of rooms free of rent at University Hall, which the Committee had been able to make in consequence of the arrangement with the Council of University Hall, by which ten sets of rooms had been placed at the disposal of the college. The great falling-off in the number of persons availing themselves of the local theological examinations disposed the committee to discontinue these examinations unless there should be a marked improvement shown in May next. Last year only twenty candidates presented themselves, as against forty the year before, and of these only three appeared for the first time, the others having all been examined once or oftener before.

The PRESIDENT, in moving the adoption of the report, said that he had never attended a meeting of the Trustees with more satisfaction than he felt on the present occasion. The College had passed through a period of depression, and for a time there had been but a small number of students; the number now was double what it had recently been. He had always felt sure that the depression was but temporary, and now the future was brightening again before them.

The Rev. C. T. POYNTING, in seconding the resolution, said that he thought the apparent failure of the Local Examination Scheme was due to the fact that the younger members of our churches required religious rather than theological instruction, and those who wished for instruction and examination in theological subjects found what they wanted in the examinations now conducted by the Sunday School Association.

The Rev. J. E. ODGERS hoped the Committee would not hastily abandon the scheme in consequence of the falling off in the numbers of those presenting themselves for examination. When the examinations were first instituted there was a considerable number of young persons who had previously had no opportunity of such systematic study as those examinations were intended to foster. These had availed themselves of them, and now there would naturally be a pause before the younger set who were to follow were ready. In some cases again ministers who had presented no candidates for examination had found the suggestions offered as to choice and treatment of subjects most valuable. He knew of one who "in two successive winters had lectured to a class of about one hundred, without any of them presenting themselves for examination. He should be sorry if the papers issued by the professors were to be stopped.

The Rev. WM. GASKELL said that he had been asked to move a resolution which he was sure would command the sympathy of all, and to which he felt it was unnecessary to add any words of his own: "That this meeting cannot place on record the death of Mr. Thomas Ainsworth, of the Flock, a Vice-President of the College, and former President from the year 1860 to 1863, without marking its sense of the deep interest which he manifested in the College, not only by instituting the scholarship which bears his name, but by his sincere devotion to its comprehensive principle and his hearty appreciation of its intellectual and moral training, attested by the names of all his sons upon its roll of students, and its grateful remembrance of the rare personal qualities and high tone of character which shed a lustre on any cause which he espoused."

The Rev. D. DAVIS, in seconding, spoke of Mr. Ainsworth as a representative of all the best and highest traditions of the past.

The resolution was carried unanimously.

The Rev. J. E. ODGERS said he had a resolution to move in memory of one old in years and advanced in scholarship, who had ever made himself a friend and companion to the young, and opened his house to the students of the College, one who had followed to the last with interest the progressive movements of theological science, and had also been to them all an example of simplicity of character and nobleness of heart. The resolution he had been asked to move was as follows:—"That since the death of the Rev. John Kenrick the College, always happy in the support of men of learning, has sustained no similar loss so serious as in the decease of Mr. Samuel Sharpe, who has now followed his immediate successor in the presidential chair, in whose productive erudition, unwearied love of truth and simplicity of life every student had a model of scholarly excellence, while his wisely generous stewardship of wealth and steadfast fidelity to his convictions of duty fulfilled the conditions of exemplary citizenship."

The Rev. DENDY AGATE seconded the resolution, which was carried unanimously.

Mr. R. D. DARBISHIRE moved, and Mr. DAVID AINSWORTH seconded, a resolution empowering the Sub-Committee appointed to revise the regulations for the admission of students to continue its inquiries, taking into especial consideration the probable results of the occupation of University Hall by the College, which was carried unanimously.

The officers for the year 1881 were all re-appointed, with the exception of the two Vice-Presidents, deceased, and the Rev. Thomas Holland, deputy Treasurer for Southport, who was understood to be leaving that town. On the motion for the election of the deputy Treasurers, it was suggested by Mr. H. TURNER that the Committee should revise the list carefully before the next annual meeting. He pointed out that the number of subscriptions received from some of them was very small, and thought that they might perhaps be glad to be relieved of their duties by others who will devote more time and energy to the work.

The special report on negotiations with University Hall, which had already been printed and placed in the hands of the trustees, was then considered. The report having been taken as read, Mr. DARBISHIRE, on behalf of the committee, moved the two following resolutions, of which notice had been given:—

1. That the Scheme for placing University Hall and the proceeds of sale thereof in the hands of Trustees, for the purposes set forth in the Minutes of the Council of the Hall of the 14th day of December, 1881, be approved of, and the Trustees of the College authorise the Committee to continue the negotiations, and to nominate the first Trustees on behalf of the College, and to see to the formal completion of the proposed Trust.

2. That in order to comply with the stipulation of the Council of University Hall, that the College should make the attempt to carry on the Hall, the Trustees of the College authorise the Committee to make such arrangements as they deem best for doing so, for an experimental period of three years, with power to provide for the residence of Students of the College in the hall, as the Committee may think proper.

Mr. Darbishire, in moving these resolutions, pointed out that though the College ran some risk of a loss during the three years, amounting, perhaps, to upwards of a thousand pounds, they had the opportunity of securing the almost certain prospect of becoming proprietors of the Hall, or the proceeds of the sale, a property estimated at from ten to fifteen thousand pounds. In response to so generous an offer from the members of the Hall he thought they ought to be prepared to undertake some risk, and it was not improbable that after all the loss might be considerably less than the amount he had named. The College would only be committed to residence in the Hall for a period of three years, and would thus have the advantage of such an experiment without entering at once upon a scheme of permanent residence in London, such as had been previously proposed to the trustees and rejected by them. If the resolutions were passed now steps would be immediately taken to prepare the necessary deeds, &c., that the Hall might be handed over to the College next June, and arrangements made with regard to its management in time for the Session 1882-3.

The resolution having been seconded by Mr. HARRY RAWSON,

The Rev. D. DAVIS asked if the Hall would continue under the present management?

Mr. DARBISHIRE replied that the whole of the present arrangements for its management would cease. It might be convenient to invite some of the members of the Council who had previously taken an active part in the management to constitute themselves a sub-committee to carry on the management for the College; but the present Principal had already sent in his resignation, which would take effect at the close of the present Session, and the appointment of his successor and all other matters would rest entirely with the College.

In reply to a question from the Rev. W. BLAZEY, the PRESIDENT said that it was the present intention of the Committee that residence in the Hall should be the rule for students of the College, but that exceptional cases might perhaps be dealt with as they arose. This and other matters would however be reported upon at the June meeting.

The Rev. A. W. WORTHINGTON asked whether in event of the Hall being sold the proceeds would be applied exclusively to the education of divinity students, or whether some provision would be made for lay education.

Mr. DARBISHIRE replied that under the scheme proposed the College could employ the funds in any way that met with the approval of the sixteen trustees to whom it was proposed now to hand over the Hall for the use of the College.

The Rev. F. H. JONES pointed out that it was not the original intention of the College, and he hoped it would not always be its practice, to confine itself to the education of divinity students.

The Revs. JAS. HARWOOD and H. S. SOLLY spoke of the advantages to the students of residence in the Hall, and expressed a hope that it would become more general, and the present difficulties which had prevented more than four students from availing themselves of the offer of rooms might be removed.

The Rev. J. E. OGDERS pointed out that when that offer was made the prospects of the Hall were most uncertain, that there were certain heavy fees to be paid which the College could not then remit, and that, nevertheless, all the three sets of rooms in which furniture was given had been taken. He had no doubt that under the new scheme the students would prefer residence in the Hall.

The resolutions were then put, and carried unanimously.

The proceedings were then brought to a close by a vote of thanks to the President.

UNIVERSITY OF LONDON.

A meeting of Convocation of the University of London was held on Tuesday at the University building, Burlington-gardens. Dr. F. J. Wood was called on to preside, in the absence from illness of Dr. Storror, chairman of Convocation.

The first business was a nomination of a list of three persons to be submitted to her Majesty for the selection therefrom of a fellow of the University. Scrutineers were appointed, and they subsequently reported that the result of the voting was as follows:—George Buchanan, M.D., B.A., 617; Samuel Newth, M.A., 530; Robert Barnes, M.D., 338; George Carey Foster, B.A., 213. The Chairman declared Dr. Buchanan, Mr. Newth, and Dr. Barnes duly nominated.

The next business was the adjourned debate (from the 10th of May last) on the following motion and amendment:—"Moved by Mr. A. P. Hensman, seconded by Mr. H. A. Nesbitt: That it is just and desirable that women who are graduates of this University, and of the requisite standing, should be entitled to become members of Convocation, and to vote at the election of the member of Parliament for the University. Amendment—Moved by Mr. A. McDowall, seconded by Mr. A. W. Bennett: That female graduates be admitted to Convocation." Mr. Tyler resumed the discussion, saying that he doubted if Convocation had any power in this matter, but if it had the amendment would put female graduates on a different footing from that of male graduates, whose right to sit in Convocation was limited by their degrees and by their standing, whereas the amendment made no such limitations.—Mr. McDowall, the mover of the amendment, remarked that the University had great influence in the matter of female education, and that there was no reason why Convocation should not have the advice of women on educational questions. But the resolution contained two distinct subjects, the second of which involved a great legislative change.—Mr. Nesbitt regarded the amendment as the preferable form, as it adopted the words of the supplemental charter.—Mr. Godlee thought the House did a great evil in admitting women to degrees, but that having been done there was no logical reason for opposing the amendment, but the motion was a mere debating society resolution.—Mr. Shaen said that legal members of Convocation thought the words of the charter should be adopted.—Mr. Dolleymore asked if women, becoming members of Convocation, would not necessarily have the power of voting for members of Parliament.—The Chairman said the words of the Act of Parliament as to voting qualifications were, "Every man whose name is for the time being on the register of graduates."—Mr. Temple expressed his regret for having formerly opposed the admission of women to degrees; probably, he said, he had been biased by being a medical man. He thought women graduates were fitted to sit in Convocation.—Mr. Hensman replied, expressing his willingness to accept the amendment, in compliance with what he understood to be the general feeling of Convocation. He spoke of the School Board, with special reference to the recent industrial school scandal, as justifying the admission of women to public bodies. This reference was received with mixed expressions. The motion was then withdrawn, and the amendment was agreed to with but three or four dissentients.

Some discussion took place upon a resolution moved by Dr. Pye-Smith, requesting the Senate to consider the advantage of constituting boards of studies, one for each faculty, to advise the Senate on matters connected with the detail of examinations, and to form a medium of communication between the Senate, the examiners, and the teachers of candidates for degrees; the members to be nominated by the Senate from their own body (either in addition to or including the present committees on examinations), from professors in the affiliated colleges, and from present or past examiners. Eventually the resolution was amended by being made to conclude with the words "between the Senate, the examiners, and the teachers," and in that form it was carried.

Mr. McDowall proposed a resolution affirming the expediency of increased representation of Convocation on the Senate. It was resolved to refer the subject to the annual committee for reconsideration and report.

Mr. W. J. Spratling moved:—"That in the opinion of this House the establishment of London University local examinations similar to those conducted by the older Universities is desirable."—Mr. Tidmarsh seconded the resolution.—Mr. Nesbitt protested against any further examination.—Some discussion took place, generally in favour of examination, and the resolution was carried, an amendment for referring the matter to the annual committee for consideration and report in May being negatived.

Dr. A. K. Rollitt had on the paper a resolution to which he spoke, expressing the desirableness of extending the fellowship of the University to distinguished graduates, but the discussion was adjourned till the next meeting.—This concluded the business on the paper.

STONE NEWINGTON-GREEN.—The services on Sunday mornings during the ensuing three months will be conducted by the Rev. William Wooding.

KINGSWOOD, NEAR BIRMINGHAM.—The annual congregational meeting was held on Wednesday week in the schoolroom, which was crowded to excess. After tea Mr. W. H. Herbert, chapel-warden, took the chair, and briefly stated that the object of the meeting was to manifest respect and confidence in their venerable pastor, and to preserve that social union in the congregation which it was their privilege to enjoy, and called on their respected minister to address them. Mr. Taplin said a friend of his recently appointed him a trustee of a fund for supplying copies of the Scriptures, of a clear and excellent type, for the use of those whose eyes were dimmed by years; his first and pleasant duty that evening was to present such copies to some of his old friends, assured that they duly appreciated their teachings as the support and comfort of their declining years. The Chairman then called on Mr. Cooke, an orthodox Baptist, who said he enjoyed the privilege of mingling with them on that social occasion. He had been drawn to Kingswood by the excellent lectures and other discourses, from which he had derived much good, for he must confess that their differences were not so great; but however great they might be, that true tone of good-will which sealed all the sermons he had heard within their walls had led him to rejoice that he could join them heartily in their social gathering. The chairman then spoke at some length on his long absence in India, and then proposed the health and a longer life of usefulness to their aged and respected pastor, which was heartily received. The meeting broke up at ten o'clock, delighted with their instructive and social meeting.

MR. JOHN PENDLEBURY, of South Bank, Eccles-Old-road, who died on the 1st of December last, left bequests to charitable institutions in Manchester and Salford to the amount of about £100,000.

Obituary.

SIR RICHARD MALINS, whose life had been despaired of for several days, died on Sunday evening, at his residence, 57, Lowndes-square. Sir Richard, who was seventy-seven years of age, was educated at Caius College, Cambridge, where he was fifth junior optime in 1827, was called to the Inner Temple in 1830, appointed a Queen's Counsel in 1849, and a Vice-Chancellor in 1866. On retiring last year he was created a Privy Councillor. From July, 1852, to July, 1865, he represented Wallingford in the Conservative interest.

SIR DANIEL MACNEE.—Sir Daniel Macnee, President of the Royal Scottish Academy, died in Edinburgh on Tuesday night, at the age of seventy-five. In 1829 he was elected a member of the Scottish Academy, and became a favourite portrait painter, his portrait of the Rev. Dr. Wardlaw receiving one of the gold medals at the International Exhibition in Paris in 1855. He was elected President of the Royal Scottish Academy in 1876, and in the same year was knighted, and received the honorary degree of LL.D. from the University of Glasgow. Sir Daniel Macnee frequently exhibited in the Royal Academy of London.

GEORGE FOX'S GRAVE.—The ground known as the Quakers' burying-ground in Coleman-street, Bunhill-row, in which lie the remains of George Fox, is to be planted and kept in good order. A coffee tavern and memorial hall have been erected by the Society of Friends close by on the remnant of land left available to them, after having ceded an area to the London School Board for the erection of school premises and to the Metropolitan Board of Works for the purpose of widening Coleman-street.

NONCONFORMIST MINISTERS AS WORKHOUSE CHAPLAINS.—The Beverley board of guardians have passed a resolution by twenty-one votes to thirteen, accepting the offer of eight Nonconformist ministers to perform chaplaincy duty at the workhouse for six months free of charge. The same resolution was adopted about a month ago, when the Local Government disapproved of it, and asked the board to reconsider the matter. The result was a much stronger majority in favour of the Nonconformist ministers. There are about fifteen unions in Yorkshire where the divine services are conducted gratuitously by Nonconformist ministers, including Scarborough, Wakefield, and Keighley workhouses.

ISLINGTON CLERICAL MEETING.—The annual gathering of the Evangelical clergy at Islington took place on Tuesday at Bishop Wilson's Memorial Hall, Church-street, the vicar of Islington, the Rev. Prebendary Wilson, presiding, and about five hundred clergymen being present. The general subject for discussion was "The Importance of Clear Dogmatic Teaching," papers under different subdivisions of it being read by the Rev. Sir Emilus Bayley, the Rev. Flavel Cook, the Rev. Canon Hoare, and the Dean of Ripon. The proceedings occupied the whole of the morning and afternoon.

LIVERPOOL.—Lord Derby on Saturday last opened the Liverpool University College, of which he is president. He congratulated the citizens on possessing six University chairs, each endowed with £10,000, and upon beginning free from debt. Though they lived in changing times, democracy appreciated science and education, and, whatever happened, a scientific foundation would not be disendowed. The new University would supply evidence that commerce and culture were not antagonistic. The cheapening of education at Oxford and Cambridge would not render local universities unnecessary, for many parents were opposed to sending their sons at a critical time of life a distance from home exempt from domestic influences and restraints.

EPPE'S COCOA.—GRATEFUL AND COMFORTING.—"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected cocoa, Mr. Eppe has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately-flavoured beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. Hundreds of subtle maladies are floating around us ready to attack wherever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.—Made simply with boiling water or milk. Sold only in Packets labelled—"JAMES EPPE & CO. Homeopathic Chemists, London." Also makers of Eppe's Chocolate Essence for afternoon use.

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS.—Teachings of Experience.—The united testimony of thousands, extending over more than forty years, most strongly recommends these Pills as the best purifiers, the mildest aperients, and the surest restoratives. They never prove delusive, or give merely temporary relief, but attack all ailments of the stomach, lungs, heart, head, and bowels in the only safe and legitimate way, by depurating the blood, and so eradicating those impurities which are the source and constituent of almost every disease. Their medicinal efficacy is wonderful in renovating enfeebled constitutions. Their action embraces all that is desirable in a household medicine. They expel every noxious and effete matter; and thus the strength is nurtured and the energies stimulated.

OUR COLLEGES.

Two of our theological Institutions have been holding their annual meetings within the last few days, and a third—if we can include University Hall under the designation at the head of this article—has also been materially affected by the proceedings and resolutions at one of these meetings. Two of these institutions are professedly unsectarian and undenominational. The third and the most recently founded was established upon a professedly doctrinal basis by the assumption of a doctrinal name; but the name Unitarian has practically come to be little more than a synonym for a rational religion and unfettered inquiry, so that Manchester New College, London, and the Home Missionary Board in Manchester are consecrated essentially to the same religious work, regarded under somewhat different aspects and relations. All alike are public institutions, devoted to public objects, connected more or less closely with two great modern Universities, and are, therefore, open to the freest comment and criticism.

University Hall is now approaching the end of its separate existence, after a history of alternate success and failure extending over barely a single generation. It has been dignified by the superintendence of a succession of eminent men, from the days of Professor NEWMAN and Dr. W. B. CARPENTER to those of its present accomplished and scholarly Principal, Professor BEESLY. We confess that we are among a small and discontented minority who, from the first, have never been able to comprehend the raison d'être of its original foundation, the real principles—if any—to which it has borne testimony, or the necessity of its continued existence. An academical institution which challenges, or even gives serious occasion for, such grave doubts is almost self-condemned. If it does not represent a great principle or meet some great want it has lost its right to separate existence. University Hall was professedly founded to commemorate the passing of the Dissenters' Chapels Bill in 1846. Although perpetuating in visible form the memory of a great religious movement, it has never, as far as we can learn, been of the slightest service to any religious cause; and by the appointment of its present Principal—an honest and declared Agnostic—it almost ostentatiously separated itself from any distinctively religious influence in relation to the great questions of our time. It was founded professedly to promote the cause of unfettered learning, and to provide instruction in branches of knowledge which were excluded from University College by the very nature of its constitution. It has never, so far as we can learn, supplemented the admitted deficiencies of University College by any religious or ethical teaching of its own. It was founded to provide an academical home for students attending the classes of University College. In fulfilment of this object, it was from the first nothing more than a large boarding-house for students belonging to a class of wealthy laity who are among the last men in the world to require the benefits of an institution established by public subscription. We can well remember the astonishment with which the original establishment of University Hall was regarded by many of our leading ministers and laymen, and the prophecies of failure which are now verified by the event. We can well remember the general feeling at the time, that a grand opportunity was lost of providing a suitable metropolitan home for our old and valued theological institution at Manchester, which was destined, sooner or later, to gravitate towards closer connection with University College. University Hall, from beginning to end, has been a costly blunder, and a dismal failure. Its managers now acknowledge that the opening of the Universities to Nonconformists rendered its continued existence problematical, if not unnecessary. The number of its students has long dwindled below the paying point, and even the arbitrary expedient of rendering compulsory the residence of all Hibbert Scholars has failed to avert its doom. The opening of the Universities was by no means an event beyond the grounds of probability, even at the date of the foundation of the Hall. The great Colleges of Oxford and Cambridge are founded, not for temporary exigencies, or for a generation only, but for centuries. University Hall was founded only upon a negation, and therefore ceases to be. Even Keble and Selwyn are consecrated to a principle, however narrow and dogmatic we regard it, and they will therefore live and flourish. University Hall was consecrated to Nihilism and Agnosticism, and is saved from ignominious extinction only by merging its separate life in an older and greater institution, which represents a definite religious principle and a progressive cause.

The Home Missionary Board, founded a few years after University Hall, represents at least a clear consistent principle, and has a definite object and work. Established in the new-born zeal for popular missionary work and theological propagandism the Home Missionary Board adopted a doctrinal name, and was pledged to a special denominational work. The public sentiment of our Free Churches was from the first divided on this and other important questions as to its constitution, but there can be no doubt that the Board has long outlived all opposition, and that its definite theological attitude has been the source of its strength and its popularity; while it is an admitted fact that its managers, its accomplished tutors, and the ministers it has trained are quite as much devoted to the cause of a progressive and undogmatic religion as if the institution had been founded upon a professedly free and undogmatic basis. In the early period of its history the standard of admission was low, the curriculum was meagre, and candidates seem to have been admitted with little or no discrimination. It is only just to add that even during its earliest period it sent forth students who have so successfully improved the scanty training then offered to them as to have become well fitted to occupy some of the foremost positions in our Churches. Of late years scholarships have been multiplied through the munificent liberality of the Rev. WILLIAM GASKELL, Mr. HENRY TATE, and Mr. THOMAS ASHTON, with the result of creating a taste for higher culture and University honours. A marked improvement has been made in the standard of admission: one branch of learning after another has been added to the curriculum; and there has been an increasing disposition on the part of the best students to avail themselves of the higher advantages offered by a further course at Manchester New College. It is a fact of not a little significance that at the end of a little more than a quarter of a century of its existence the Home Missionary Board has sent into the ranks of our ministry a majority of one-third over Manchester New College, some of whom fill with signal credit not a few of our most prominent pulpits. The questions are beginning to be asked—What need is there of two theological institutions to supply the wants of a small denomination like ours? Why perpetuate two classes of ministers of different training and culture when the requirements of the age are such that the highest attainments are needed for what are called the humblest and least conspicuous spheres of duty? Why not ally the younger institution to its wealthier and more distinguished sister, if not indeed merge its separate existence? If it is still decided to open an entrance into our ministry for men of mature age and marked aptitudes who from various causes have been unable to pass through a full university training, why not admit such men to a supplementary theological and philosophical course at Manchester New College, or at least prepare them for entering upon the full course as now constituted? But these are much too momentous questions to be discussed in the middle of a newspaper article, and we can only hope that whenever Manchester New College becomes a purely theological institution they will receive careful consideration. In the meantime we congratulate the Home Missionary Board on the position it has attained, and the eminently satisfactory report presented to the recent annual meeting. The newly-elected President, Mr. T. CHATFIELD CLARKE, before accepting his office very wisely inquired whether the authorities of the Board were in the fullest sympathy with the Catholic view of Unitarian Christianity, and were also determined to give their students the highest culture attainable. On both these points he received satisfactory replies in the affirmative. Under the present management we are persuaded the Board will continue to avoid errors and correct shortcomings which have occasioned hostile criticism in former years. The best wish we can offer for its future is that it will continue to make such marked improvement that its separate existence will become unnecessary, but men of the highest university culture and the ripest theological learning will consider it an honour and duty to devote themselves to a real missionary ministry.

Manchester New College is now rapidly approaching the centenary of its existence. It has consistently maintained throughout the whole of its history the principle of open trusts, the unfettered pursuit of truth, and the progressive study of theology without dogmatic limitations. In its comparatively obscure position it advocated principles now generally accepted long before they were popular, and pointed out the way which the two greatest Universities of the land followed, under the guidance of that distinguished man Mr. JAMES HEYWOOD, a former President and life-long friend of the College. The oldest and greatest Universities of any land might be proud to claim as their own the distinguished Professors who, with Dr. MARTINEAU as their Principal, maintain and increase the high reputation of Manchester New College.

Well endowed by the liberality of past benefactors, but not rich, Manchester New College is partly dependent upon a subscription list, and so is kept in close contact with the free life and activity of our Churches. Although perfectly free and undogmatic in its constitution, so that Trinitarian students of any Protestant denomination could be received, and would be cordially welcomed, its actual work is to provide a succession of highly-trained ministers for the Churches called Unitarian and Free Christian, the only Churches representing the principles of theological progress and unrestricted religious liberty. The possession of University Hall will open up the old question of residence and non-residence, on which many of the best friends of the College are known to entertain a marked diversity of opinion. Other questions kindred to those we have referred to above will, sooner or later, come up for full discussion. The question of making the College a purely theological institution, receiving only graduates, or non-graduates, who, under exceptional circumstances, are qualified to enter upon an advanced theological course, was decided in the affirmative at one meeting of the Trustees held in Manchester, and in the negative at another meeting held in London, under the powerful influence of the revered Principal. This question is known to be only postponed, and not shelved. Mr. THOM'S exhaustive speech on the subject at the London meeting in June, 1880, was felt at the time to be unanswerable, and no attempt has subsequently been made to answer it.

At the meeting of the Trustees held in Manchester last week a final sanction was given to the negotiations for transferring the Hall to the College under certain conditions of a formal kind. University Hall will at last have an object worthy of its professed origin, and Manchester New College for the first time in the century of its history will have a home worthy of its noble principles in the commodious building where it has hitherto been only a lodger on sufferance. As we pass by that spacious and elegant if not very imposing structure, we shall now be able to reflect with satisfaction that it is at last the seat of genuine learning, at last consecrated to the object which its generous founders contemplated, the commemoration of a great act of religious liberty and national justice, at last devoted to the study of Theology as the Queen of Sciences, without the limitations of creed and test which would be scornfully rejected by the students of every other branch of learning.

We know not how large a proportion of our readers will concur with us in the hope, or what ground there is for the expectation, that the day may not be far distant when our two theological Colleges will meet in friendly unity, if not corporate union, in this or some other equally appropriate house here or in Manchester.

SEMITIC MONOTHEISM.

THE cruel and wicked persecution to which the Jews have been subjected in Russia for some time past, and which has now happily roused a cry of indignation in this country from men of the most widely divergent religious opinions, suggests not only the amazing race-vitality of the descendants of ABRAHAM, but the origin of the Monotheistic idea which lies at the root of all the rites and ceremonies that distinguish them from other peoples. Those who believe in a special and supernatural revelation can feel no difficulty in this matter; to them the question is too simple to be worth either asking or answering. To those, however, who cannot accept this explanation of the origin of the Monotheistic idea it is a question beset with difficulties which scholars and philosophers have as yet been unable to remove.

This fact is but too apparent from one of Professor MAX MULLER'S essays, in which he examines M. RENAN'S "Histoire Générale et Système Comparé des Langues Sémites." The latter authority contends for a Monotheistic instinct in the Semitic race; this MAX MULLER contests. The thoughtful reader of the essay in question, which is the twenty-first of the series published in two volumes last year, will probably come to the conclusion that much of the argument, as it affects the different opinions of these two great authorities, turns upon the significance of the word "instinct" and the want of a clear mutual understanding of the term. How can it be said, asks MAX MULLER, that the Semitic peoples of the nomadic and political branches of the race were all endowed with a monotheistic instinct when we know that their deities included such gods as RIMMON, DAGON, and BAAL with the sun, moon, and planets? In his opinion, M. RENAN, in tracing the perception of the unity of GOD among the Semites to an instinct has not only acted the part of an advocate by overlooking facts that tell against his own theory, but he has made a questionable use of the word "instinct" itself. "It is always dangerous," we are told, "to transfer expressions from one branch of knowledge to another. The word 'instinct' has its legitimate application in Natural History, where it is used of the unconscious acts of unconscious beings. . . . If we transfer this word to the unconscious acts of conscious beings, we must necessarily alter its definition. . . . It may sound more scientific to speak of a Monotheistic instinct rather than of the inborn image or the revealed truth of the one living GOD; but is instinct less mysterious than revelation? Could the Monotheistic instinct of the Semitic race, if an instinct, have been so frequently obscured, or the Polytheistic instinct of the Aryan race, if an instinct, so completely annihilated, as to allow the Jews to worship on all the high places round Jerusalem, and the Greeks and Romans to become believers in CHRIST?"

Still, whatever force there may be in these remarks, and apart altogether from the old vexed question of innate ideas, it must be admitted that there are innate tendencies which may group themselves in nations and races, which is all that M. RENAN probably means. Such tendencies are seen, for instance, in the pride of the Spaniard, in the love of art of the Italians, in the politeness and practical artistic capacity of the French, and in the simplicity of character allied to speculative power in the German. A tendency of this kind is indeed virtually admitted by MAX MULLER himself with regard to the widely different mythological capacity of the Aryan and Semitic families of languages. For, he says, "The language of the ancient Aryans of India had thrown out many names for that heavenly apparition (the dawn), and every name as it ceased to be understood became like a decaying seed, the germ of an abundant growth of myth and legend. Why should not the same have happened to the Semitic names for the dawn? Simply and solely because the Semitic words have no tendency to phonetic corruption; simply and solely because they continued to be felt as appellatives, and would inevitably have defeated every attempt at mythological phraseology as we find in Greece and India." If, however, the mythological tendency was thus hindered, if not wholly arrested, from the very structure of the Semitic languages, we have in that fact a potent agency for checking the growth of Polytheism and developing what M. RENAN terms the Monotheistic instinct, using the word as he also uses it to denote the burning thirst for knowledge, or the like, which characterises some human beings in contradistinction to others. The power language has in the formation of religious ideas MAX MULLER does not deny, for he says, "The primitive intuition of GOD was in itself neither Monotheistic nor Polytheistic, though it might become either according to the expression which it took in the languages of man."

But restricting the meaning of the term "instinct" to its significance in Natural History and ignoring the teaching of the latest and most approved scientific doctrines in their bearing on natural tendencies and affinities, our great Sanskrit scholar goes on to say, "We can see nothing that would justify the admission of a monotheistic instinct granted to the Semitic and withheld from the Aryan race. They both share in the primitive intuition of GOD, they are both exposed to dangers in framing names for GOD, and they both fall into Polytheism." Still, as we have seen, the Semites avoided the danger of an extreme or even a great development of Polytheism somewhere far back in the history of human speech when their language first became differentiated from that of the Aryans. "What," continues MAX MULLER, "is peculiar to the Aryan race is their mythological phraseology superadded to their Polytheism; what is peculiar to the Semitic race is their belief in a national God—in a God chosen by his people as his people had been chosen by him." As regards the fact that the three great religions of the world "in which the unity of the Deity forms the keynote" are of Semitic origin, he goes on to say that, so far as this question is concerned, Judaism, Christianity, and Mohammedanism, are not three religions, but one. MOHAMMED did not invent Monotheism; he did not even invent a new name of GOD. "His object was to destroy the idolatry of the Semitic tribes of Arabia," and "to restore the faith of ABRAHAM in one GOD." And as to Christianity, CHRIST, it is rightly urged, did not come to destroy but to fulfil; "and the GOD whom he preached was the God of ABRAHAM." Nor is it less true, we are told, that the God of JEREMIAH, of ELIJAH, and of MOSES, was the God of ABRAHAM. "Thus the faith in the one living GOD, which seemed to require the admission of a Monotheistic instinct grafted in every member of the Semitic family, is traced back to one man—ABRAHAM."

So far as the essential unity of Judaism, Christianity and Mohammedanism is concerned, all this is true, but it scarcely touches the principle laid down by M. RENAN, if the word "instinct" is to be taken in a broad philosophical sense, and not restricted as in Natural History. With regard to the question as to how ABRAHAM possessed not only the primitive intuition of GOD as He revealed Himself to all mankind, but passed through a denial of all other gods to a knowledge of the one GOD, MAX MULLER says, "We are quite content to answer that it was by a special Divine Revelation." In explanation of these words, which might be misunderstood, he goes on to state—"We do not indulge in theological phraseology, but we mean every word to its fullest extent. The Father of Truth chooses His own prophets, and He speaks to them in a voice stronger than that of thunder. It is the same inner voice through which GOD speaks to all of us. That voice may dwindle away and become hardly audible; it may lose its Divine accent, and sink into the language of worldly prudence, but it may also from time to time assume its real nature with the chosen of GOD, and sound into their ears as a voice from Heaven." Taking this view of the question, as we are quite prepared to do, it matters little whether we ascribe the great Semitic religions to revelation, or to a divine instinct; nor is it at all material whether we make ABRAHAM or MOSES the recipient of the Divine impulse, or the typical representative of the Monotheistic instinct. As little need we concern ourselves with the mode in which that impulse or instinct came into the soul of the chosen one. Enough that it was there, and that its transmission along the ages gave the world that noble band of Hebrew prophets who stood up so stoutly for the worship of JEHOVAH, and for the principles of eternal righteousness with which his name was associated. But this is not all it did; it gave the world the greatest of all prophetic souls, JESUS of NAZARETH, who, though rejected by his own people, has conquered the spirits of the highest of the Aryan race, and is surely destined to become the Founder of a universal religion. Nor must it be forgotten that the wonderful people in whom the Monotheistic idea has lived on, with greater or less purity, for so many centuries, may yet be destined to play as great a part in the future as they have played in the past, and that it is not only ingratitude of the deepest dye, but moral suicide, to hinder their natural development.

DR. WILLIAMS'S TRUST.—XXII.

[CONTRIBUTED BY W. D. JEREMY, ESQ.]

120. WILLIAM ESDAILE, Esq. (1794-1835).—Of Lombard-street, banker. Son of Sir James Esdaile, sometime Lord Mayor of London. He resigned the Trust in 1835, and died Oct. 2, 1837, in his eightieth year.

121. REV. JOHN DISNEY, D.D. (1796-1806).—Sometime Rector of Panton and Vicar of Swin-dorby, and Hon. Chaplain to the Bishop of Carlisle. Having adopted Unitarian views he resigned his benefices in 1782, and thereupon published his "Reasons for Quitting the Church of England." He was co-pastor with the Rev. Theophilus Lindsey at Essex-street Chapel from 1782 until 1793, and then sole pastor until 1804. In that year he acquired unexpectedly an ample estate under the will of his friend Mr. Thomas Brand Hollis, of the Hyde, near Ingatestone, and retired to his country seat, where he spent the last twelve years of his life in affluence and learned leisure, but without changing his profession and habits as a clergyman in his own household. (See preface to a sermon delivered at the Hyde in 1811 by Thaddeus Mason Harris, A.M., of Massachusetts.) He was the author of "Memoirs of Dr. Sykes, Rector of Rayleigh, Essex, 1785"; a "Memoir of Dr. John Jebb," prefixed to his works in three vols. 1787; "Memoirs of Dr. Jortin," 1792; "Sermons," two vols. 1793; "Sermons," two vols. 1816, and other works. He honoured the memory of his benefactor, Mr. Thos. Brand Hollis, by printing memoirs of him in a very handsome style, illustrated by engravings of the mansion, grounds, &c. (4to 1808). The estate had come unexpectedly to Mr. Hollis (whose name was then Thos. Brand), under the will of his friend Thos. Hollis, Esq. (No. 36 ante), who was in no way related to him. Dr. Disney died 26th Dec., 1816, at the Hyde, now the residence of his grandson, Edgar Disney, Esq., J.P., who has a fine original portrait of him.

122. REV. EDMUND BUTCHER (1796-98).—Born at Colchester in 1757; educated at Davenport. Minister at Leather-lane, London (1789-97). In 1798 he settled at Sidmouth. He was the author of "Sermons for the Use of Families," three vols.; "Moral Tales," 1801; "Holy Scriptures Methodised . . . for the use of Families," 1801; "An Excursion from Sidmouth to Chester in 1803, interspersed with biographical Anecdotes," two vols. 1805; "A Sermon preached before the Unitarian Fund Society," 1813; "Prayers for the Use of Families and Individuals," 1822. He died at Bath, April 14, 1822.

123. REV. JAMES TAYLER (1789-93).—Minister of St. Thomas's, Southwark (1796-1801), and a member of the Presbyterian Board; afterwards Minister at Nottingham. He was the father of the late Rev. John James Tayler, Principal of Manchester New College.

124. REV. ROCHEMONT BARBAULD (1798-1808).—Minister of the Old Presbyterian Chapel at Hampstead (1787-1802), and afterwards at Newington-green. He died Nov. 10, 1808, in his sixtieth year. Mortem sibi scivit. An interesting and elegant account of him may be seen in the Monthly Repository, Vol. III., pp. 706-9, written by his gifted wife, of whom it may be truly said, nil teligit quod non ornavit. A silhouette portrait of him, cut by her hand, was lately in the possession of her great niece, Mrs. Le Breton, of Hampstead, through whose kindness it is now in the writer's collection of portraits, which he has presented to Dr. Williams's Library.

125. REV. NATHANIEL PHILIPS, D.D. (1799-1801).—Born in 1757, at Sowerby, Lincolnshire, where his father was minister. Educated at the Hoxton Academy (1773-77); Minister at Nottingham (1778-83?); then at Palgrave for eleven years; at Walthamstow (1796-1801); at Bury St. Edmund's; returning shortly to London he officiated at Hanover-street and Leather-lane (1803-5), and was afterwards for about forty years at Sheffield, where he died Oct. 20, 1842.

126. REV. WM. HUGHES (1800-1805).—Minister at Leather-lane (1797-1801). In 1805 he removed to the Isle of Wight, and thereupon resigned the Trust.

127. REV. THOMAS BELSHAM (1801-29).—A well-known theologian and controversial writer. Son of an Independent minister, and himself for many years a minister of the same denomination, and divinity tutor at the Daventry Academy until he was about forty years of age. Whilst holding that office he became a convert to Unitarianism (about 1790), and for that reason tendered his resignation. He was for some time tutor at the New College at Hackney, and in 1794 succeeded Dr. Priestley at the Gravel Pit Chapel in that place; afterwards minister of Essex-street Chapel (1804-28). He died 10th Nov., 1829, aged eighty years. There is a portrait of him at Dr. Williams's Library.

128. REV. JEREMIAH JOYCE (1802-16).—Author of "Scientific Dialogues" and other similar works. Minister of the Old Presbyterian Chapel at Highgate, and for some time afternoon preacher at Essex-street Chapel. For many years Secretary of the Unitarian Society. He died 4th June, 1816.

129. REV. WILLIAM JOHNSTON (1803-11).—Probably a son of the Rev. Ebenezer Johnston, of Horley, and uncle of the late Mr. Ebenezer Johnston, of Hackney. He appears to have been engaged upon literary work.

130. REV. JOHN COATES (1804-21).—Sometime a student at Warrington, and afterwards at the Hoxton Academy. Minister of the Old Meeting House, Birmingham, where he was a fellow-sufferer with Dr. Priestley from the riots of 1791. His furniture and library were burnt by the mob. Afterwards minister of St. Thomas's, Southwark (1802-13), and a member of the Presbyterian Board during the same period. Librarian at Redcross-street (1821-34). He died April 2, 1836, aged seventy-four years.

131. SWAN DOWNER, Esq. (1804-15).—For many years a member of the Old Jewry congregation and one of its representatives at the Presbyterian Board (1790-1815). He died at his house in Aldermanbury, February 22, 1816, aged eighty-one years.

132. ISAAC SOLLY, Esq. (1805-53).—Of Walthamstow, merchant. One of the principal contractors for the supply of the Government dock-yards with timber and hemp during the Peninsular War. Chairman of the London Dock Company, and of the London and Birmingham Railway Company, &c. He died February 22, 1853, aged eighty-four years. See a memoir of him in the Christian Reformer for that year by his son, the Rev. Henry Solly. He was a descendant of John Hollis (No. 41, ante) and also of Nathaniel Neal (No. 59).

BELFAST.—The Rev. James C. Street has resumed his duties in the Second Congregation, Rosemary-street, Belfast, after a long illness and absence from home.

ASHFORD, KENT.—A very successful tea-meeting and entertainment took place in connection with the chapel here on Monday last. About one hundred and twenty members of the congregation and their friends were present; and it was thought to be one of the heartiest and most enjoyable gatherings which have ever taken place at the chapel. On the following day the children of the Sunday-school and the younger members of the congregation had tea in the school-room, and spent the evening in various games. Mr. Moden made no reference to his early departure from the congregation at either of the meetings. The knowledge, however, that he is about to leave has led to many expressions of regret not only on the part of the friends and supporters of the movement, but from the leading inhabitants of the town. At the recent annual dinner, for example, of the Ashford Amateur and Professional Gardeners' Society, the Chairman, in proposing "The Archbishop and Clergy of the Diocese and ministers of other denominations," said they had in the parish not only many hard-working clergymen of the Church of England, but ministers of Nonconformist bodies as well. They had fortunately a minister present in Mr. Moden, than whom a more hard-working, indefatigable man he did not know. Although himself belonging to the Church of England, he had the greatest possible respect for Mr. Moden, and was extremely sorry to hear that he was about to leave the town.

THE CONGREGATIONALIST ON "UNITARIAN AFFIRMATIONS."

The Congregationalist for January, an able monthly organ of the Independent denomination, edited by the Rev. J. Guinness Rogers, has an interesting review of the "Ten Lectures on Positive Aspects of Unitarian Thought and Doctrine." It will be seen from the subjoined passages that the writer emphasises the wide theological differences which unquestionably exist between Unitarianism and any form of Evangelical dissent. The reviewer commences as follows:—

We imagine that Unitarians themselves will derive more instruction from these pages than those who have no sympathy with their conclusions. It is possible that a feeling of surprise may even be felt by each lecturer on learning some of the things which his brother lecturers have said. Both for the sake of the Unitarians and of the outside public, it was highly desirable that an attempt should be made to give the religious world some endeavour after positive truth. The boast, if not the glory, of the Unitarian body is that each member is permitted to think exactly as he likes. The preface to this book reminds the reader that, "he must not regard it as a departure from their (the lecturers') plan, if he finds in them not only striking varieties of manner, but even discrepancies of opinion." Why not? The Unitarian position is the right, unqualified by the responsibility, of private judgment. And it is theoretically an attempt to combine, in one denomination, men who hold antagonistic opinions on the fundamental principles of Christianity, and it may be of religion in general. This theoretical position is of course modified considerably by the exigencies of practical life; and consequently we find in Unitarianism a congeries of negations and affirmations drawn to one another by an inherent moral likeness. But still the differences may presumably be so great as to startle the onlooker, and to make concerted action very difficult. Men may lecture in the same hall, and publish their prelections within the same covers, but it still remains a question as to whether there is a residuum of positive truth in common, enabling them to hold the place of harmonious and combined leaders of religious thought.

The volume before us has special value in relation to Congregationalists. It is well understood that we have been passing through a changeful period in our theological position. The horizon has widened, and some of the old coastlights have disappeared. Not a few of our old mariners have felt grave anxiety; and some have warned us that we have been drifting of late years near Socinian shores. This book will enable us to take our bearings, and to see how far such warnings are justified by the facts of the case. It is impossible, we conceive, for any candid Congregationalist to read these defenses of Unitarian views without feeling that we are as far from their main positions about the Person and Work of Christ as our fathers were. We have got into wider seas of thought, but Christ is still the Sun in our heavens, and His Word is still the chart by which we navigate our vessel. The Unitarians themselves have changed remarkably during the last forty years. All the old Arian views of Christ, which seemed so near the Evangelical, have been surrendered; and instead of them we have positions taken up about our Lord which are essentially the same as those of Strauss, or Renan, or Keim. This may be progress, but to us it seems progress toward the arctic regions of religious thought. All parties have moved, but the question which determines the character of the movement depends on whether we have come nearer to, or gone farther from, the heart of Christ.

The reviewer, contrasting these lectures with the Liverpool controversy of 1839, goes on to say that "in theological thought tendencies should be carefully watched; and we note that Unitarianism goes surely, though slowly, away from the Divine elements of Christianity." But it is an obvious reply that this entirely depends upon what is meant by the Divine in Christianity, and it is clear that the writer of the article falls into the common error of identifying his own theological views and interpretations with Christianity. The reviewer then repeats the equally common charge that Unitarians when they refer to authorised creeds and theological confessions are attacking only a caricature of Orthodoxy:—

We have to complain that these lectures are directed against a distorted and exaggerated orthodoxy. The process of argument becomes very easy when you may choose out your own oppugnant doctrines. On one page we have the peculiar doctrines of the Gospel set forth as the complete depravity of human nature, the Divine wrath, the universal incapacity of pleasing God, a transaction between God's justice and His mercy whereby the innocent pays the penalty and the guilty go free, the appropriation by the believer of merits not his own, &c. Even Dr. Martineau disfigures an otherwise gentle and appreciative preface by representing Evangelical Christianity as a scheme, a system, a miraculous paroxysm in human history; without adding those large views of the Divine love which render the gospel something far grander than a mere scheme in the Divine counsels, or a cataclysm in the Divine life. The Christian world has moved on since the days of Calvin; and it is surely a waste of mental ability to be fighting with forms of thought which have become modified by new and, as we think, higher modes of regarding the Divine ways.

What we think must be clear to every reader of these lectures is that Evangelical Christianity is still as far removed as ever from Unitarianism. We do not doubt that Unitarians have done good work in moderating some of the harsher sides of Calvinism, and in saving thoughtless theologians from the errors of Trithemism. Their ethical teaching has always been of the purest, even when its motives were not of the most distinctively Christian order. The religious sentiment which has breathed through their teachings has touched many diverse souls. Their reverence for the character of Christ has been such as we believe our Lord will not disdain. But all this does not alter the fact that between Unitarianism and Evangelical religion there is a great gulf fixed. We rejoice that this should be brought out clearly by the Unitarians themselves in their very efforts to put in the forefront their positive truths. For them and for us it is a wholesome incident that makes the world see the specific difference between modern Unitarianism and New Testament Christianity.

It would be a strange thing if Unitarians could discourse on God, Worship, the Moral Law, on Man, the Bible, and the Religious Life, without bringing out many most valuable truths on which we are all agreed. But it is the function of philosophy to detect differences in order to see what are the fundamental bases of sound doctrine. And these differences, in the case before us, are as instructive as they would have been in the days of Priestley and Channing. Nay! more so. They reveal a downward tendency in Unitarianism toward Deism. In this volume we look in vain for the acknowledgment of the miraculous in any shape. The grave questions as to Christ's supernatural origin and supreme authority are simply shirked as irrelevant. And, as a result, we have a God without a specific revelation, a gospel which is a mere ethical code, a Christ who is only a man, a Christianity without miraculous credentials, and without a Divine Christ; a Church that is without definite convictions, and a religious life which is self-sacrifice without a sufficient motive power. Such is the positive but meagre fare on which Unitarianism seems to expect to feed the life of a lost world.

Now and then in this volume there is a strain of congratulation that these views are spreading outside the ranks of Unitarianism. This conviction, as far as Congregationalists are concerned, is, we are persuaded, utterly fallacious. Here and there there may have been an approach to humanitarian views of Christ, but these have been so singular as to be by their very rarity conspicuous. They have occupied attention to the exclusion of the whole body of Congregational Christians who, we venture to say, abide by the old truths of the Gospel, though they may not put them in the old way. These writers seem to forget that others beside themselves find the fountains of knowledge accessible, and take advantage of their opportunity. If Biblical criticism has opened up new fields of thought, if science has made fresh discoveries, if enterprise has widened our knowledge of the human race, Congregationalists were bound by their very position to take advantage of this augmenting information. If they to-day stood in reference to theological science where their fathers stood three hundred years ago, they would have been self-condemned. None are such sturdy defenders of the right and duty of private judgment as they. And having exercised it, they have modified and altered, and in some cases rejected, opinions held by the old Independents.

But for them as for their fathers, the facts of the Gospel remain unchanged and unchangeable. They have their affirmations. And the lectures and books which have proceeded from them show that they have not kept an ignoble silence. We thankfully recognise all the spiritual utterances which we find in these pages; but the truths contained there are by no means the exclusive discovery or property of the Unitarians. The positive and affirmative elements, in as far as they are true, are common to all who read and accept, or even only partially accept, the Bible. But there still remains an enormous difference in our estimate of facts, in our views as to the authority of Scripture, as to the main doctrines of Christianity, and, above all, as to the Person of Christ: and this difference must inevitably keep us apart. These pages afford abundant evidence why Congregationalists should not only be welded together by their form of Church polity, but much more by the great Evangelical truths which they hold in common.

We have given this long passage in full because it shows clearly what we have always acknowledged, that between Unitarianism and Evangelical orthodoxy there is at present a great gulf, although we do not add with the writer that the gulf is "fixed," if that word is meant to imply that it cannot be bridged over. We believe that it will be bridged over, notwithstanding what is stated above, by a growing approximation of thoughtful minds among Congregationalists to what we regard as liberal religion. In conclusion, the reviewer sums up as follows:—

There is much in this volume to invite criticism and to call forth argument. Our purpose, however, has been a plain and simple one, namely, to show how utterly worthless are all the alarms about our theological degeneracy, if this book be a standard by which to judge truly of our present position. To breathe reassurance into some timid minds, to induce the rash to hesitate, and to remind our Unitarian friends that we are never likely to be in the same camp as themselves, may be humble endeavours; but they may, at the same time, meet a few of the minor wants of the hour. The very title of this volume challenges intellectual contradiction. It assumes that Unitarianism contains at least the essence of Christianity. There was a time when its honoured editor, Dr. Martineau, refused to call any form of thought which repudiated the miracles, by that venerable name. There is no hint, as far as we can discover, that any one of the present writers believes in the Resurrection of Christ, that main miracle of Christianity. We are not entering on the moral region, where the denial of the name Christian seems to be associated with some amount of opprobrium; but as a purely intellectual question, Dr. Martineau may be appealed to in order to decide whether Unitarianism now deserves to have the Christian name attached to it. Once he gave great offence to his own co-religionists by refusing to call anything Christianity which eliminated the supernatural. And if in the supreme discussion as to what is the nature of Christian Truth we have to reject these "positive aspects," and to choose our own reading of New Testament facts and the Pauline interpretation of those facts, we cannot hesitate for a moment in our selection. If we want to win the world for Christ, and to see His gospel regnant, we must have something more positive than these aspects of Unitarianism. And if we wish to account for eighteen centuries of Christian history, we must get beyond Plato and Philo to the supernatural fact of an Incarnation, and to the merciful provision of pardon for the penitent by means of an atoning Saviour.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE HOSPITAL.—Mr. N. H. Nixon Secretary to the North London or University College Hospital, has published in a pamphlet a history of that institution from official documents from its modest commencement as the "University Dispensary," in George-street, Euston-square, down to the present time. Strictly speaking, the hospital dates from 1833—five years later than the opening of the dispensary—when, encouraged by the efforts of a committee of gentlemen, who had collected £2,300 towards the cost of a building, the council of University College obtained authority from the proprietors to appropriate a portion of their land for the purpose. The growth of the institution since then—a period of scarcely fifty years—gives an imposing idea of the activity of benevolent effort in London; but it appears that this development has not kept pace with human suffering and the demands upon the institution. From the date of its first opening nearly a million of patients have been treated, and in a single year the number of in and out patients is stated to be equivalent to one-tenth of the entire population of the large parish of St. Pancras. As regards the influence of the hospital on medical instruction it appears that more than five thousand medical men have received their professional training within its walls, the new entries for the year 1881 alone being one hundred and forty-seven, which places the school only second on the list in the metropolis. On the other hand, the hospital, in common with other benevolent institutions of its class, has suffered somewhat from the recent depression. The donations and legacies for the past year have been under the amount ordinarily received, for which and other reasons "considerably increased help" is, we learn, urgently needed.

MANCHESTER.—At a special meeting of Convocation of the Victoria University, held on Wednesday, Professor Roscoe presiding, Mr. Charles Hughes moved, and the Vice-Chancellor, Dr. Greenwood, seconded, the following resolution:—"That in the opinion of Convocation it is desirable that an ordinary bachelor's degree be conferred upon all persons being at the date of the charter associates of Owens College." With the substitution of the words "offered to" for "conferred upon," Convocation passed the resolution.

It is announced that the Congregational Union have accepted an invitation to hold its autumnal session next year in Bristol.

Occasional Notes.

Writing to the Rev. P. W. Clayden, on the 3rd of January, Dr. Bellows said:—"I think you are quite right in not wishing to make your projected conference (on the model of ours) so wide open as to deprive it of real organic force. We tacked on to our national conference 'Unitarian and other Christian churches,' to satisfy the non-sectarian class, who dread denominational activity and segregation. But it is of not the least account! No Christian churches have ever reported themselves, even of the Universalist or 'Christian connexion' (who are our congeners). Unitarianism means by itself anti-sectarianism. That has been its inspiration. But it is a religious body organised to protest against dogmatic and ecclesiastical narrowness. That it may be efficient even in its anti-sectarianism it must have some social bond, and some centralising quality. Let the Unitarians accept their isolation, and organise for extending their numbers and influence, and not be continually posing before the public as indifferents even as to their own views, and anxious to get others not in real sympathy with their opinions, to co-operate with them. We have had a long fight with this 'neither fish, flesh, nor good red-herring' policy of keeping loose and unorganised, and I think we have at last got the better of it, although your English leaders of Unitarian Christianity have always been quoted against us. To show by active living churches, that our large, free, undogmatic faith can bring forth the best fruits of piety and humanity, is our most urgent business. The floating liberalism—in the air—does very little to nourish practical piety, however much it may dissolve dogmatic fetters. We aim not at the vague end of liberalising public sentiment, but at the concrete end of increasing the number of Unitarian churches; for, when we have planted a new one firmly, we know that we have set up a tree that will bear the fruits of righteousness (and liberty) to succeeding generations."—But if Unitarianism really means "anti-sectarianism" we have no business to flaunt before the world a flag with exclusiveness in large letters inscribed upon it. We cannot, of course, expect, nor do we greatly desire, the presence at the so-called "National" Conference of the upholders of the old infallibilities—Orthodox, Ecclesiastical, and Biblical. But we do desire the presence of liberal religious thinkers of other names and communions, and if we are not greatly mistaken the coming Conference is organised upon a basis quite broad enough to include those who prefer "Catholicity" to any sectarian or denominational limitations, whether Trinitarian or Unitarian. It is no argument that because others may not come, therefore we should not maintain the essential principle of our "large, free, undogmatic faith."

THE REV. DR. LEES, of St. Giles's, Edinburgh, delivered two interesting lectures last week on "Clerical Humourists," to the members of the Philosophical Institution. He divided clerical humourists into two classes—(1) those who were more famous for their smart sayings than their sound sermons, whom they connected more with fun than divinity, with the dining-table rather than the pulpit; (2) those who were distinguished in their profession, but yet found relief in humour. In the former class were all degrees, ranging from the buffoon and the clown in clerical attire to men like Sydney Smith or Richard Barham. Dr. Lees in this connection referred to Rabelais, Swift (who wrote more libels than sermons, and whose sermons were dull enough in all conscience), Sterne, a master of the grotesque, but altogether a miserable creature; Sydney Smith, kind, wise, and genial, albeit more a wit than a divine; and Richard Barham, whose wit tended in the direction of practical joking. In his second lecture Dr. Lees took up the other class of clerical humourists, dwelling on the wit and sarcasm so characteristic of the Reformers, especially Latimer and Knox, the mingled eloquence and wit of the sermons of South, the eccentricities and piquancy of the utterances of Beridge and Rowland Hill, and of several Scotch ministers of last century. Coming down to more recent times, Dr. Lees called attention to the rich vein of sunny humour in such men as Dr. Guthrie, Dr. Norman Macleod, and Bishop Wilberforce. In conclusion, he regretted there was not more of cheerfulness mingled with modern religious life; there was a time for everything, and their religion was not to be nourished by bitter aloes.

On the 5th of November last we printed an article on "Religious Disabilities of Teachers of Board Schools," which at the time was objected to as an improbable statement, but the proceedings at the meeting of the School Board for London on Thursday last shows how well founded the complaints of the writer were. The action, also, of the Revs. T. Morse and H. Pearson at that meeting shows very plainly that the clerical party wish to perpetuate the present unjust conditions. It is certainly an enormity that colleges which receive nine-tenths of their support from public moneys should be able to play a denominational game.

A MEMORIAL from the Jews of England on behalf of their oppressed brethren in Russia was yesterday week handed to Prince Lobanoff, the Russian Ambassador, for transmission to the Emperor of Russia. The Prince, however, acting under instructions from his Government, declined to transmit the memorial. The document was signed and presented in person by Sir Nathaniel M. de Rothschild, Bart., M.P., as chairman of a committee that has been specially appointed by the representatives of the Jewish community in this country to deal with the Russo-Jewish question. In the course of the memorial the following passage occurs, which may well be commended to the attention of Professor Goldwin Smith, who, in his recent fierce attack on the Jews, taunts them on their sordid occupations:—"With regard to the imputations that have been made upon your Majesty's Jewish subjects, we humbly submit to your Majesty that whatever exceptional social position they may occupy, or whatever failings may be charged to some of them, these are due mainly to the exceptional laws to which they have been so long subjected. If, in some places, undue activity has characterised their conduct in certain trades and occupations, we believe it to be because other means of earning a subsistence have been denied them, because they have been too crowded in particular localities, and have, therefore, experienced the greatest difficulty in gaining a livelihood. We feel certain that if the special laws affecting the Jews were abolished, their exceptional status, social and civil, would come to an end. Complaint would no longer be heard of their undue commercial and economic activity operating to the detriment of others, if the Jews were suffered to disperse themselves at will, so as to become merged amid their fellow subjects, instead of being concentrated, to the injury of themselves and others, in overcrowded hives of industry. Here in England, where perfect civil and religious equality has been granted us, we English Jews can bear grateful testimony to the happy results effected by such complete emancipation. Here all those restrictions—civil, commercial, and educational—which formerly oppressed us have happily been removed. And, as a result, Jew and Christian here live and work side by side on terms of mutual respect and good fellowship, engaged in friendly rivalry, which stimulates public industry and adds to the common weal. And so, Sire, may it be in the mighty Empire whose destinies you wield with wisdom and enlightenment!"

It is quite clear, says the Christian World, that those gentlemen who have most completely put aside the ancient and convenient methods of conducting religious services on Sunday evenings have not found that their new plans are universally and constantly sufficient to accomplish the objects they have in view. If men once begin to employ "attractions" and "sensations" they must be on the look out for new ones to frequently take the place of those already tried, but found to be somewhat stale after repeated use. The Rev. H. R. Haweis, the clever London clergyman, of St. James's, Westmoreland-street, has been, perhaps, the most independent and original of all his brethren in this respect. But it looks rather discouraging to some who might bring themselves to give Sunday Evening Lectures on the Poets, or what not—to read the advertisement in the Times of Saturday, announcing that Mr. Haweis's Fourth Sunday Evening for the People would include a Sermon on Dissent, with the following additional items:—"Special Music.

Loan Collection of Sacred Paintings. The Electric Light will be used." Evidently, it is difficult to draw the line, when once the limits are overstepped, which most religious people hold to be wise and suitable.

MR. CLAYDEN, in speaking last week at the annual meeting of the Home Missionary Board, said that "he liked the name of the institution, but as to the word 'Board,' he did not understand it, that seemed to be the wooden part of the name." Mr. Black, in following, declared that he had never found a man who had been able to tell him the meaning of it. An old student reminds us that if these gentlemen had thought of the fact that the root of the word is Brād, broad, they would have seen that it indicates the breadth of the principle of the institution—broad Unitarianism, as contra-distinguished from some of the narrow kind that occasionally manifests itself.

A CHURCH-ATTENDANCE census for Glasgow and suburbs was taken on Sunday last under the auspices of the Glasgow Evangelistic Association. The object of the census was not to ascertain the numerical strength of the different denominations, but purely to advance spiritual work, and accordingly it is not intended at present to make the separate statistics known. The general results show that the aggregate attendance at the Evangelical and other churches (not Roman Catholic) at the principal diet of worship (the afternoon in most cases) was 115,292, the number of churches being 324. The aggregate attendance at the twenty Roman Catholic churches was 15,871.

THE following lines, headed "On the Persecution of the Jews," appeared in the Daily Telegraph this week:—

O Son of Man, by lying tongues adored,
By murderous hands of slaves with feet red-shod
In carnage deep as ever Christian trod;
Profaned with prayer and sacrifice abhorred
And incense from the trembling tyrant's horde,
Brute worshippers or wielders of the rod
Most murderous even of all that call thee God,
Most treacherous even that ever called thee Lord;
Face loved of little children long ago,
Head hated of the priests and rulers then,
If thou see this, or hear these hounds of thine
Run ravaging as the Gadarean swine,
Say, was not this thy Passion, to foreknow
In thy death's hour the works of Christian men?

NEWSPAPER Latin has never been famous for its accuracy, but in the current numbers of two weekly papers of considerable reputation we might have been spared such unusual combinations as ignus fatuus and infanti innocentes, which do not look like printers' errors.

THE annual income of London charities is shown by Mr. Howe's "Classified Directory" to have fallen during the last three years by nearly £81,000. The total, however, still reaches the enormous sum of £4,121,546, to which, as Mr. Howe observes, there are to be added the incomes of numerous institutions which do not make returns, and the amount distributed in relief by church and chapel congregations. Over and above this the Earl of Shaftesbury has estimated that the amount received by fraudulent charities reaches at least a quarter of a million sterling annually. The classes most affected have been, it appears, the medical charities, the general relief charities, the charities for orphans, and those for reformation and protection—these institutions being more than others dependent on voluntary contributions.

THE Karaites—the Jewish sect which renounces the Talmud and other Jewish legends—having come into prominence in connection with the Jewish outrages in Russia, some information as to their numbers may be interesting. Dr. Adler, the Chief Rabbi, states that there are not more than three thousand of them in Russia. We learn on the authority of a recent traveller who is well acquainted with the Karaites, that they number at least ten thousand persons. It has been said that they are to be found only in the Crimea. Many, however, reside at Moscow, although it appears that they are not to be met with at St. Petersburg.

Reviews.

The Revisers' English. A Series of Criticisms, showing the Revisers' Violations of the Laws of Language. By G. Washington Moon, F.R.S.L. Hatchards. 1882.

Two fallacies pervade this book. The first is that of two forms of expression only one can be right; the second is that the right one is that which Mr. Moon approves. The first head of his indictment is the "needless insertion of the conjunction and six additional times," in the explanation of the parable of the tares, Matt. xiii. 37-39. It is nothing to Mr. Moon that a corresponding conjunction is found in the same places in the original Greek; and that the Revisers, so far from inserting "and," have simply translated δέ. Mr. Moon, as we shall see, appears to believe in plenary and verbal inspiration. It ought not, therefore, to be deemed by him a needless insertion if, even at the cost of some sacrifice of elegance, a conjunction present in the Greek is faithfully rendered in the English; and surely to call it a "violation of the laws of language" is a violation of the laws of truth.

The next passage Mr. Moon falls foul of is Matt. vi. 19, "where moth and rust doth consume." Here the Revisers have simply let alone the grammar of their predecessors, and of the Greek. But Mr. Moon cannot let them alone. He gravely informs them that "it is one of the invariable rules of English grammar that the verb and its nominative must agree." The rule is not peculiar to English grammar, nor acquaintance with said rule a monopoly of Mr. Moon; but he appears to be blandly oblivious of the fact that the conjunction "and" links not only words, but sentences. When, therefore, it is said "moth and rust doth consume," the meaning, of course, as any one but Mr. Moon would have perceived, is "where moth doth consume, and rust doth consume." Alike in the Greek original and in the English rendering the singular verb, understood in one place, expressed in the other, implies that the moth consumes in one way, the rust in another. Moth and rust do not attack the same materials at one and the same time, as the plural verb would suggest. There is, therefore, good reason for a faithful translation of the Greek. In Matthew xxvii. 56, the case is far simpler. "Among whom was Mary Magdalene" is surely good grammar, as far as it goes. How, then, does it become bad by the addition of the words "and Mary, the mother of James and Joseph," &c.? Mr. Moon is dreadfully shocked by the suggestion that such additions are an afterthought. An afterthought of the Holy Spirit! Avant the blasphemy! What, then, would Mr. Moon do with the Greek original? For here, too, either the addition of Μαρία ἡ Μαгдаλήνη, κ. τ. λ. is an afterthought, or ἡ is bad grammar; and surely bad grammar is as unworthy of plenary inspiration as an afterthought. Indeed, Mr. Moon says as much; for again and again he reminds us that it is because he regards the Bible as the Word of God that he is so jealous of the laws of language in the matter of translation.

The same pretentious pedantry is displayed in regard to Mark iii. 33, "Who is my mother and my brethren?" "Who is they!" exclaims Mr. Moon! "Carelessness again—for the parallel passage in Matt. xii. 48 gives the inquiry grammatically, thus 'Who is my mother? and who are my brethren?' The preface, p. xiv., says, respecting parallel passage, "Where, as in the case of the first three Evangelists, precisely the same clauses or sentences are found in more than one of the Gospels, it is necessary to translate them in every place in the same way." Quite so; but had Mr. Moon been able to consult the original he would have found that in this case the clause in question, so far from being precisely the same in the two Evangelists, exhibits precisely the difference which the Revisers have faithfully rendered in their translation. Mr. Moon's happy innocence of Greek is shown on every page almost of his book. Nearly every fault he finds with the English of the Revisers is just as much and just as little a fault in the original Greek, of which their English is a rendering. Only in the case of the undoubtedly bad grammar of Revelation have they allowed themselves to improve upon the Greek. But then the Greek of the Apocalypse is so wildly ungrammatical that it would partly have been impossible to reproduce it in English, and partly such a reproduction, so far as it was possible, would not have been presentable to an English public at all. Our chief quarrel with the Revisers in this respect is, that they have taken upon themselves not only to translate bad Greek into good English, but in too many cases to revise the text itself in defiance of the oldest manuscripts. This should have entitled them to the gratitude of Mr. Moon, had he only been capable of appreciating it.

We will now favour the reader with a few more specimens of what Mr. Moon declares to be violations of the laws of language. We may say "agree," but not "agree together." "All which," but not "all of which." "Only," but not "alone," in the same sense. "Two alternatives" is right; "three alternatives" is wrong, although "alternare" in Latin means to do first one thing, then another; and so on, if need be, until a hundred things are done. "Backward" as an adverb is wrong, et hoc genus omne. "Propose" may never be used for "purpose" (verb). "For ever and ever" is to be discarded as redundant. Henceforth we must never say "it would seem," "it would appear," but only "it seems," "it appears." If a man is in London, and means to go on a visit to Manchester, he may not write to his friends, "I hope to come to you next week. It must be, 'I hope to go to you.' Could pedantry go further, or fare worse?"

Mr. Moon blames the Revisers for saying, in Matt. x. 4, "Judas Iscariot, who also betrayed him." According to Mr. Moon, they should have said, "And Judas Iscariot also, who betrayed him." The calm contempt of the Greek—ὁ καὶ παραδούς αὐτόν—which this suggestion implies, is refreshing in the extreme.

The same superb indifference to the original is exhibited on page 27, where Mr. Moon finds fault with the Revisers for saying "Lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven; . . . for where thy treasure is there will thy heart be also," in ignorance apparently of the fact that if this be wrong in English, it is far more wrong in Greek, where "your" cannot possibly be used, as with us, for "thy." The truth is, of course, that the first sentence is addressed to men generally, the second to a single person, and probably the want of agreement between the two arises from the fitting together by the Evangelist of two distinct sayings. Any translation which would mask the composite character of the Sermon on the Mount would be unfaithful.

Mr. Moon is sorely exercised in spirit as to whether he is to accept the reading "Satan falling as lightning from heaven," or "fallen," as the deliberate rendering of the Revisers. A simple reference to the original πρόντα, not πίπτοντα, would have settled the question at once in the mind of anyone able to read Greek. In the light of this fact the following sentences are so richly amusing that we cannot forbear quoting them at length. "There is a very remarkable error (!) in Luke ix. 18, which, at the Newcastle Church Congress, was pointed out by Canon Evans. I had not noticed it; and for a very simple reason, namely, that, in the 'Brevier 16mo.' edition, a copy of which is the one that I use, the error does not exist. There the passage correctly (!) reads as follows: 'I beheld Satan falling as lightning from heaven; but in all the other editions of the Revised New Testament it is, 'I beheld Satan fallen as lightning from heaven.'" This is charmingly naive.

In Mr. Moon's lengthy discussion of the proper use of "if," "though," &c., he admirably though unconsciously illustrates the saying that a little knowledge is a dangerous thing. Taking his stand on the admitted connection between "give" and "if," he concludes that "if" cannot properly be made to do duty for "whether," and "though." But the fact is that in our word "if" two distinct words have in process of time become confounded. Gef, yef, yif, yf, with the Scotch gif and gin, are in all probability identical with "give" and "given." But, on the other hand, if in English cannot be separated from of—"whether," in Dutch, ob, in Modern High German, Old Saxon and Old Norse ef. "Though," Mr. Moon informs us, is the imperative of the Anglo-Saxon "thafian," to allow. This is certainly not the case, for the simple reason that we find it already in full activity before the various Teutonic tongues had split off from the parent stock; witness Gothic tharh, Old High German doh, Frisian, Dutch, and German doch, Anglo-Saxon theah, &c. Moreover, if "though" really meant "grant," as Mr. Moon contends that it originally did, and if "if" means also "grant," whence the distinction which he says is observed between them by accurate writers? And what is this distinction? In Luke ix. 53 the Revisers have "as though he were going to Jerusalem." This, says Mr. Moon, is wrong, because though "implies opposition." Yet in 2 Cor. x. 2 and 9 Mr. Moon says:—"As if we walked according to the flesh," and as if I would terrify you by my letters," are right; although surely here opposition is implied, for "as is not the case" or something to that effect, is understood in both passages.

With regard to the use of "alone" for "only," which Mr. Moon declares illegitimate, no one who compares the cognate "allein" in High German will be inclined to agree with him.

Mr. Moon expatiates on page 121 upon the subtle connection between logic and grammar. Commenting on Mark xii. 32, "There is none other but he," he observes, "The error of using the word 'other' in this passage. . . will be apparent if you consider the meaning of the word 'but.' It is derived from the A.S. be-utan 'to take out,' and consequently is equivalent to 'exclude.' Therefore the meaning of the passage is, 'If you exclude God, there is none other.' By parity of reasoning. . . if you include God there is another. But 'another' than whom? Clearly another than Himself, so that the passage as written by the Revisers affirms, by implication the existence of at least two Gods!" To show the glaring ineptitude of this sophism it is only necessary to substitute for "other" the word "left," its exact equivalent in the phrase suggested by Mr. Moon. "Exclude God, and there is none left." "Include God and there is one left." Where is the absurdity now? So much for Mr. Moon's logic; but what of his etymology? As a matter of fact Be-utan or be-ut, = by-out or by-uten, the Lancashire bout and bouten, the Dutch buiten is simply an adverb, conjunction, and preposition. There is no such verb as either utan, or a compound be-utan in A.S.

Once more Mr. Moon remarks, page 136:—"One of the most frequent errors in the Revised New Testament is the changing of the tense of the verb where there is no change of time in the incidents recorded, and he proceeds to give examples. It is needless to add that in every instance the Revisers follow the Greek. Does Mr. Moon really require to be told that the change in graphic description from the aorist or imperfect to the historic present and back again is common to all languages which can properly be said to have tenses at all; that if it is wrong in English it is equally wrong in Greek; and that if it is allowable in Greek it is equally allowable in English? Truly it may be said in the words of a great philologist, "he who only knows one language knows none." A striking instance of this occurs on page 54, where we read, "And straightway coming up out of the water, he saw the heavens rent asunder, and the Spirit as a dove descending upon him." It says, "He saw." Who saw? Jesus or John? The Greek text is ambiguous, for the verb εἶδε will apply either to Jesus or to John; and the Revisers have very properly left the ambiguity." Now in point of fact there is not the least ambiguity in the Greek, and whatever shade of ambiguity there is in the English arises from the full stop at "Jordan," and the insertion of the pronoun "he." While Mr. Moon is microscopic in his examination of the Revisers' supposed errors, he is blind as a bat to his own blunders. A "Country Scholar" very properly points out to him that by insisting that Acts xvii. 34 should be "certain men clave unto him, and believed; among whom also were Dionysius, the Areopagite, and a woman named Damaris, &c.," he makes the writer enumerate Damaris among men. But Mr. Moon does not see it, and thinks there is nothing curious in a woman being among men, unconscious apparently that ἐν οἷς means "of whom"; and that ἀδύναμις is really nominative, not to ἡν (understood), but to κολληθεῖσα ἐπὶ τρεῖς (understood). In default of argument, he calls his critic a "misogynist," which is neither witty nor wise. So much for the Revisers' English, and now for Mr. Moon's.

In the dedication we find in the same sentence six consecutive "ands," three of which are wholly superfluous. In the preface we find the phrases "compunctly to delight," "a series of consecutive numbers," and "from this circumstance arises the necessity," instead of "hence the need." And this from a writer who protests against redundancy! On page 7 we read "re-echo," where "echo" is meant. On page 10 two "its," without any noun to which they can be referred. On page 18 "that in which mankind are most consistent is in their being inconsistent," where the second in is, to say the least, "redundant." On page 34, for "involved the sacrifice of," Mr. Moon writes "involved the necessity of sacrificing," and we are told in the same breath that the Revisers' desire to be faithful is both "excessive" and "commendable." On page 38 "the Revisers avow that they had been actuated," a strange collocation of tenses. On page 43, "yet the rule for the proper use of them also is very simple," where we defy the reader to point out the precise force of the also. On page 77 we are informed that "every dilemma is an alternative." We should have thought that every dilemma was a pair of alternatives. But live and learn! On page 82 we are told to say instead of Pilate marvelled "if he were dead" already, "whether he was," and that the meaning is, "Pilate marvelled or wondered whether he was dead or not!" In either case, it seems, Pilate was equally surprised.

On page 93 Mr. Moon is himself "surprised that the Revisers have so egregiously erred in stating so plain a truth." So are we. To err egregiously in stating a truth is enough to surprise any one. On page 108 we are treated to "however much as we may sympathize," which is delicious; and on page 112 we find the following precious gem: "This apparent play upon words is very unseemly in the sacred Scriptures, a remarkable instance of which occurs in Gen. xxi. 19-20, where it says," &c. And this from a writer who ironically rallies the Revisers on their particularity in the use of pronouns! On page 115 we are told that a "particular instance" "occurs more than twenty times," which is, to say the least, remarkable. On the same page we read that, not to speak of the inelegance of the colloquial expression, "eating no bread," it is an affirmative assertion! Whether it be colloquial is a matter of experience, whether it be inelegant is a matter of taste; but that a participle followed by a negative adjective and a noun in agreement therewith in the objective case is neither affirmative nor an assertion is matter of grammar and of fact. You cannot have an assertion without a verb.

After all, there is some truth in Dogberry's saying that "reading and writing come by nature." The pedant is always on stilts and in constant danger of stumbling, and Mr. Moon we consider a pedant and charlatan of the first water. He forgets that grammatical rules are simply an attempt at a scientific classification of the facts of linguistic usage. Grammar was made for usage, and not usage for grammar. The people, and not the pedants, make the language. If some of our readers think us too severe on Mr. Moon, let them consider how Mr. Moon treats those who differ from him. On pp. 102-103 occurs the following choice tirade, "The Rev. T. C. Hyatt is certainly one of the densest pupils that I ever tried to instruct; and had I known the difficulty of getting an idea into his head I would not have wasted my time in the apparently hopeless task." After that can Mr. Moon complain of ungentle treatment? We will conclude with his own conclusion as a specimen of his stilted style. "There is scope in the varied themes of the Word of God for the grandest organ-utterances of language; and these, bearing those themes, should peal through the mighty cathedral of the world, in tones which could not but thrill with responsive vibrations the throbbing hearts of its many million worshippers. On the reading of such a version, blessed by the Holy Spirit of God, they would tremble under the rolling thunder of its awful denunciations of hypocrisy; melt into gushing tearfulness of repentance beneath its gracious offers of mercy; and, in their depths of godly sorrow, would hear so tender a voice speaking to them in pitying accents of forgiveness that influenced by those wondrous words of love, they would in spirit rise as on angels' wings of ecstasy to heaven, and adoringly bow in unutterable gratitude before the throne of the Most High." With all the evident labour bestowed on this passage it is not clear whether "on the reading of such a version" means "on reading it," or on its "being read;" nor whether it is the reading, the version, or the readers or hearers that are blessed, nor whether "of forgiveness," is governed by "accents," or "speaking."

In any other writer some of these points would scarcely call for notice; but then Mr. Moon is a stickler for accuracy, and should remember the warning:—

Short Notices.

The Story of Chief Joseph. By Martha Perry Lowe. Boston, U.S. Lothrop and Co. 1881.

Mrs. Lowe, so well known as one of the principal contributors to the Unitarian Review of Boston, has given an elegant poetic version of Chief Joseph's pathetic narrative, as told by Bishop Hare, of Niobraria, in the April number of the North American Review of 1879. She has successfully preserved the simple and direct style of the Indian, and enlisted our sympathies on behalf of a race possessed of some noble qualities, which is rapidly disappearing before the advance of the rude kind of civilisation with which alone it is brought into direct personal contact. Mrs. Lowe will not herself pretend to possess the genius of Longfellow, and her poem will not bear comparison with "Hiawatha," but still it has merits enough of its own to give the accomplished authoress no mean place among the poetesses of America.

We believe that the Indians have been better dealt with in the Dominion than in the United States, but even there they are liable to oppression. Six years ago our late friend Dr. P. P. Carpenter described in the Daily News the persecution of the Oka Indians near Montreal, by the Catholic "Seminary;" after they were converted from the Church of Rome by the Wesleysans—[Memoir, pp. 329-333.] We heard a few months ago that the Indians had at length been worried out of the lands which the Seminary wished to possess! We hope that Mrs. Lowe's book—like Cooper's stories of Indian life half-a-century ago—will serve to excite fresh interest in the Indians.

The following lines, expressing the sentiments of the Chief, will give some idea of the character and tone of the poem, which we may add is enriched with seven full page illustrations of Indian life, and is beautifully printed and bound:—

I know my race must soon decay;
I know that we shall fade away,
Unless we march the road you take,
And drink the knowledge which your thirst doth slake.

So be it then; we ask, we ask,
That you shall set us to your task.
We will accept it at your hands,
But give us back our lands;
Give us our freedom, give us law,
And there shall be no war.
The white and red men shall abide
As loving brothers, side by side,
Content and strong and free
Forever we shall be.

The Indian names In-mut-too-yah-lat-lat, and Too-hoot-hoot-suit are certainly not quite so poetical, euphonious as they are, as those in "Hiawatha."

Roumanian Fairy Tales and Legends. Translated by E. B. Mawer. London: H. K. Lewis. 1881.

The literature of Roumania is so little known in England that this book was sure to be joyfully welcomed by the now numerous people interested in Folk Lore, even though its merits had been much below what they actually are. Accordingly the Folk Lore Society in England have made the translator one of themselves, while the King of Roumania has conferred the exceptional distinction of the medal of the "Bene Merenti." The work is appropriately dedicated to the beautiful Queen of Roumania, whose photograph adorns the book as a frontispiece, appropriately, because she herself has just put into the German tongue a volume of Roumanian poems. A residence of over twenty years in Roumania as the wife of an English physician has enabled the translator to place before readers here some of the most popular Basme and legends of the country, and this she has done in a style which marks her an accomplished writer. For the tales themselves it is enough to say they are fairy tales, and if they only bring to us memories of happy, happy childhood, they are good and healthful.

Sweet Cinderella, even before the ball,
How did I love thee—ashes, rags, and all!
What bliss I deemed it to have stood beside,
On every virgin when thy shoe was tried!
How longed to see thy shape the slipper suit!
But, dearer than the slipper, lov'd the foot.

And they must be cast in a very unenviable mould who scorn these stories of dragons and knights and captive ladies, of winged horses, of fairies, and of Merlin. There is, however, a deeper meaning in all these things than such hard-grained natures can appreciate. This perverse people cannot understand the conclusions of the modern study of comparative mythology and folk lore any more than they can understand the busy hum of nineteenth century progress which disturbs their eighteenth century sleep.

Leaves from a Naturalist's Note-book. By Andrew Wilson, F.R.S.E., F.L.S., &c. (London: Chatto and Windus. 1882.)—This is a new volume in the publishers' "Mayfair Library," and, we believe, the only book of natural history in that library. Although most of the chapters in the volume have appeared previously in various magazines, we are pleased to see them collected in the present form, not only because anything of the kind from the pen of Dr. Andrew Wilson is sure to be valuable, but also because we regard biological subjects as the most healthful of all studies. The author is only a very young man, but as a teacher—whether on the platform, in the laboratory, or in the press—his performances have already borne good fruit, and promise better. We recommend these "Leaves" for perusal by all true lovers of Nature.

Literary Notes.

We are glad to hear that a memoir of the late excellent Samuel Sharpe is in preparation, and that our late valued friend has left ample materials for such a work.

MESSRS. GEORGE BELL AND SONS are about to publish a small philosophical work by the Rev. E. P. Scrymgeour, lecturer on English literature in King's College, London, entitled "The Doctrine of the Cross: a Contribution to the Theory of the Christian Life."

MR. HENRY RICHARD, M.P., has undertaken to prepare a memoir of his friend, the late Mr. Edward Miall, of the Nonconformist, and asks for letters in the possession of any of his correspondents.

PROFESSOR HUXLEY is now engaged on a work on Bishop Berkeley, and his contributions to mental and medical science, which the Professor and his friends anticipate will prove his magnum opus.

Just before his death Dean Stanley wrote for the Century Magazine an estimate of the life and influence of F. W. Robertson, in his opinion the greatest preacher of the nineteenth century. Unfortunately for the immediate publication of the article, the corrections and marginal additions were in the Dean's own handwriting, which to any one except his amanuensis, and perhaps himself, was about as intelligible as the Mexican hieroglyphics. The article was sent back to England to be deciphered, and with what interesting results will be seen in the February Century. A portrait of Robertson will accompany the article. The February number will also contain a new essay by Mr. R. W. Emerson, on "The Superlative," a plea for simplicity in literary style; and a long poem by Mr. Longfellow, entitled "Hermes Trismegistus," dealing with the adventures of that semi-mythical personage.

MR. THOMAS GRIFFIN, known to proprietors of "partly printed" newspapers as the inventor of "Griffin's stereotype," is about to establish a new evening paper, to be called the Birmingham Echo. The new paper will be conducted upon independent political principles.

THE BROWNING SOCIETY will, we understand, as soon as funds permit, ask Mr. Browning to let it facsimile or print the "Book" of "The Ring and the Book"—that is, the small folio collection of pleadings and MS. reports of the trial of Guido Franceschini, which Mr. Browning bought for a "lira—just eightpence," and which first suggested his famous poem to him.

MESSRS. CLOWES AND SONS will shortly publish a work by Mr. Serjeant Pulling, entitled "The Order of the Coif," and embracing as well the history of the old order of sergeants-at-law, and the very wide range of matter with which the subject is identified. It will have illustrated engravings and woodcuts.

THROAT IRRITATION.—Soreness and dryness, tickling and irritation, inducing cough and affecting the voice. For these symptoms use Epps's Glycerine Jujubes. Glycerine, in these agreeable confections, being in proximity to the glands at the moment they are excited by the act of sucking, becomes actively healing. Sold only in boxes, 7½d. and 1s. 1½d., labelled, "JAMES EPPS and Co., Homoeopathic Chemists, London." A letter received:—"Gentlemen,—It may, perhaps, interest you to know that, after an extended trial, I have found your Glycerine Jujubes of considerable benefit (with or without medical treatment) in almost all forms of throat disease. They soften and clear the voice.—Yours faithfully, GORDON HOLMES, L.R.C.P.E., Senior Physician to the Municipal Throat and Ear Infirmary."

Our Contemporaries.

"IS A UNITARIAN A CHRISTIAN?"

The Figaro—a very secular journal—has been having a smart controversy with a well-known Unitarian minister, whose name we do not mention, as his letters have grieved judicious readers. In last Saturday's number we read the following:—

Mr. J. McGrigor Allan addresses us, under the title of "Is a Unitarian a Christian?" a long communication, in the course of which he attempts to prove the negative. He may be right; but we have not the remotest intention of opening our columns to an attack upon the Unitarian body. Mr. Allan appears to think that because Mr. ——— has called the editor of the Figaro a fool and a rogue we are willing to recognise him as a fair representative of Unitarians. He is, obviously, nothing of the kind; though if he were we should not like to say Mr. ——— was not a Christian, because, like many other silly men, he lost his temper in a controversy. We prefer to think that Dr. Vance Smith and Mr. Martineau are representatives of what is good in Unitarianism, and perhaps even Mr. Allan would hardly care to denounce them as non-Christians. But it may be worth while to say a little more. The Figaro is not a suitable journal for the discussion of the question raised by Mr. Allan. It may, however, save that gentleman, and others, trouble, if we observe that, in our opinion, the real test of Christianity is not profession, but practice. It is a very good thing, no doubt, to hold orthodox opinions; but they were orthodox persons who killed the Founder of Christianity. Mr. Allan may not, like Mr. ———, be a teacher of religion, but we are not sure that he might not use his time better than by proving, or trying to prove, that "a Unitarian Christian" is "a contradiction in terms." There are bigots who deny that Roman Catholics can be Christians.

THE PERSECUTION OF THE JEWS.

The Spectator endeavours to account as follows for the prevailing persecution of the Jews in various countries of the Continent:—

We scarcely wonder that many excellent people still believe that the persecutions of the Jews are, so to speak, arranged by Providence; that their expulsions are instigated by God to keep them dispersed; that they are, in fact, still fulfilling an unhappy, mysterious, and preordained destiny. There is something not easily explained in a liability to outbursts of popular hatred which has endured so many centuries, and become visible among so many widely separated races, professing so many different religions. The German of to-day is as unlike the mediæval German in religious ideas as he is in knowledge and in costume, but he is just as ready, if he has only a chance, to fly at a Jew's throat. All history is full of the records of popular outbreaks against a people who, of all peoples, give the least overt occasion for them; who are not conquerors, not aristocrats in politics, not law-breakers, not in the least separate as regards ordinary social moralities, from the people among whom they dwell, who are, in fact, curiously receptive, and so capable of assimilation, that there are no Germans so German, no French so French, no Italians so Italian, as the Jews of those three countries. The Jews do not offend the moral instincts of the nations. They hold, we believe, as an abstract theory, that polygamy is allowable, wherever civilisation admits of it, but they do not practice it; and for the rest, they obey the Commandments quite as well as their neighbours. That they should have been periodically attacked in all ages, and in Mohammedan as well as Christian countries—some of the worst massacres they have suffered have been due to Mohammedans—is a very singular fact, the popular explanations of which are not entirely convincing.

The truth is, modern Jews suffer from these outbreaks from three causes, which are not precisely faults of their own, which are permanent, and which, until they mix with the populations so as to lose their identity, are irremediable. In the first place, they are foreigners in Europe, and foreigners who, as the popular instinct, rather than any knowledge, tells the people, are foreigners from another continent, and not another State. Cultivated Jews, for some unintelligible reason—for Asia has as much right to exist as Europe, and has done, perhaps, more for humanity, St. Paul, after all, being more useful than George Stephenson—dislike to be reminded of this, and have an idea that they can lose themselves among people who discern the Jewish strain and family to the fourth generation. The fact, nevertheless, exists, and is the cardinal fact of the situation. The Jews everywhere are foreigners, and in Europe, Asiatic foreigners, separated from the people by lines which, though sometimes indefinable, are ineffaceable. Moreover, the majority of them take no pains to efface them, but remain, in their marriage laws, their ceremonial laws, their laws of diet, and, in Russia, their dress, separate and Asiatic. The European populace everywhere dislike and distrust foreigners, and especially foreigners widely distinct in race, with an antipathy which is at once unreasonable, and to Christians immoral, but which is incurable, so long as the ground of offence exists. The Americans, after a hundred years, retain their antipathy to the Negro, who holds the same faith as themselves, and will not put up with the Chinese, who has the attraction of entire freedom from prejudices, and extraordinary efficiency in business. The common people do not hate the Jews for their creed, their dress, or their ceremonies, but for their foreignness, Asiatic foreignness, which those things bring perpetually before their eyes. Then these foreigners, though not specially distinguished for intellectual power,—the Jews though often distinguished in literature, are seven millions, and have not in modern times originated, invented, or discovered much, in proportion to their numbers—possess in a high degree the faculty of accumulation. Every race has its useful power, or it could not survive, and this is theirs everywhere outside Palestine, where they seem never to grow rich. In our modern society, this faculty has suddenly become the one which confers power; and naturally, power in the hands of foreigners not liked for themselves, excites, first, burning jealousy, and then wrath. The populations feel as if their wealth were being taken away from them by intruders, and in one respect they are right. The Jews do not contribute their share to the general reservoir of means. We do not attribute this to them as a fault, any more than we attribute the absence of architecture among Semitic races to them as a fault, but still it increases the popular dislike. No Jew produces anything, ploughs, or mines, or builds, or adds to the general wealth of the world. What he does is to distribute adroitly, levying toll in the process, and the world therefore seems no richer for him. A project has been talked of this week for sending half-a-million or so of Jews from Russia to America, there to colonise a settlement. They would not remain a year in that settlement, and during that year would import all their food. They were husbandmen once, diggers, ploughers, vine-dressers; but it took the stern Mosaic Law to bind them to the soil, and since the Dispersion they have utterly lost the art. Granted a large and visible tribe of Asiatic foreigners, prospering in all distributing departments of life, exempt from suffering by bad harvests, and adding nothing apparent to national wealth, and we have explanation enough for the hatred of ill-educated and jealous millions. The situation is no justification of the hate—there can, for Christians, be no justification for hatred towards a people—but it is an explanation.

CHURCH REFORM.

The Echo writes:—The public meeting of the National Church Reform Union at Manchester was not the opening of its campaign, but its second attack. The first meeting was held at Nottingham on the previous Thursday. Though it was not crowded, it was well attended by a representative audience. Certain Englishmen who are accessible to Liberal arguments in every other province of public life appear to take it for granted that the Church is a province in which Reform is either undesirable or impossible. The mere open "scandals" of ecclesiastical life—such as the sale of livings—find few defenders; but it is hard to arouse the sluggish lay conscience or lay reason to perceive that the extraneous imposition of a pastor upon a society of intelligent and self-respectful men—who would not endure such an imposition in any political or social fellowship of which they are members—is the fundamental scandal. The National Church Reform Union has uphill work before it, because it cannot appeal to prejudice, party passion, or established interests—like the English Church Union or the Church Association—but has to create opinion. The laity do not realise that they themselves are the Church, and that the clergy are their "ministers," or servants. The word "Church" has so long been flung to and fro in controversy, by all parties alike, in a vague abstract sense, as the title of some intangible and invisible entity, that men have clean forgotten that the word means a company of real flesh-and-blood persons. The Church Reform Unionists will have to fight the hardest battle over the definition of the individual unit of this company. In their view, it would seem, which is derived mainly from Dr. Arnold and Dean Stanley, every Englishman as such—one speaker said "every householder"—is a Churchman. The Dissenter, the Low Churchman, the High Churchman, and the Roman Catholic will all be inclined to contest this position, which may be pushed to such an extreme of doctrinarism as to make Christendom and the Church two different things, and in the end two contrary things. If an Agnostic thinks he ought to go to church and take part in church government, why should he not become a vicar, or even a bishop? Mr. Louis Greg might tell us what he thinks on this point.

THE "QUARTERLY REVIEW" ON "THE REVISED VERSION."

A long and trenchant criticism on the Revised Version of the New Testament occupies the foremost place in the new number of the Quarterly Review. The article is evidently from the pen of the writer of the equally trenchant criticism of the Revised Text in the previous number of the Quarterly—Dean Burgon, of Chichester. The nature of the article, which fills sixty-three pages of the Review, may be gathered from the following sentences:—

To speak plainly, the book becomes unreadable. We lay the revisers' volume down, convinced that the case of their work is simply hopeless. . . . It is idle, worse than idle, to dream of revising this revision. We are greatly concerned, greatly surprised, most of all disappointed. We had expected a vastly different result. The reviewer, who expresses his scorn for the revisers by the liberal use of italics, asks: "Who was to suppose that the instructions given to the Revisionists would be by them systematically disregarded? Who was to imagine that an utterly untrustworthy Greek text constructed on mistaken principles would be the fatal result? Who was to foresee that instead of removing the plain and clear errors of our version, the Revisionists would themselves introduce a countless number of blemishes unknown to it before? . . . The worst has not been told, and it were dishonesty to insinuate that it has." He charges them with recording in the margin of the English Bible certain blunders which disfigure some or many of the ancient authorities—a practice which in his opinion can only result in hopelessly unsettling the faith of millions. "They have thus sown broadcast over four Continents doubts as to the truth of Scripture which it will never be in their power to remove or recall. They have choked up the margin of our English Bible with remarks which create perplexity and insinuate doubt." He maintains that "an authoritative recension of the Greek text will have to precede any future revision of the English of the New Testament;" and that it is certain the time for such an undertaking has not yet arrived. "Before it can be done a generation of students should give themselves entirely up to this neglected branch of sacred branch." "It is clear that caprice, not necessity, has determined not a few of the alterations which molest us in every part of the present work." The five principal classes of alterations indicated by the Revisionists are passed in review, and the general result is that the Authorised Version is pronounced better in every instance. "A morbid striving after etymological accuracy has proved the ruin of one of the most affecting scenes in St. John's Gospel. Many novelties in the present Revision betoken a want of familiarity with the refinements of the Greek language on the one hand and only a slender acquaintance with the resources and proprieties of English speech on the other. To alter 'Canst thou speak Greek' into 'Dost thou know Greek' really betrays ignorance; it is something worse than bad taste; it is a deliberate blunder. . . . The work is disfigured throughout by changes which convict the revisers of scarcely a moderate appreciation of the idiomatic resources of their own language. . . . A school-boy method of translation is in constant operation throughout."

The reviewer further accuses the Revisers of offensive pedantry, tasteless barbarism, inexcusable blundering, and senseless, officious, and even unscholarlike innovation. In the Second Epistle of St. Peter they have introduced no less than thirty changes in thirty-eight words, hopelessly spoiling one of the most exquisite passages of the New Testament, and rendering it well-nigh unintelligible by their pedantic officiousness. In one of their marginal notes, he asserts, "they have dragged the Church of England through the mire and made it ridiculous in the eyes of Christendom." This blunder, which is "gross as a mountain, open and palpable," is, it seems, a remark that, instead of "Melita," some English authorities give "Melitene." The explanatory notes are some of them crude, inaccurate, infelicitous, giving an incorrect idea; displaying no familiarity with the Septuagint, and perplexing and misleading plain readers whom they profess to assist.

The article is in the same strain throughout. The following are some of the sweeping criticisms with which the last twenty pages abound:—"As well on grounds of scholarship and taste as of textual criticism, the work before us is immensely inferior to the Authorised Version, and an utter failure. Who can but wonder at the bad taste and singular lack of judgment which has ventured to substitute 'bowls' for 'vials' in the Book of the Revelation?" The substitution of the word "love" for "charity" in the 13th chapter of Corinthians is a "real calamity," which the reviewer regards with displeasure equal to that with which he recognises in the revision a deliberate elimination of "miracles" from the New Testament:—

"The getting rid of the name, in the account of millions, will be regarded as the getting rid of the thing. By substituting 'sign' for 'miracle' some nineteen or twenty occasions, by the substitution of 'epileptic' for 'lunatic,' as well as in other ways, the new version reflects the sickly hue of modern thought which is often but another name for the latest fashion of modern unfaithfulness. A fidgety anxiety is manifested to explain away, or at least to evacuate, expressions which have to do with eternity. A more injudicious or unwarrantable innovation it would be impossible to indicate than that which has thrust the Evil One into the Lord's Prayer. If we take away the doxology as our Revisionists propose we shall begin the Lord's Prayer with 'Our Father' and literally end it with the devil. If one crop of infirmities is industriously weeded out another crop of far grosser deformities in industriously planted in. The Revisionists had a noble version before them, which they have contrived to mar in every part."

After complaining of "their uncouth phraseology and jerky sentences, their pedantic obscurity, and their stiff, constrained manner, their fidgety affectation of accuracy, and their habitual achievement of English which fails to exhibit the spirit of the original Greek," the reviewer says:—"This work of theirs will nevertheless render service to mankind. It will discharge the office of a warning beacon to as many as shall hereafter embark on the same enterprise. It will convince men of the danger of pursuing the same ill-omened course, trusting to the same guidance, and venturing too near the same wreck-strewn shore."

In bringing his tremendous onslaught to a conclusion the Reviewer declares somewhat inconsistently that "the Revisionists have never had the misfortune seriously to obscure a single feature of Divine truth, nor have they inadvertently, in any quarter (as we hope), inflicted a wound which will leave an abiding scar behind it," which may be supposed to mean that the Revisers' work is so thoroughly contemptible that they have not been able to do as much mischief as might have been expected from their "offensive pedantry, tasteless barbarism, and senseless and unscholarlike innovations."

The very bitterness of his anathemas shows that the Reviewer has a clearer perception than many of his fraternity of the real injury which will be inflicted upon the old Orthodoxy by the significant changes made by the Revisers. See on this point the recent admirable little manual by Dr. G. Vance Smith on "Revised Texts and Margins."

LIVERPOOL LITERARY AND PHILOSOPHICAL SOCIETY. —At a meeting of this society at the Royal Institution, Colquitt-street, on Monday evening, the Rev. S. Fletcher Williams read a paper on "Some Popular Misconceptions of Darwinism." The paper is reported in summary in the Liverpool Post and Mercury. Sir James Picton, the Rev. H. A. Higgins, Dr. Drysdale, Mr. Malcolm Guthrie, Dr. Carter, and the President, Mr. Edward Davies, F.C.S., took part in the discussion, and warmly complimented Mr. Williams, who, at the close, received a hearty vote of thanks.

With a view to promote art in Wales, a proposal is on foot to found a "Cambrian Academy of Arts," which shall have its home at Llandudno, the accepted art centre of the Principality.

Correspondence.

THE HOME MISSIONARY BOARD.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—I have often fancied as I have listened to or read the speeches delivered at the annual meetings of some of our denominational institutions that the speakers must have arranged beforehand not to bring forward anything that could not be painted in roseate hues.

I well know how unwelcome a task is his who feels called upon to break in upon the hilarity of a festive gathering by reminding the guests that though all looks fair and beautiful to the outward eye there is, nevertheless, a "skeleton" secreted in the domestic cupboard.

If anywhere there ought to be the most transparent truthfulness of statement and the greatest candour, that place is the religious platform. Having some acquaintance with the actual state of our Unitarian Churches and the Unitarian Ministry at the present time, I am somewhat surprised and not a little hurt at the tone of some of the speeches delivered in Manchester on Tuesday last at the annual meeting and soiree of the Unitarian Home Missionary Board. I shall be truly sorry if in what I write I lay myself open to the charge of imputing wrong motives to any of the speakers, because I believe all of them to be honourable and high-minded men. But I think some of them have been misinformed as to, or have been forgetful of, the real facts of the case. Either there has been a "conspiracy of silence" in regard to the true state of denominational affairs, or some of the speakers did not know what they were talking about. Men like Mr. Clarke and Mr. Clayden, who are engrossed in other spheres of labour, cannot be expected to know intimately all about the supply of and demand for Unitarian ministers, but the Committee of the Home Missionary Board should have thought twice before printing so misleading a statement as the one with which they conclude their last annual report.

There are not a few earnest and well-informed Unitarians who are of opinion that there is a good deal of hollowiness, if not positive clap-trap, about this continual and wearying harping on the so-called need of young men of "earnestness and culture." They think that already there are too many Unitarian ministers in the market, and that young men of ability, instead of being incited to join the too crowded ranks, should be strongly advised against taking such a step.

When the various speakers were expatiating on the "necessity of having young men of earnestness and ability," &c., I can well imagine that many of the kind-hearted friends of the Board who were listeners would feel stung to the quick when they recalled the fact that there are at present no fewer than four late students of the Board—two of them Gaskell and Owens scholars, and all of them respectable and earnest men, well-read and possessed of good gifts of preaching—who are still without pulpits.

I do not hesitate to say there is no deficiency in the supply of able and earnest Unitarian ministers. If there were there would be less frequent changes in the pulpits, and our congregations would show a higher appreciation of the men they have, and would behave to them in regard to salaries and other matters with more consideration than they at present do.

If these facts are known to the men who make such speeches as were spoken on Tuesday, speeches which I believe are calculated to lead astray many young men who imagine they have a "vocation" to enter the Unitarian ministry, and are also not unlikely to be misunderstood by the general Unitarian public, all I can say is that there is no condemnation too severe for them. If they are ignorant of the real facts of the case, their responsibility may be less grave, but the harm their speeches may do is not a whit the less serious.

Before closing this already too long letter, will you permit me to say it would have been a graceful act if at the meetings on Tuesday when so much jubilation appears to have been indulged in, had a word of Christian and brotherly sympathy been said on behalf of those students of the Home Missionary Board who, having devoted some three, some four years of the best part of their lives to preparation for the work of the Unitarian ministry, and who, having left that institution without a stain on their character, find themselves still without a sphere of active duty?

VERAX.

Jan. 23, 1882.

THE NAMES "UNITARIAN" AND "SOCINIAN."

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—The portion of Dr. Vance Smith's able sermon bearing on these terms, and given in your issue of the 14th inst., is avowedly printed from a reporter's notes, and may therefore be in some points inaccurately rendered. If I venture, then, to call some of the statements in question, let it be understood that I do so with high respect for Dr. Vance Smith's learning and opinion; and, moreover, with the presumption that any inaccuracies are to be traced to the circumstance that the reporter was working in a subject not likely to be familiar to him.

The name Unitarian is here regarded as having a political, not a theological, origin and first meaning. Now, it is true that Peter Bod, the Calvinistic historian in the last century, did suggest that Unitarii was a variation of Uniti; and a note on page xliii. of Rees's Historical Introduction to the "Racovian Catechism" amplifies the theory, in the sense here adopted. But I have never found Bod's suggestion endorsed by any one who had carefully studied the history of the times in question. Who were those called Uniti, and what was their union? Here it is well to put more clearly what is said about the Transylvanian Diet of 1557. The Diet of Torda (scarcely "a provincial Parliament," for Transylvania was then an independent Principedom), passed a law (not a mere "resolution") on 1st June, 1557, giving equal liberty to the adherents of the Old and the New worship, on condition of their not attacking each other. The Old worship was the Catholic, the New was the Lutheran faith, as is strictly defined by the law of the Diet of 1558. Calvinism was not included till 1563; nor was there such a religious liberty as would benefit those whom we call Unitarians till 1566. Soon after came the epoch-making law of 1568, I suppose the first proclamation in any country of general religious freedom—a measure which does immortal honour to the too brief reign of John Sigismund. But all this has nothing to do with the Uniti. In 1558, at the Synod of Kolosvár, the Magyar and Saxon (Protestant) Churches came to a Consensus, respecting the doctrine of the Lord's Supper. They did not touch the doctrine of the Trinity; they published their Consensus "ipsa die sanctae individuae et semper beatae Trinitatis." The Uniti (also called Conjuncti) were those who adhered to this Consensus; thus their union was strictly theological; it was the ratification of a common creed. The suggestion that they were also called Unitarii is entirely void of historical foundation. As a political term, Unitarii belongs, I believe, exclusively to modern Italy. The ground of Peter Bod's mistake about the Uniti is not far to seek. He was accustomed to the word in the politics of Transylvania. The population of that country consists of numerous distinct races, which were classed under the old political system as Nationes Unitae (Magyars, Szeklers, and Saxons), and Nationes Toleratae (including eleven other races). The Unio of the three first-named began in 1545, when they first conceded to each other full and equal rights of citizenship. Bod, finding the word Uniti in an ecclesiastical connection, interpreted it in the sense suggested by its political use. There was a tempting analogy between the Religiones Receptae and Toleratae and the Nationes Unitae (also called Receptae) and Toleratae. Bod is the more excusable, inasmuch as the course of the religious history of Transylvania remained extremely perplexed and obscure, until the appearance, in 1863, of Alexis Jakab's very thorough and excellent Life of King John Sigismund.

As to the real date of the name Unitarius I do not think we have certain knowledge; but we know enough to assure us that its origin was theological, not political. The correlative term Trinitarius was freely applied by Anti-Trinitarians to their opponents, from the date of Serveto's great work, 1553 (in earlier works he used only the form Tritoita, a word of his own coining). But neither Serveto, nor Sozzini, nor any other disputant on either side (out of Hungary) has yet been shown to have employed the term Unitarius before 1637. I say "out of Hungary," because a first-rate authority, Alexis Jakab, holds that the name Unitarius was given to, and taken by, the followers of Francis David, in Hungary, between the years 1569 and 1571. I confess that the evidence for this has not yet satisfied me; but in any case this would give Hungary, not Transylvania, as the original locus of the name. In Transylvania the name was adopted in 1637, as the official records show. I have elsewhere given some reasons for thinking that its adoption was a sign of reaction against Polish influence. The Polish Churches of our faith, as is well known, never adopted the term Unitarian, always strongly resisting it; and remaining, after their exile, a separate Church in Transylvania as long as they could, on this very ground, among others. Nevertheless, it was owing to the popular application of the name to the Polish exiles in Amsterdam that it came over to England in the latter part of the seventeenth century. To us it has long been endeared and consecrated by the faith and sacrifices of noble forefathers.

For the prime source of the term Unitarian I am led, however reluctantly, to direct my search beyond the confines of Christendom altogether. The term Trinitarii, though first employed by Serveto in its present sense, was not invented by him. From the twelfth century it had been in use as the designation of a religious order (very popular in Spain) established for the redemption of Christian captives from the Muhammadans. Perhaps it may be allowed me to hazard the conjecture, long since formed, that Unitarians may have been suggested by the distinctive theological dogma of Islam, just as Trinitarius evidently was by the distinctive theological dogma of Catholic Christendom. Gibbon, in his History, and Wesley, in his much misread reference to "the Unitarian fiend," employ the word Unitarian as synonymous with Muhammadan. Dr. Pusey, in his book on Eternal Punishment, translates by "Unitarian" the Arabic Muhalid, i.e., "making [God] one," a synonyme for Moslem. (I owe the knowledge of the original Arabic term to the kindness of Mr. Russell Martineau.) Though I do not at all agree with those who trace a Muhammadan influence in the rise of the Unitarian doctrine at the Reformation (an opinion which F. Sozzini controverts) yet I do think it may not be amiss to seek in that quarter for the first appearance of the name. However this may be, it seems that, for some reason, early Anti-Trinitarians resented the name Unitarian as keenly as Calvin resented that of Trinitarian (he included Serveto's use of it among the capital charges, as is proved by the terms of the sentence to the stake); or as some of us have resented the name Socinian. I say "some of us," for, though I find it here stated that to apply the term Socinian to "such a man as Priestley" is "erroneous and unjust in the highest degree," yet it is notorious that Priestley over and over again chooses this very name to describe himself and his school, and he should know best.

In respect to the Sozzini I find here some slight errors. Thus it is said that both uncle and nephew "received the best education which the times could afford." Unfortunately for them both, this is far in excess of the facts. Lelio, whose sweetness and frankness won all hearts, had a mind untempered by a sound early training. He arrived subsequently at considerable variety of attainment, in a genteel, aristocratic way; but he would have done more, if he had in youth been subjected to a better and broader discipline than was entailed by a perfunctory acquaintance with the elements of a profession which he never followed. Fausto, who likewise hated the law, owed to its initial requirements all his regular education, the meagreness of which he very sincerely acknowledges. He never professed to be a man of very deep or wide learning, and his mind had little curiosity beyond a certain class of special subjects, on which he exercised, with singular independence, his remarkable powers of thought. Nor again is it probable that either Lelio or Fausto "had to flee their country as heretics," though other members of the family did get into trouble in Italy on that score. The extract from Penn speaks quite correctly when it says that Fausto "voluntarily did abandon the Glories, Pleasures, and Honours of the great Duke of Tuscany's Court." Calvin's letter to Lelio (written a year and a half before the apprehension of Serveto) has often been quoted, but it should be read in full, and judged in connection with the whole of the correspondence. It is not an unkind letter; considering the temperament of Calvin, he treated Lelio throughout with especial tenderness, and they never came to a rupture. The "itch of inquiry," which Calvin rebuked, was in reference to the abstruse doctrine of predestination; and it may be added that Lelio's speculations, though they hovered around the doctrine of the Trinity, never ripened into Anti-Trinitarianism, unless in the last three years of his life, during which, however, we know nothing of his mind.

It is here remarked that "the Orthodox or Evangelical Christian" is truly a Socinian, because he "pays religious worship to Christ." Surely this retort misses a very important distinction. The so-called Orthodox Protestant worships Christ not as Man, but as being himself God Most High. F. Sozzini views Christ as the Human Agent, delegated for the reception of our petitions. This may fairly be regarded as an unsatisfactory theology; but it is quite as misleading to term it "orthodox," as it is unjust to term it "idolatrous." Yet in another sense, and that one far more distinctive of the real work of Fausto, a very large and increasing class of modern theologians, in nearly every Church, may be reckoned among the conquests of the Socinian school. F. Sozzini's great and permanent achievement in theology was not his Anti-Trinitarianism (here his work was neither very new nor very strong), but his doctrine of the Atonement. This constitutes his lasting claim to mark an era in Christian theology; here he has won his signal doctrinal triumph, alike over Trinitarians and Anti-Trinitarians. And further, in a question preliminary to the formation of a Christian theology, that of the credibility and authority of Scripture, F. Sozzini laid down the lines on which all subsequent writers on Christian evidence (except the mere dogmatists) have been compelled to work. He, first of the Reformers, dismissed from the field the a priori assumption that Scripture is inspired, and therefore must be true; and accepted the fundamental question in its new form: Are the Scriptures true; that is to say, are they honestly written by men whom we can fairly trust? And he first took the pains to show what points must be proved, in order that this question may be answered in the affirmative. Heretic as he was, the genius and power of his compact treatise on this subject have been remarkably recognised, in its publication successively by a Jesuit priest, by a Calvinistic presbytery, and by an Anglican clergyman with the approbation of a highly "orthodox" Bishop. Remembering these facts, I cordially endorse the observation that it may well be "esteemed an honour, rather than a reproach" to a school of theology, that it has worthily borne the illustrious name of Sozzini. For my own part, while on several points which I deem important (needless to be specified here), I follow the school of Serveto, rather than that of Sozzini, yet, in regard to the Atonement, I never hesitate to pronounce myself a Socinian; and am prompt to own my debt to that clear thinker, whose labour of love, amid the cares of diplomacy, has pointed the way of right approach to the intricacies of the Scripture problem.

THE IRISH QUESTION.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—To one really acquainted with the state of Ireland—to one especially who has practically felt the pinch of Irish Landlordism, and witnessed and sympathised with the sufferings of its victims, it is very evident that your correspondent "W.W." can throw but little light on the question which he presumes to treat. A native of England, though for thirty years a resident in this country, during which time he has moved in a select, but somewhat confined circle, his knowledge is evidently confined to Cork politics, which, owing perhaps to the warm Southern blood of the inhabitants, is somewhat apt to run into extravagance.

When he last addressed you on this question—some twelve months ago, or more—he attributed the agitation then progressing on the Land question to the selfish feelings of the Irish Priesthood—a body of men second to none in Christendom in the faithful discharge of their onerous, sacred duties, and in their self-sacrificing exertions for their people's welfare. Since then, the enactment of the new Irish Land Act by the Government, and the revelations of oppression suffered by Irish tenants, made by its administrators, have convinced him, let us hope, that there were other evils at work than priestly selfishness.

Of course, "W.W." "living in Ireland" and being unworried "by party prejudice"—whether by native prejudice he does not tell us—"acknowledges the necessity of coercive measures;" and that acknowledgment I fully make, though we may differ as to their application, for Mr. Chamberlain himself admits that such measures were urgently required to restrain the oppression of the landlords—a restraint which by the Land Act the Government imposed. I know not whether "W.W." has any sympathy with such restraint, but certainly for such oppression we find no word of disapproval. It is for the crimes of its ignorant victims, stung to revenge by being flung out of their homes with their families on the roadside that his disapprobation is confined.

These crimes he attributes to the influence of the Land League. I ask him was the Land League the cause of this landlord oppression? Its object was to restrain the crime and combat the oppression by constitutional means. "W.W." seemingly forgets, or, perhaps, is ignorant, that its founder denounced such crimes the moment he set foot in Ireland. Whilst its chief manager, and previously to his arrest, he issued a circular to all its branches to the same effect. From his prison in Portland, only the other day, in conversation with his visitor, Mrs. A. M. Sullivan, he is equally emphatic in its denunciation. Till the Land League was broken up, and its leaders imprisoned, their policy was to preserve the peace. And when no longer allowed, the consequences became very evident in the doings of Captain Moonlight, as they had foretold.

But "W.W." thinks with the Tory landlords that "the Government erred on the side of liberty, which had grown into license." Pray did he learn, mark, and carefully note when that growth took place? Was it not chiefly subsequent to the imprisonment of the nation's leaders? Was it not contemporaneous with Government aid given to landlords to carry out their evicting work? Before this did not Irish representatives North and South of Ulster as of Munster ask of Government to withhold "Coercion," and apply their "remedy?" And does not "everyone living in Ireland and unworried by prejudice," save it may be "W.W.," perceive clearly that the greatest foe to Irish peace and the success of their Land Acts has been the Government's Coercive Policy? In nations as in individuals, "W.W.'s profession as a Gospel minister might tell him that kindness begetteth kindness, and not less oppression, hatred. Let him meditate on this lesson ere again he begins to enlighten his countrymen on the state of Ireland.

THE "UNITARIAN ALMANAC" FOR 1882.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—In the list of Places of Worship in the Unitarian Almanac for 1882 there is one set down for Macclesfield, not contained in any previous list, and given as situated in Paradise-street. As this is calculated to convey the false impression that a third congregation has been formed in that town during the first year the following facts ought to be known:—

1. That this is not a Unitarian chapel in any recognised sense of the term, but a Spiritualists' Meeting-room, the name given on the sign-board outside being "Spiritualists' Free Church."

2. That the Society that meets there has been in existence for a considerable number of years, and has had its pulpit or platform supplied all along by the usual array of Spiritualist "Inspirational Orators" and "Trance Speakers."

3. That the place has never been known as anything but the "Spiritualists' Room."

4. That this Society is not now, and never has been, in even the most distant connection with either of the Unitarian congregations in the town. It may be added that the appearance of the place in the list of "Our Chapels" has been a great surprise to the Unitarians of Macclesfield. It may also be suggested whether it would not be in the interest of clearness and candour to include the word "Spiritualist" in the heading of the Unitarian Almanac list of places of worship, if it is open to Spiritualists' Societies, many of which may (now that a door has been opened) send in their addresses for next year's Almanac.

CONSISTENCY.

MANSFIELD.—A census of religious attendance was taken on Sunday, the 15th inst. At the Unitarian Chapel, 106 persons attended in the morning, and 130 in the evening. Of all churches the total morning attendance was 2,344, and the evening 2,703, while the sitting accommodation is 6,010. The total population, according to the last census, was 13,651. The unpropitious weather, no doubt, affected the attendances.

ABERDEEN.—Anniversary services were conducted in the Unitarian Church, George-street, Aberdeen, on Sunday, by the Rev. Frank W. Walters, of St. Vincent-street Unitarian Church, Glasgow. In the forenoon Mr. Walters preached an able sermon on "The Demands of the Age on Religion." In the evening Mr. Walters lectured on "Hamlet." The church, at both services, was well filled, and a special collection was taken in aid of the funds of the church.

WOOTTON, NEAR LIVERPOOL.—On Tuesday evening a lecture was delivered in the Wootton Mechanics Institution by the Rev. S. Fletcher Williams, of Everton, on "John Milton." The Rev. George Beaumont presided, and the lecturer, who has addressed the members of the Institution four winters in succession, was accorded a hearty reception.

SHEFFIELD: OPENING OF "CHANNING" MEMORIAL HALL.

The formal opening of this beautiful building, which has recently been erected by the congregation of the Upper Chapel, Norfolk-street, took place on Thursday evening, January 12, when upwards of four hundred persons partook of tea. The building, which has been erected in New Surrey-street, presents a very massive and elegant appearance, and has been provided at a cost of over £7,000, including the site. It has a frontage of sixty feet, and consists of a Congregational Hall, which will also be used as a Sunday-school. The style of architecture is Italian renaissance, and of a more ornate character than the old chapel. The edifice is two stories in height, with six pilasters on each story, the lower being of an Ionic and the upper an Italian treatment of the Corinthian order, surmounted with a bold cornice and balustrade. The space between the pilasters on the lower story is filled with five arches—the entrance being in the centre arch—and those on the upper story are filled with windows, three of which are arched, and subdivided with arches. The entrance passage is seven feet wide, the walls of which are built of glazed bricks, with surbase of greens and browns, pilasters of Indian red, and cream coloured panels, with borders of white and French grey. The Congregational Hall is approached by a winding staircase, at the top of which is an octagonal stair hall, sixteen feet in diameter, and which is built with brick walls similar to those used in the construction of the entrance passage. The stair hall forms the central feature of the plan, and from it there are separate doors for access to the chapel, the old schools, the chapel-keeper's house, the committee room, and the Congregational Hall. The hall is fifty-seven feet long by thirty-five feet wide, nineteen feet high at the walls and twenty-four feet high at the centre of the ceiling. The walls are of glazed bricks, with surbase of browns and greens, pilasters of Indian red and cream-coloured panels, and with white and French grey. The caps and bases of the pilasters are of cement, and of the Italian Corinthian design. Around the room, at right angles with the beautiful caps surmounting the pilasters, are the following words, painted in light blue upon enamelled cement:—"Erected by the congregation of the Upper Chapel, in the year MDCCCLXXXI, for religious, educational, and social purposes, and for the same religious aims with which the chapel was founded in the year MDCC, and on the same free basis of a free and open trust." The roof is partly open timbered, the ceiling being of panelled Memel wood, the panels coloured a light blue and relieved with stencilled patterns in white. The colours are arranged with great taste, and during the meeting which took place after tea the hall presented a very chaste appearance. The floor is of wood four-and-a-half inches thick, laid on concrete, with the joints filled with white lead, and has a slight fall to the sides; the object of this arrangement is to enable the floor to be washed with a hose pipe, which will be a great advantage. The hall will be seated with chairs, and will provide accommodation for about four hundred persons. The greatest credit is due to the architects, Messrs. Flockton and Gibbs, for the taste and ability they have displayed in the erection of the building.

After tea a public meeting was held, when the hall was crowded. The chair was taken by the Mayor (M. Hunter, Esq.), and there were also present T. Jessop, Esq., J.P., the Revs. E. Fay, C. H. Osler, W. Blazehy, B.A., Messrs. J. Hobson, J. Ryalls, H. Bramley, H. Fisher, C. Woollen, E. M. Gibbs, J. B. Wostenholm, J. G. Lowood, F. G. Dalton, W. Murfin, jun., J. Barnes, W. Guest, N. H. Hunt, J. Laycock, H. Thomson, R. T. Eadon, J. J. Gratton, J. H. Hunter, M. Dodworth, J. S. Beckett, A. Beckett, Alfred Beckett, W. Stevenson, A. Van Wart, W. W. Renton, and H. Rylett.

The CHAIRMAN, who upon rising was received with applause, said they had met to formally open that hall, and those who were present would notice on looking round the room an inscription that it was intended for the same religious aims as that for which the old chapel was built. Upper Chapel was erected in times very different from the present. Then it was hardly safe for a man to say that he believed in a creed different from that which was extant in the country, but now all men could meet together on equal terms, and give free expression to their opinions, without being interfered with by anyone. He was descended from an old Presbyterian family, but he wished to express his pleasure that he ever ventured into the old chapel in Norfolk-street. He was also desirous of adding his meed of praise of that noble hall in which they were met, and which he hoped would serve for many years—(applause).

The Rev. ELI FAY said that in the history of the Upper Chapel the opening of that hall would be a memorable occasion. That night they took a new departure. Their eyes were no longer exclusively on the past, even with all its venerable and thoroughly creditable traditions, nor were they entirely satisfied with the present, though it was a splendid nucleus around which to gather new elements, and in which to generate numerous and vital forces. Their church ought to be a magazine of vital forces, a mountain of light to the whole community around them, an asylum for those who might be tossed hither and thither by modern speculation, and the resort of those who preferred religion in its simplicity. In order to meet the necessity of providing increased facilities for carrying on the work, the trustees some years ago commenced to consider their need of a hall for the promotion of the social life of the congregation, and also to enable the Sunday-school to realise more fully its own ideals. The consummation of their plan was somewhat retarded by the fact that the town was engaged upon a very extensive scheme of street improvements. But that night they had met to open a hall which in its size, beauty, and general adaptability for the purposes for which it was intended greatly surpassed the original expectation of the congregation. They did not expect from the trustees of the Upper Chapel anything poor and cheap, but he for one did not expect that they would have given them what had been declared to be the finest small auditorium in Yorkshire, and probably the finest in the North of England. He then spoke highly of the ability of the architect, Mr. Gibbs, who had designed such an excellent building. The architect had ample reason for being satisfied with his work. But why, he asked, should it be called "Channing Hall?" William Ellery Channing was born at Newport, in the United States of America, on the 7th September, 1780, and in his department of thought he was unquestionably the ablest man the world had produced in the last two centuries. He inaugurated the greatest theological revolution of the world. His words were inspiring and uplifting human souls in every nation under heaven. Both civil and religious liberty found in him their greatest champion. He was the father of American Unitarianism, and so profoundly was he respected in Boston, the field of his labours, that at his death the whole metropolis went into mourning, and every church bell in the town was tolled. Because of their respect for that wonderful man, that minister of their faith, that servant of God, that apostle of their race, that great brother of mankind, they had christened that beautiful room "Channing Hall"—(applause).

Mr. T. JESSOP, J.P., endorsed the remarks made by the previous speaker with reference to the hall. In his opinion there never was a more creditable piece of work done in Sheffield or the neighbourhood—(applause). The room was intended for the benefit of the congregation worshipping there, and he understood that it was not intended to let it for any purposes except those connected with Unitarianism. He saw many strangers present, and he trusted that that meeting would be the means of inducing persons who were not at present connected with them to visit the hall, and judge of the doctrines preached for themselves. The Unitarians did not go about like the Salvation Army, but they left people to judge for themselves and to act in accordance with their own conscience.

Mr. J. HOBSON moved the following resolution:—"That this meeting desires to congratulate the minister and congregation of the Upper Chapel on the erection and opening of the 'Channing Hall,' and trusts that it may long endure as a religious, educational, and social help to all connected with the chapel."

Mr. H. BRAMLEY trusted that the hall would never be used for any other purpose than that which would be consistent with the pure aims for which it had been founded. They had to look back to a long line of predecessors who had had an interest in the Upper Chapel, and though they had not always been of the same faith, they had always been the pioneers of freedom. He trusted that this congregation would always prove to this town—being assisted by the congregation of Upperthorpe—that they would continue to be the pioneers of freedom, and would go where freedom—religiously and judiciously carried out—would lead them. He hoped that those who succeeded the men who had inaugurated the work in which they were now engaged would carry it on in the same spirit that had been hitherto manifested in connection with the place in which they had met. He concluded by seconding the resolution, which was put, and carried unanimously—(applause).

The Rev. C. H. OSLER congratulated the congregation of Upper Chapel upon obtaining such a splendid building, well adapted for speaking and singing.

Mr. HALLIDAY and Mr. WOOLLEN also addressed the meeting.

During the evening selections of music were given.

MANCHESTER NEW COLLEGE.

ANNUAL REPORT.

The following is an abstract of the annual report presented by the Committee at the meeting of Trustees held on the 19th Jan. :—

The report begins by once again conveying to the Professors the expression of gratitude for the inestimable services which they render to the College.

Reference is next made to the deaths of two Vice-Presidents, who had in past years honourably filled the Presidential chair, Mr. Thomas Ainsworth, of Cleator, a Trustee since 1841, and President from 1860 to 1863, and Mr. Samuel Sharpe, of London, a Trustee since 1836, and President from 1876 to 1878. "Mr. Ainsworth showed his deep interest in the attainment of high scholarship by the students of the College in the presentation of his Scholarship of £100 to such of them as obtained a gold medal at the M.A. Examination of the University of London, and the Committee are assured that none regretted more than the generous donor that the Scholarship was so rarely obtained. Mr. Samuel Sharpe's services to the College were only an expression of his own sympathy with theological studies. Never has the chair of the College been filled by a gentleman more fitted by his own scholarly attainments for its occupation." The report then quoted a passage from Dr. Martineau's recent Address at the opening of the current session, and subsequently published, paying an appropriate tribute to both these gentlemen.

The accounts for the year 1880-1 show a balance of expenditure over receipts of £46 4s. 10d. as compared with an adverse balance for the preceding year of £189 9s. 5d. Benefactions for the year include £80 from an old student. The annual subscriptions are a few pounds less.

The report next referred to the annual examination in June last, of which full particulars have already appeared in these columns. University and Collegiate honours obtained by the students were then noted, and the election of Hibbert and External scholars.

The Session 1881-2 opened with fourteen students, and two others from the Home Missionary Board free to lectures and two external undergraduate students. Eight of the fourteen are graduates of St. Andrew's, Glasgow; Trinity College, Dublin, and London and Cambridge Universities. Four are undergraduates of London University.

A detailed report of the Local Theological Examinations held last May is given in the Appendix. The results are characterised as "most meagre and unsatisfactory" as compared with those of former years; and the Committee recommend a discontinuance of the experiment unless a very marked improvement is apparent at the examination in May next.

In the course of the year a valuable addition has been made to the library by the purchase of Wilkin's "Concilia Ecclesie Britannica."

The presentation was next recorded by Mr. Thomas Ashton of one scholarship of £50 a year for three years tenable by a student, elected after examination by the professors, who shall prosecute his studies with a view to graduation at Victoria University.

The report then gave a detailed account of the recent negotiations between the authorities respectively of Manchester New College and University, the results of which as adopted at the annual meeting of trustees were given in the Inquirer of last week.

In conclusion, the Committee congratulate the trustees upon the present position of the College. In recent years some dissatisfaction has been expressed at the small results accruing from its labours. But at present no less than eighteen students are in regular receipt of its benefits, and rarely has it been engaged in a more hopeful work. A gratifying feature in the College experience of the last two years has been the successful operation of the External Scholarships in bringing into the ranks of its students four gentlemen equipped for its theological studies by graduation in the universities of Cambridge, London, and St. Andrew's. Further matter for congratulation is found in the association once more of the two institutions for the education of the ministry of an unfettered Christianity in a common work. Two students have already passed from the Missionary Board in Manchester to the College, and thus received the highest culture the College can give them, with admirable results. This year two more have followed in their steps, and owing to the scholarship of Mr. Tate, founded for this very purpose, the series it is hoped will be continued without break.

"With high hope the Committee wish the College God-speed on its future career; never was there greater need of a ministry educated and free, and never could a College from whose classrooms such a ministry proceeds fill a nobler place in the Christian life of this country. It is an age of profound religious disturbance. It is an age in which deep questions are asked, and no answers accepted which do not come from the depths of human consciousness and from the movements of unshackled human thought. The reverent freedom and fearless allegiance to truth which characterises the teaching of the College contributes the very spirit which can alone secure a hearing in this age. While the College sends out into the world a ministry imbued with a personal faith based on conscience and reason, and with minds full of the light of knowledge, its supporters may be satisfied that they are doing no mean service towards promoting the best religious life, and the Free Church of God amongst men."

"WHO ARE THE INFIDELS?"

LECTURE BY THE REV. W. SHARMAN, OF PLYMOUTH.

The local authorities having lately refused to permit Mr. Bradlaugh, M.P., to have the use of the Guildhall for a political lecture, the Rev. William Sharman, minister of the Unitarian Chapel, thereupon claimed the use of the Hall for a religious service last Sunday evening, and announced his intention of giving an address on the question "Who are the infidels?" The "Free Trade Hymn" having been sung, Mr. Sharman delivered an impassioned address, denouncing the persecutors of so-called atheists as the real infidels, and declaring that the records of the bench of bishops were those of infidelity to humanity. There was an audience of at least 3,000 persons. The following is an outline of the address given in a local paper:—

The rev. gentleman said he took by way of text the parable of the Good Samaritan, because that parable powerfully set forth the chief characteristic of the teaching of Christ. The characteristic principle of that teaching was that neither belief nor ritual availed to commend any man to God; but that the duty they owed to their neighbour was the only service that was well pleasing in his sight. Remembrance of that principle had been the cause of all good works everywhere, in all ages of the Church's history; forgetfulness of it had been the cause of supineness, of intolerance, of persecution, and of theological wickedness. Having read an abstract from Froude, the historian, bearing on this point, Mr. Sharman went on to say that the spirit therein referred to made Smithfield black with martyr ashes and reddened with the blood of the covenanters the moors and glens of Scotland. To-day that spirit could no longer kill or burn. The evil thing existed only in dotage and decay. But what it could do it still did. It could obstruct progress, and it did so. It could maintain a privilege, and it did so. It could deny a right, and it did so. It could steal away a trust, and it did so. It could hiss a curse; it did so. It could musker a malediction; it did so. It could defame, it could stammer, it could tell lies, and it did so. And in its passion and its hate it could scream "Infidel." Just let them consider that word. It was a word that was a memoir of a bad and cruel time; it was black with falsehood; it was red with murder. It was the war cry of the Crusades from the time of Christ. It was the accusation of the Inquisition. Some day in that far future that was surely coming; some day in the better time to be, men would grow too wise and too good to use that word. And then they would take it and put it away in a museum. They would put it into a chamber of horrors. In that chamber would be found the form of no wild beast; there would be found no serpent's coil; for the men who filled that chamber with the things that belonged to it would say that the thing was too bad, too foul, too cruel to be associated even with the tiger's tooth or with the wolf's fang, to be associated with the venom of the viper or the poison of the asp. Into that room they would carry the fetters that had fallen from the hands of the slave; they would carry there the slave driver's whip. They would put on the walls of that chamber of horrors the cross, the scaffold, and the stake; they would put there the thumbscrew that made the sweat of agony stand on the foreheads of the tortured men; they would put there the boot that crushed the foot that was in it into shapeless pulp; they would put there the rack that dislocated every joint, and made the man who lay in it a foot longer than God made him. And with those things they would put the word that called them into existence—the word "infidel;" by the side of that word they would put the last speech ever delivered in favour of the repression of the expression of honest opinion, and on the other side they would put the last sermon ever preached on behalf of the doctrine of endless hell. To-day that word "infidel" had lost much of its power, but it was a wicked and a foul word still. He never used it save in the way of quotation, and he allowed no man to apply it to him without protest, because that word, when one man used it to another, was an assumption of superiority, a covert slander, and a veiled threat. It was, too, a dangerous word. There was, he believed, used among the savages of Australia an instrument called a boomerang, and a boomerang had the peculiar property that when thrown, if it did not hit the mark it came back again into the thrower's hand. And this word "infidel" was a boomerang, for it was apt to recoil on those who used it. He (the speaker) was an infidel. Why? Because he did not believe in the doctrine of the Trinity. That was a doctrine that in the old version of the New Testament had only one solitary verse to support it, but in the new version that verse disappeared, acknowledged by the scholarship of eminent Christian men to be a corruption, like the doctrine it was forged to support.

Then let them take the Athanasian Creed. That Creed read like a burlesque written by an insane monk. No man could understand it, and to try to force it on another, under the penalty of eternal hell, was infidelity to human reason. Then, again, there was the doctrine of the Atonement. He was an infidel because he did not believe in that. He believed in the doctrine of the Atonement as Christ preached it, the doctrine of the free forgiveness of the Father's infinite love. But what was the doctrine of the Atonement as the Church preached it? It was this, that people might be saved if they would be cowards enough and wicked enough to consent that the punishment of their offences should be laid upon an innocent head. To preach that doctrine he declared to be infidelity to the Divine justice. Take another doctrine that he did not believe in—the doctrine of endless hell. He asserted that that was a doctrine worthy not of Christian men, but one that would dishonour wild beasts in the deserts of Africa, and that to believe that doctrine was to do violence to Christ's teaching, and was infidelity towards God's infinite mercy. All these doctrines, like the word "infidel," were dying, and the time would come when they would go into the chamber of horrors with it. Sometimes a compromise was offered to him. Some of his orthodox friends said, "We will draw the line at you. We will draw it so that you shall stand inside and your friends, who believe less than you, they shall be outside; they shall be infidels." But that offer did not flatter him. There was no compliment in trying to treat him as a minimum. He would not have it. Where he went everybody went, or else he would try to make a way for them to come in to him if he were inside, or to go with him if he were outside. And here he would pause to protest against the practice of trying to attach to any man who defended another the responsibility for all that person said or did. That was an unfair thing and an injurious thing; and it was a responsibility that he could not take, for this simple reason, that he defended all sorts of men. He was for the right of the Catholic. He was on the side of the persecuted Jew. He was on the side of the Atheist debarred of his right. And, therefore, as he could not entertain contradictory opinions he could not take the responsibility. But he believed this, that the worst men had their rights and that there was nothing more perilous to liberty than to allow any right to be assailed unjustly. And he would tell them this, that if the poorest man, the most unpopular man, the wickedest man in Plymouth came to him to-morrow and said, "I have suffered a wrong and I want your help," it would not be his place to judge that man, but if he found him a wronged man it would be his place to stand on his side, and he should think himself a traitor to the Christ who laid his hand on the head of the leper, and who was the companion of sinners, if he were cowardly enough, because of possible misrepresentation, to fail to give that man his help. The rev. gentleman went on to say there was a strong feeling that established Christianity, judged by its fruits, was found wanting. In the past Te Deums had rolled from the cathedrals in praise for bloody victory; and coming to the present day they saw that established Christianity in this land was represented by a band of Bishops in the House of Lords which had always been in favour of every form of persecution, and had denied the right of the Jew, of the Nonconformist, of the Quaker, and of the Atheist. They said also that the Bishops had opposed the national education of the children of England, and that where God said "Let there be light" they had said "Let there be darkness." It was further said that they had been the ceaseless opponents of the rights of children, of miners, and of sailors, and that it was a Bishop who proposed that the labourer's friend, Joseph Arch, should be put into a horse pond. And the loudest cheers that greeted the news of the result of unjust wars in Afghanistan and Zululand had been given by the Bishops of the Established Church. He declared this to be a record of infidelity to humanity. Such a record as that made men infidels; and he would rather take his stand with so-called infidels than with men so wanting in faithfulness to the right.

The lecturer was received with frequent bursts of applause.

SOUTHAMPTON.—The Southampton Times has the following tribute to the excellent minister of the Church of the Saviour:—"The Rev. D. Amos, minister of the Unitarian Church of the Saviour, Bellevue-road, Southampton, announced to his congregation on Sunday evening last that he had accepted an invitation to the pastorate of the church at Scarborough, which would necessitate the resignation of his ministry here. The announcement was received with very great regret; and that feeling will, we are sure, be shared by the public at large. Mr. Amos has laboured with much earnestness, zeal, and ability during his four years' ministry in Southampton. His congregation have had good reason to estimate very highly his ministrations as a preacher and religious teacher; and all know that he has never shrunk from a bold and fearless avowal of his convictions on religious matters. They will, therefore, have much cause to regret his departure. Mr. Amos has attained a high place in the esteem and regard of his fellow-townsmen by his genial sociability, and by the literary and public services which in various ways he has ever been willing to render. As a politician of very decided views, he has worked energetically for the promotion of Liberal principles; and all who have known him most intimately in that relationship will bear cordial testimony to the thoroughness and the sincerity of purpose which have invariably marked his conduct. While for many reasons friends in Southampton will be sorry to part with Mr. Amos, they cannot fail to join in the hope that he may find a more agreeable field of labour at Scarborough, and that his usefulness there may even exceed his usefulness here. Before the rev. gentleman's departure an opportunity will no doubt be afforded for a friendly interchange of good wishes, in which we are sure many of the outside public would gladly unite with the members of his church and congregation."

STOKE-ON-TRENT.—The Stoke-on-Trent Town Council have resolved, by a large majority, to open the Free Library and Museum of that town on Sundays, from half-past two till half-past five in the afternoon. Mr. C. M. Campbell, Mayor, and principal of the large firm of Minton's, which employs about three thousand hands, was the chief promoter of the movement.

BRISTOL.—It may be interesting to many friends to know that the fund subscribed for the benefit of the late esteemed missionaries to the poor here (Mr. and Mrs. Andrews) subserves its purpose, in having ministered efficiently to the necessities of Mrs. Andrews during her long and painful illness until her decease; whilst Mr. Andrews has been provided for by the balance of it, through the purchase of an annuity, and thus a long period of faithful service has been happily rewarded.

ABERDEEN.—On Tuesday, the 24th, the annual congregational soiree was held, at which there was a large attendance. Addresses were delivered by the Rev. Frank W. Walters and George F. Walters, and by Messrs. R. Adams, J. Clark, A. Leslie, &c. On the previous Monday evening the Rev. F. W.

Galten delivered in the schoolroom, under the auspices of the "Unitarian Literary and Debating Society" a lecture on "Socrates."

BIRMINGHAM.—On the 10th inst. a meeting was held in Hurst-street Chapel, Birmingham, to welcome the Rev. J. B. Gardner, the newly-appointed minister, as successor of the Rev. B. Wright. Mr. S. Greenway presided, and there were present the Revs. H. W. Crosskey, Eli Fay, C. H. Osler, B. Wright, H. Eachus, and P. Dean; Councillor Payton; Messrs. E. L. Tyndall, Brooke Smith, W. Lowe, J. F. Lockett, hon. sec., G. Lee, H. New, W. Wade, &c. Mr. Lockett, in the name of the congregation, offered a hearty welcome to Mr. Gardner, with congratulations on having secured so good a man. Mr. Gardner, in reply, dwelt upon the general scope and purpose of his work. Councillor Payton, the Revs. H. W. Crosskey, Eli Fay, C. H. Osler, and P. Dean also addressed the meeting, which terminated by a vote of thanks to the chairman, proposed by Mr. Herbert New.

SOUTHERN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.—At a meeting held at the Church of the Saviour, Southampton, on Wednesday last, Jan. 25, the President, R. Pinnock, Esq., in the chair, the following resolution was cordially and unanimously passed:—"That the Committee of the Southern Unitarian Association tender to the Rev. D. Amos their best thanks for the efficient manner in which he has discharged the duties of the secretaryship for the last four years. They gratefully acknowledge his energetic and devoted endeavours to promote the good work of the Association, and to extend its usefulness; and, while expressing their regret at his departure from amongst them, they would, at the same time, sincerely wish him increased happiness and usefulness in his new sphere of labour at Scarborough, and that this resolution be placed on the minutes of the Association."

BEDFORD COLLEGE.—An inaugural lecture was given at the above College, January 18, at the beginning of the Lent Term, by James Cotter Morison, Esq., to a large audience. There were present, amongst others, the Rector of Lincoln College, Oxford (visitor of Bedford College), William Shaen, Esq., (chairman of the Council), J. G. Fitch, Esq., John Hullah, Esq., &c. The subject of the lecture was "The Higher Education of Women, considered in relation to Women's Rights and Women's Duties." The lecturer began by dwelling emphatically on women's duties in domestic and private life. He then gave an able and comprehensive sketch of the education that would fit women for the position they now hold, as also that to which they seem likely to attain. The scheme would include some branch of science thoroughly taught—say physiography, as in Professor Huxley's handbook. For language the lecturer insisted on a thorough study of Latin and French: Latin as giving access to an extensive literature not confined to the classical period; French the language of society and travel, and some of the choicest literature. He would postpone the reading of history till the student could grasp its real scope, and, for instance, could read with profit the ten volumes of Grote's History of Greece; school text books of history being mere tables of contents. After useful warnings against undue strain of the faculties in the form of cram, and urging active bodily exercise, the lecturer said he would not dogmatise on the relative brain power of men and women; but he remarked that no woman had as yet taken the highest rank in art; on the other hand, women had shown an aptitude for politics. Among other illustrations, historical and contemporary, the most interesting to us is that of our present Queen, who has shown more faculty for governing than any other member of the Hanoverian dynasty. At the conclusion of the lecture, Mr. Shaen, seconded by Mr. Fitch, congratulated the students of Bedford College on the late resolution of the University of London to open convocation to its women graduates.

THE LONDON SCHOOL BOARD held its weekly meeting on Thursday. The Bye-Laws Committee were authorised to go as a deputation to the Education Department and present a memorial having reference to difficulties connected with the carrying out of compulsory education. The terms connected with the admission of pupil teachers to training colleges, a question which had been frequently before the Board, underwent another long discussion. It was resolved to call the attention of the Education Department to the question. The Special Committee appointed to inquire into the charges against the management of St. Paul's Industrial School held a meeting on Thursday, and adjourned sine die.

The Liberal Pulpit.

THE LIFE AFTER DEATH.

BY THE REV. G. C. MILNE, OF CHICAGO.

I want to talk as a "plain, blunt man" about that most absorbing of all questions:—"If a man die, shall he live again?" I shall attempt nothing learned, indulge in no high-down or sophistical arguments, but look facts and theories equally in the face and try to deal with them ingenuously. Let me commence by saying that while the question of a future life has always been of interest, and the prospects of its promised rewards and punishments potent as factors in my religious thinking, it has only been within the years of my maturer manhood that I have at all allowed myself to erect an interrogation point after the word immortality. It will be but honest for me also to say that any disturbance of this inherited conviction that there is "something after death" has been produced in my mind chiefly by the advances in physiological science—advances which tend to establish the inseparability of mind and body.

I am, however, no partner in that emotional shrinking from a future which may be surcharged with remorseful "dreams," nor does the picture of an orthodox heaven tend greatly to exhilarate my spirits. I will not say that I am indifferent, for I am not, but rather that I am prepared to submit all my hopes and desires to whatever revision facts, discovered in the future, may impose upon them. In this particular, at least, I differ from the majority of mankind. Most men—and all women—are so predisposed to believe in the immortality of the soul that any candid and thorough discussion of the subject is out of the question. The instinct of self-preservation, which I must believe is the root in human thought of the doctrine of continued existence after death, is so strong in a normal and unclouded mind that any discussion which even temporarily opens the way for a negative solution of the question, "to be or not to be," is viewed with distrust and apprehension. In his introduction to the Phædo—that dialogue of Plato which contains most fully his views upon the subject of immortality—Jowett says:—"The doctrine of the immortality of the soul has such great interest for all mankind that they are apt to rebel against any examination of the nature of their belief. They do not like to acknowledge that this, as well as the other 'eternal ideas' of man, has a history in time, which may be traced in Greek poetry or philosophy and also in the Hebrew Scriptures. They convert feeling into reasoning, and throw a network of dialects over that which is really a deeply-rooted instinct." This prejudice in favour of another life is at present so strong within the church organisations that any candid discussion of the question on its merits need not be looked for in the direction of the pulpit; and if the current literature of the day deals with it at all, it is in manner so entirely one-sided as to flatter rather than enlighten the public mind upon this important subject. The writer believes himself to be free from this prejudice. He approaches the subject unbiased—open to conviction. He is willing to be convinced of a heavenly rest and reward corresponding to or even exceeding in glory the golden vision of St. John; or, on the other hand, he is quite ready—if facts so guide him—to indorse those conclusions which will justify him in adopting as his own the epitaph on Professor Clifford's tomb:—

I was not, I began to be;
I lived a little while,
And did some work;
I am not, and I grieve not.

When I was a child the doctrine of the dual nature of man was thoroughly impressed upon my mind in a variety of ways. First, the common language of every-day life, in which a distinction is set up between "soul and body," influenced my thought. The soul and body became to me, in an indistinct way, separate entities. The body might die, but the soul never! Then, too, the idea was thoroughly introduced to my mental stock in trade that the future life would be either perpetually happy or as unceasingly miserable for me, according to the correctness or obliquity of my conduct. One practical result of this teaching, by the way, was that I never surreptitiously stuck my finger into a pot of jam but I at once experienced a vision of forked flames and grinning devils; while a beatific galaxy of gossamer-winged cherubs revealed to me my own transcendent prospects whenever my memorisation of the catechism (a most immoral composition—still used by some, I believe) had been particularly good. I find now that these views of the soul and its destiny are older, by far, than the Christian religion, and that the latter simply adopted them into its circles of doctrines as most potent motives to purity of life and enthusiasm of endeavour. Indeed, very little advance has been made by those who affirm the immateriality of the soul since the time of Plato, who was born over four hundred years earlier than the great teacher of Nazareth. And even before Plato, Heraclitus of Ephesus had taught as a natural outcome of his doctrine of contraries "that while we live our souls are dead and buried in us; but when we die our souls are restored to life." A statement which has in it the germ of the subsequent doctrine which has belittled man's earthly life that it might aggrandise the sublime joys which await him in

"That undiscovered country from whose bourn
No traveller returns."

Plato's theory of the soul seems to me very interesting, as discovering the metaphysical ingenuity of that great thinker. He divides the soul by three (this analogy, by the way, I have heard used as a natural argument for the doctrine of the Trinity), and to each of these sub-divisions of the soul he assigns distinct functions and gives a particular title. First he places the intellect or instrument of rational cognition. Second, he places the element of courage "the courageous soul," and third, the "appetitive" soul. These last two are mortal, and perish with the animal life. The first is immortal, on account of its sameness in nature with the "soul of the world." But notwithstanding the ingenuity of this distinction, by virtue of which an immortality is assigned to that quality which man is supposed to possess in contradistinction with plants and animals, it is only an assumption, is insusceptible of demonstration, and therefore proves nothing. Nor are the arguments which Plato used, in company with this theory of the soul, to prove the immortality of man, more conclusive. First, his theory of reminiscences—that is, that the recognition of ideas supposed to be then entertained for the first time by the mind, in this life, is proof of its pre-existence, and therefore of its future existence—is so fanciful as to be unworthy of consideration.

Another of his arguments for the immortality of the soul, though more specious, is scarcely more forcible. Lest I misrepresent let me give the passage entire as it may be found in the Republic:—

"Are you not aware," I said, "that the soul is immortal and imperishable?"

He looked at me in astonishment and said:

"No, indeed; you do not mean to say that you are able to prove that?"

"Yes," I said, "I ought to be able, and you, too, for there is no difficulty."

"I do not see that," he said, "and I should like to have this argument of which you make no difficulty."

"Listen then," I said.

"I am attending," he said.

"You speak of good and evil?"

"Yes," he replied.

"Would you agree that the corrupting and destroying element is the evil, and the saving and improving element the good?"

"Yes," he said.

"And anything which is infected by evil is made evil, and at last wholly dissolves and dies?"

"True."

And from this he proceeds to assume that as evil does not disintegrate the soul—the merest assumption in the world—therefore it must be immortal. But who can say the soul is not wasted by evil?—supposing it, indeed, to be a separate entity. I imagine that my own conclusion—that at the end of a life of debauchery a man has less soul than he had as an unstained boy of twenty—would be generally adopted. But Plato only assumes a soul. He does not prove it. He takes for granted the separability of mind and body—an assumption which modern science has not yet converted into a demonstration, and upon this premise bases certain ethical teachings which are as admirable to-day as they were so long ago. I have spoken thus at length of the Platonic theory of the soul and its immortality because it is substantially this theory which is taught in the churches at the present time. Man is assumed to be of a dual nature. One-half mortal, the other and finer immortal! And if one asks—as I have often asked—for proof of this, he is told usually two things: 1. "It is the Platonic doctrine." 2. "It is taught by Jesus in the New Testament." Well, as I said in the beginning, I am but an ordinary man, and it may be the result of defective education, but I do not see that a baseless assumption of Plato is lifted into the rank of infallible dogma by the indorsement of Jesus. Right here, however, it is but just to say that Jesus only asserts, he never attempts to prove the immortality of man. And even his assertions are ambiguous and vague. To sum up, then, in regard to this doctrine of immortality it includes: 1. The idea of a distinction between soul and body. 2. The idea of a continued existence for the former after the death of the latter. No demonstration is offered in support of these assumptions. But it is assumed that this hypothesis most nearly explains all the phenomena usually classified as mental, and that it affords a safe basis upon which to predicate the immortality of the soul.

I do not suppose that it would have occurred to me to challenge the conclusiveness of the argumentation, or rather assertiveness, by which the doctrine of immortality, which I have described, is supported, if I had not been unfortunate enough (as orthodox believers would say) to fall in with those theories of physical activity which have been recently advanced by such writers as Bain, Maudsley, Clifford, Huxley, and others of the same general school. At first I was indignant. I regarded them as irreverent iconoclasts—bent on destroying popular faith, without offering any substitutes; but presently I examined in my own plain way the ideas which they present, and found that there was in them, at least, food for very serious reflection. Let me explain how their ideas connected with those I had been accustomed to hold.

It will be observed that if the distinction between soul and body is once destroyed, or even rendered less certain than it has been usually esteemed, there must follow either a total destruction or a great weakening of the doctrine of immortality. If thought is the finest expression of a human personality, but something as completely identified, at its roots, with the physical organism, as the sense of taste or of touch, then the death of the body means likewise the death of the soul. I know that Priestley made a vain attempt to build a bridge between a materialistic doctrine of the soul and the doctrine of immortality by resorting to the idea of a physical resurrection and rehabilitation of the entire personality, but this attempt seems to me too absurd to enlist serious thought. Well, I found out upon reading the physiological writers I have mentioned several interesting and perplexing facts.

1. I found that of the absolute nature of physical activity—that is, the origin and process of thought—nothing is known. There have been many skillful guesses—but no certainty. Will some eminent neurologist or metaphysician deny this for me?

2. I found that many facts point to the interdependence and radical identity of mind and matter. Thus Bain in his little book on "The Mind and Body" says:—"Since the intellectual faculties appear to be most removed from the effect of physical agencies, I will quote a few facts showing that in reality they have no exemption from the general rule. The memory rises and falls with the bodily conditions; being vigorous in our fresh moments, and feeble when we are fatigued or exhausted." He then proceeds to show how numerous are the facts that connect the mind with the brain, concluding:—"There is, in company with all mental processes, an unbroken material succession. From the ingress of a sensation to the outgoing responses in action the mental succession is not for an instant severed from a physical succession." Such quotations can be multiplied easily enough, but it is only necessary to say that this is a fair sample of the conclusion reached by these eminent men, who have no theological "axe to grind." And it was of these conclusions that I thought when I spoke of the embarrassment created in my mind upon the subject of immortality by the advances of science. I suppose, indeed I know, that others have been similarly perplexed. Indeed, I have recently seen the statement of a notable writer to the effect that "the progress of physiological science, without bringing us nearer to the great secret, has perhaps tended to remove some erroneous notions respecting the relations of body and mind . . . but no one (?) imagines that any seed of immortality is to be discerned in our physical frames"—a statement which reminds me of the saying of the lamented Agassiz that "science knows nothing of immortality."

Against the impressions created by such reading my friends have often reminded me that it is the office of faith to grasp and certify the soul's immortality. But upon examining the refuge suggested I find it to be as unsatisfactory as it is elusive. Faith is confidence established on the testimony of our faculties. And upon applying my faculties to a test of the arguments usually adduced in support of the soul's immortality they refuse to indorse them as conclusive. How, then, can I have faith?

If it is "the gift of God," why has he left me without it? Why should it be the possession of a pious syndicate and beyond the reach of such people as myself? Here, however, I must quit for the present a theme too extensive to be discussed at a single sitting. But I shall return to it, and throw whatever light can be gained upon the subject from other than the ordinary sources, including modern Spiritualism, an ism of such splendid and positive pretensions that, if it can prove its claims, is worthy to be considered the court of final appeal upon the question of an immortal life.

PERSECUTION OF THE JEWS IN RUSSIA

In accordance with the influentially-signed memorial, the Lord Mayor has convened a public meeting, to be held in the Egyptian Hall of the Mansion House, on Wednesday, the 1st February, at three o'clock.

Requisition. 21st Jan., 1882.

To the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor of the City of London.

My Lord,—We, the undersigned, consider that there should be a public expression of opinion respecting the persecution which the Jews of Russia have recently and for some time past suffered. We therefore ask your lordship to be so good as to call at your earliest convenience a public meeting for that purpose at the Mansion House, and that you will be good enough to take the chair on the occasion.—We are, your lordship's faithful servants,

THE LIBERAL SOCIAL UNION held its monthly meeting on Thursday evening, at the rooms of the Society of British Artists, Suffolk-street, Pall-mall; S. Jeffery McKee, Esq., in the chair. A paper was read by the Rev. E. M. Geldart, M.A., on "The Relativity of Truth." A discussion followed, in which the following took part:—Messrs. Tyssen, Bromhead, Eiloart, and others. The Chairman added a few remarks, and the discussion was brought to a close by a reply from Mr. Geldart.

An article on the late Mr. William Lloyd Garrison, the leader of the American Anti-Slavery party, the materials for which have been drawn from original sources, will appear in the February number of the Fortnightly Review. It is from the pen of Mr. R. Niven, of Lincoln's-inn.

THE Athenaeum says that a diary left by Lord Beaconsfield is to be published before very long. It is the fact that there are at least two diaries of Lord Beaconsfield's youth in existence, in one of which he relates his journey in the East with Mr. Clay. They are both diaries which were given away by the writer in his lifetime, and are therefore beyond the control of the executors.

The last catalogue of Smith College, for Young Women, says the Nation, shows a rapidity of development in this institution comparable only to the growth of a new city in the Far West. The college has full power to grant such honours, degrees, and diplomas as are granted by any university or college in the United States. It counts two hundred and sixty-five students.

HOLLOWAY'S OINTMENT AND PILLS.—Coughs, Influenza.—The soothing properties of these medicaments render them well worthy of trial in all diseases of the lungs. In common colds and influenza the Pills taken internally and the Ointment rubbed externally are exceedingly efficacious. When influenza is epidemic this treatment is easiest, safest, and surest. Holloway's Pills and Ointment purify the blood, remove all obstructions to its free circulation through the lungs, relieve the overgorged air-tubes, and render respiration free without reducing the strength, irritating the nerves, or depressing the spirits. Such are the ready means of saving suffering when afflicted with colds, coughs, bronchitis, and other complaints by which so many are seriously and permanently afflicted in most countries.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE

ORIGINAL AND ONLY GENUINE.

COUGHS,
COLDS,
ASTHMA,
BRONCHITIS.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE.—This wonderful remedy was discovered by Dr. J. COLLIS BROWNE, and the word Chlorodyne coined by him expressly to designate it. There never has been a remedy so vastly beneficial to suffering humanity, and it is a subject of deep concern to the public that they should not be imposed upon by having imitations pressed upon them on account of cheapness, and as being the same thing. Dr. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE is a totally distinct thing from the spurious compounds called Chlorodyne, the use of which only ends in disappointment and failure.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE.—Vice Chancellor Sir W. PAGE WOOD, STATED PUBLICLY in Court that Dr. J. COLLIS BROWNE WAS UNDOUBTEDLY THE INVENTOR OF CHLORODYNE, that the whole story of the defendant was deliberately untrue, and he regretted to say it had been sworn to.—See The Times, July 13th, 1864.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE is a LIQUID MEDICINE which ASSUAGES PAIN OF EVERY KIND, affords a calm, refreshing sleep WITHOUT HEADACHE, and INVIGORATES the NERVOUS SYSTEM when exhausted.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE is the GREAT SPECIFIC FOR CHOLERA, DYSENTERY, DIARRHŒA.

The GENERAL BOARD of HEALTH, London, REPORT that it ACTS as a CHARM, one dose generally sufficient.

Dr. GIBBON, Army Medical Staff, Calcutta, states: "TWO DOSES COMPLETELY CURED ME OF DIARRHŒA."

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE rapidly cuts short all attacks of EPILEPSY, SPASMS, COLIC.

PALPITATION, HYSTERIA.

COUGHS, COLDS, &c.

From W. VESALIUS PETTI-GREW, M.D., formerly Lecturer at St. George's Hospital, LONDON.

"I have no hesitation in stating that I have never met with any medicine so efficacious as an Anti-Spasmotic and Sedative. I have used it in Consumption, Asthma, Diarrhœa, and other diseases, and am perfectly satisfied with the results."

From W. C. WILKINSON, Esq. F.R.C.S., Spalding.

"I consider it invaluable in Phthisis and Spasmodic Cough; the benefit is very marked indeed."

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE is the TRUE PALLIATIVE in NEURALGIA, GOUT, CANCER, TOOTHACHE, RHEUMATISM.

From Dr. B. J. BOULTON and Co., Horncastle.

"We have made pretty extensive use of Chlorodyne in our practice lately, and look upon it as an excellent direct Sedative and Anti-Spasmotic. It seems to allay pain and irritation in whatever organ, and from whatever cause. It induces a feeling of comfort and quietude not obtainable by any other remedy, and it seems to possess this great advantage over all other Sedatives, that it leaves no unpleasant after effects."

IMPORTANT CAUTION.—The IMMENSE SALE of this REMEDY has given rise to many UNSCRUPULOUS IMITATIONS.

N.B.—EVERY BOTTLE OF GENUINE CHLORODYNE BEARS on the GOVERNMENT STAMP the NAME of the INVENTOR.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE.

SPECIAL AND URGENT APPEAL.

In March, 1880, an order from the Metropolitan Board to remove the Temporary Iron Chapel within twelve months forced upon the Committee the alternative of abandoning the cause, or building a permanent Church. But the prospects of success were too encouraging to allow of any hesitation; the only question was, as to the erection of a Schoolroom in addition. This was quickly decided for them by the handsome present made by the late Mr. Samuel Sharpe, of a Plot of Freehold Land, on which was erected the Schoolroom, completed in 1881, one of the best structures of the kind in London, though built at a very moderate cost. The Congregation has worshipped in this building since the removal of the Iron Church, and the attendance so much improved that the Committee felt it their duty to lose no time in proceeding with the building of the New Chapel, the Foundation-stone of which was accordingly laid by Sir James Clarke Lawrence, Bart., M.P., in June, 1881. But the works had to be suspended on account of insufficient funds, and the Committee feel that such a prejudicial influence will be exerted on the Unitarian cause in the neighbourhood should the work remain longer in abeyance that they are impelled to make an urgent appeal for a sufficient sum to enable them to proceed with the building.

The neighbourhood is rapidly enlarging, the influx of inhabitants is great, the spirit of inquiry is rife, and, to quote from the report in the leading local paper, of the laying of the foundation-stone, "the district in which Mr. Carter administers so ably is one which has grown with marvellous strides of late years, and it is quite probable that before long it will form an important centre of Unitarianism."

Under these circumstances, and the Congregation not numbering amongst them persons of affluence, the Committee must depend on the generous aid of the Unitarian body generally to enable them to complete a building really required in the locality, and for which a promising future may be anticipated.

Subscriptions may be paid into the London and South Western Bank (Peckham Branch), or will be received by the undersigned, and acknowledged in the Unitarian papers.

The NINETY-SIXTH ANNUAL MEETING of TRUS-TEES was held in the Memorial Hall, Manchester, on the 19th of January, 1882; JOSEPH LUPTON, Esq., President, in the Chair.

Resolved:—"That the minutes and proceedings of the Committee during the past year be confirmed."

The Accounts of the Treasurer for the Year ending September 29th, 1881, showing an excess of Expenditure over Receipts of £46 4s. 10d. (making up an amount due to the Treasurer of £576 5s. 0d.), were laid before the Meeting, having been duly examined and audited, and were allowed.

The Address of the Committee was read.

Resolved:—That the Address be adopted and printed, with the Treasurer's Accounts and the Annual Report, under the direction of the Committee, as usual.

Resolved:—That since the death of the Rev. John Kenrick the College—always happy in the support of men of learning—has sustained no similar loss so serious as in the decease of Mr. Samuel Sharpe, who has now followed his immediate successor in the Presidential chair; in whose productive erudition, unwearied love of truth, and simplicity of life every student had a model of scholarly excellence; while his wise and generous stewardship of wealth, and steadfast fidelity to his conviction of duty, fulfilled the conditions of ex mjl ry civizenship.

Resolved:—That this meeting cannot place on record the death of Mr. Thomas Ainsworth, of the Floss, a Vice-President of the College, and former President from 1860 to 1863, without marking its sense of the deep interest which for many years he manifested in the College, not only by instituting the scholarship which bears his name, but by his sincere devotion to its comprehensive principle and his hearty appreciation of its intellectual and moral training, attested by the names of all his sons upon its roll of students; and its grateful remembrance of the rare personal qualities and high tone of character which shed a lustre on any cause which he espoused.

Resolved:—That the Committee be requested to consider the system of the representation of the College, and of collection of Subscriptions by the Deputy Treasurers.

The Special Notice and Special Report on negotiations with University Hall issued to the Trustees, being taken as read, it was

Resolved:—(1) That the Scheme for placing University Hall and the proceeds of sale thereof in the hands of Trustees, for the purposes set forth in the Minutes of the Council of the Hall of the 14th day of December, 1881, be approved of; and the Trustees of the College authorise the Committee to continue the negotiations, and to nominate the first Trustees on behalf of the College, and to see to the formal completion of the proposed Trust.

(2) That in order to comply with the stipulation of the Council of University Hall, that the College should make the attempt to carry on the Hall, the Trustees of the College authorise the Committee to make such arrangements as they deem best for doing so, for an experimental period of three years, with power to provide for the residence of Students of the College in the Hall, as the Committee may think proper.

Resolved:—That the Committee be directed to continue their inquiry and revision of the regulations relating to the admission of students and the selection of scholars, taking into consideration, also, the result of the pending negotiations with University Hall.

The Officers were then appointed.

IMMORTALITY.

A HOMILY FOR THE DAY.

THE Future Life has often been asserted by Divines of the Paley School to be "the peculiar discovery, the special revelation" of the Gospel. They forget the glorious teaching of the Greek and Roman philosophers on the natural Immortality of the Soul, which was not to them mere abstract theorising, but a living and practical faith. In all ages and under most of the great religious systems of the world the human heart has felt

The pleasing hope and fond desire,
The longing after Immortality;

as well as the secret dread and inward horror

Of falling into nought.

WORDSWORTH has simply expressed the natural instinct of humanity when he sang

O joy, that in our embers
Is something that doth live
That Nature yet remembers
What was so fugitive.

And our favourite classical poet could sing—

Non omnis moriar: magna pars mei
Vitat Libitinam:

although possibly he was referring to the Immortality of his muse, not of his soul.

There seems to be a growing indifference rather than actual disbelief in regard to this great doctrine of Immortality, because the Christian teaching, resting upon what are now considered doubtful supernatural marvels, does not come home to the heart and reason in the same way as a principle or sentiment resting upon the indubitable facts of human nature and consciousness. If we can succeed in showing that our own nature and faculties are such as absolutely to require another state for their perfect development and completion we have furnished a more powerful argument than any which is based upon mere external authority or improbable physical marvels. And this branch of the argument has become more than ever important, because much of the scepticism of the age in regard to this question proceeds upon the assumption that man is destined by the essential conditions of his being for this earthly life alone; that his moral and intellectual being attains its final end and completed form in this world alone, and needs no other; that it is alike vain and futile to wish or hope for a conscious spiritual existence hereafter. This is the ground taken by writers of the Comtist School in brilliant Essays published in the foremost periodicals of our day. The air of this modern world is heavy with doubts and difficulties even on the fundamental points of Christian faith and hope. We shall do much to confirm this sublime hope, if we can bring home to men's hearts the assurance that Immortality is not merely the doctrine of an authoritative revelation, but an inherent fact of human nature and consciousness: if we can show that man's own nature is such as absolutely to require a future life for its perfect development and completion.

(1) The universality of the belief is an argument in its favour. It is not a conclusive logical proof, but it is at least strong presumptive evidence. Man in almost every condition of society, except, perhaps, in some of the lowest stages of barbarism, has entertained this well-nigh universal expectation of a future life. Even among tribes in the lowest condition of humanity, if we know more about them, we should probably discover some vague germ of the belief. Why, then, has God, who in all the phenomena of Nature is acknowledged to do nothing without purpose, given the human mind such a range that its thoughts soar to a heaven which, according to the sceptic, we are never destined to attain? Why are we tantalised with the glorious prospect of Immortality held out before our longing eyes if we are doomed to nothing but annihilation after a brief life which has been sufficient only to unfold the germs of our high capacities and inspire a yearning for ideal perfection which is never to be satisfied? Why have we been permitted to draw for ourselves a glorious picture of the possibilities of never-ending happiness, if all is finally to come to an end after a few toilsome, profitless days on earth? But the mind of man is not so constituted as to rest contented without hope of the future. The natural dread of annihilation would destroy all the happiness of life, and hope of the future is absolutely needed in order to satisfy the wants and complete the ideal of the present. Therefore this universal belief in Immortality is one strong presumptive proof that man is not now in his final stage of being; that the last change which he is to undergo is not the doom of final destruction, but the natural growth and complete development of his best powers, his purest affections, his noblest aspirations.

(2.) If we had been created for this world alone it seems at least probable that we should have been contented with a life bounded by our present limited moral and intellectual horizon. But man, instructed and elevated by all the varied experiences of life, is ever aspiring to an ideal grander and nobler than anything he now sees or knows. There is a sublime discontent with our present attainments which seems to be made a part of our human nature, as if to remind us that the present is not always to endure; as if to teach us to look forward to a future perfection which shall infinitely transcend all human imagination. Now, why are we constituted with this acute sense of the imperfection of this life, if this life is, indeed, our final destiny, the completed end of our being? Man, in distinction from all other creatures, is eminently a moral and progressive being. The faculties which at first are only sufficient for the preservation of existence in its humblest form, gradually expand and lead him to the knowledge of all the arts and amenities of life. We find him crossing the fathomless ocean, and numbering the stars, and calling by their names the minerals and plants, and all creeping things that God has made. We see him gathered with his fellow beings into great cities; guided by just laws, disciplined by wise instruction, and sanctified by devout worship. When we call to mind the saintly and heroic spirits of the world, the great writers, scientific thinkers, patriotic statesmen, all who have thought deeply, invented skilfully, and executed wisely, is it possible to believe that these high and glorious capabilities, all this exuberant spiritual and intellectual power, all these varied forms of goodness and wisdom, are destined to final and utter extinction? Why this capacity of infinite progress if progress is soon to come to an end? Why this high hope of Immortality if the grave is to be our final destiny? The Universe, whatever scientific theory we form in regard to its origin, is admittedly constructed in every department with the most striking adaptation of means to the end, and on the principle of the most perfect economy. It seems most reasonable to believe that the mind of man would not have been framed with this natural yearning after the eternal if that heart is mortal and perishing. No appetite, no affection, no desire is implanted in vain. "Nature never gravitates towards nothing." No animal has wings that is not destined to fly. Every creature that swims in the deep or crawls on the earth has all the organs and instruments necessary for sustaining life in that department of creation which it is destined to inhabit. Even if its present condition may not seem adapted to its nature we know that the creature is presently to undergo some change which will bring all its organs into action. And, in like manner, these inward aspirations in the human soul after something higher and better than we know now, this instinctive dread of annihilation, this eager looking forward to the future, and expectation of some great change and natural development of our being—these are the wings of the soul beating against its present prison-house; they are the indications and promise of its immortal destiny.

GOETHE, glorious pagan as he was, saw clearly that this hope of Immortality is a necessity of our nature. In his "Conversations with Eckerman" he is represented as saying:—"The belief in Immortality corresponds with the wants of man's nature. To me the eternal existence of the soul is proved from my idea of activity. If I work on incessantly until my death I am confident that Nature will give me another form of existence, when the present one can no longer sustain my spirit. And who will not work and act indefatigably to the end of his days when he finds therein the pledge of an eternal life?"

Sir JOHN HERSCHEL, in his admirable "Preliminary Discourse to the Study of Natural Philosophy," has condensed the whole argument in the following sentences:—"Seeing that all that the longest life and most vigorous intellect can give him power to discover serves only to place him on the bare frontier of knowledge, and affords a distinct glimpse of boundless realms beyond, is it wonderful that a being thus constituted should first encourage a hope, and by degrees acknowledge, an assurance that his intellectual existence will not terminate with the dissolution of his corporeal frame, but rather in a future state of being, disencumbered of a thousand obstructions, endowed with acuter senses and higher faculties, he shall drink deep at that fountain of beneficent Wisdom, of which the slight taste obtained on earth has given him so keen a relish?"

And the poet of In Memoriam sums it all up in lines which go to the very root of the question:—

Thou wilt not leave us in the dust;
Thou madest man, he knows not why.
He thinks he was not made to die;
And Thou hast made him! Thou art just.

The soul longs for Immortality, and is prepared to comprehend it, just in proportion as it faithfully endeavours to fulfil the will of its Maker, and seeks to commune with Him through faith and love, in lowly service and lofty aspiration.

THE NAME "EVANGELICAL."

THERE is something in a good name after all. An illustration of this is afforded by the name "Evangelical." In a party sense this is a capital religious designation. It has a strong gospel flavour about it, and therefore commends itself favourably to those who claim to base their faith especially on the teaching of the Gospel. They call themselves "Evangelicals," and are as proud of this title as other sects are of their party designations. It is the chosen name of a considerable party in the Church of England, and in a less formal manner it is appropriated by many Nonconformists also as descriptive of their theological position. It is worth while to inquire how far the claim to this name is justly advanced by the parties that assume it. Is their interpretation of the Gospel a true evangel to the world at large? Mr. WALTER LLOYD, in his recent excellent work, entitled "The Hope of the World," which we have reviewed in another page, draws attention to this point, and says very justly, "As 'evangel' simply means good news, and evangelist a bringer of good news, it is, to say the least, somewhat presumptuous for one sect in the Universal Church to claim, and foolish for others to allow their claim to be the only bearer of good news to man.

It may be (he says) found that, on the whole, the Latitudinarian has better news, a more cheerful and hopeful gospel for man than the Evangelical, and yet he is not allowed to be styled the bringer of good tidings, not because his message is not good, but because it is not orthodox. But when we consider that Orthodoxy starts with the doctrine of universal depravity and ends with the doctrine of eternal punishment, it is a wonder how it can profess to be cheerful, inspiring, or hopeful; for to rob man of his dignity and then excite his worst fears for the future is, after all, a strange preamble to a gospel. Of course the Evangelicals will say that these are not the only subjects of their message. These (say they) are facts which we have to declare, but our message is also one of deliverance, and it is in this that the good news consists." But it is no less a gospel which abandons sin and its consequences to a lower place in the order of Providence, and assigns the first and final places to God and holiness and heaven. I therefore claim for every message which is given in the name of Christ to encourage, stimulate, and elevate the description "Evangelical." So whether Roman, Anglican, Low Churchman, Dissenter, or Unitarian, if a man preaches deliverance from sin, freedom from bondage, comfort to the afflicted, hope for the despairing, and mercy for all, he is truly evangelical, the bringer of good tidings to all people.

Mr. LLOYD, it will be seen, protests against the exclusive claim to the name Evangelical by any one sect, especially by the party which is so fond of appropriating this designation to itself. He rests his protest on two grounds—first, that the so-called evangelical theology is essentially exclusive; next, that the salvation it provides is not salvation in the truest sense after all. The question which is commonly stated by evangelical teachers, and which their theology has been an attempt, more or less successful to answer, is, "What must I do to be saved from future punishment?" and it is constantly assumed, if a solution can be found to this query, that the individual believer has a ground of peace and comfort and personal assurance of safety upon which he can rest. To him, then, belong all the hopes and promises of the Gospel, while those who have not arrived at the same solution, and rested upon the same means of salvation are eternally lost. And it is further to be remembered that the number of the saved will be but a small fraction of the whole of mankind. How can a gospel which shuts out the vast multitudes of mankind from future happiness be a true evangel to the world at large?

BAXTER sets forth the ground of nearly all modern Evangelical preaching when he says, "It hath been the astonishing wonder of many a man, as well as me, to read in the Holy Scriptures how few will be saved, and that the greater part even of those that are called will be everlastingly shut out of the Kingdom of Heaven, and be tormented with the devils in eternal fire." And this conception of the Gospel is held not only as Orthodox, but as a very consoling truth by many of those who feel themselves safe in the correctness of their belief and practice. Thus, Professor ROGERS, of the Metropolitan Tabernacle College, says, "Thousands and millions have been saved, and the saved have found no hindrance to their faith and hope and love and joy in the preaching of the old doctrine." That is to say, the thought of the awful fate awaiting others has never cast even a shade of regret across their own satisfaction and happiness. "It is manifest," Mr. LLOYD remarks, "that such an idea of Christianity as BAXTER's cannot endure much longer; the truth of it is being tried before the searching investigation of the world, for the world is demanding a solution to its cry, 'What must I do to be saved?' The question is more than a personal one: it is a question of the race of Humanity. Let a man say, 'I am saved'—or 'I am safe,' for that is what he commonly means—'I am at peace,' 'I can look forward to the next world with satisfaction,' and is that all? Can he rest in that without asking—'What of these others, these my brethren, the great human family? The vast Christless multitudes who have lived and are dead, who are living and who are dying, what is becoming of them? To this the Orthodox religious teacher has had but one answer—'They are lost.' What a mockery to call this partial gloomy theology evangelical! Its predominant sentiment is a refined selfishness. The state of mind or feeling in the next world, of those who are saved, towards the lost is represented as one of callous indifference. Such a mental condition is even less than human. It falls below the common feelings of humanity. Yet this is what the old theology ascribes to the 'redeemed'!"

What is the effect of such teachings on minds that think or reflect at all?

Sometimes (says Mr. Lloyd) it is received as true, and in the manner which characterises those who are commonly called Calvinists. They rejoice that they are chosen, selected from the many, and that they are the privileged recipients of God's mercy and grace, while the rest of mankind is to bear the brunt of his wrath. But "it is all of grace," they say, and they shut themselves up contentedly in placid security, while they believe the world is hurrying with countless myriads to eternal torment according to the pleasure of God; they can do nothing but rejoice in their own safety, and leave the rest of the world to the devil. Again, it is received by more generous minds as true, but with them the belief obtains that it is not an irrevocable decree that sentences men to perdition, but that if they are brought into the light of the Gospel, they may, if they will, be saved. And in such cases, like that of Wesley and other modern evangelists, it creates a burning zeal for the 'salvation of souls,' which no difficulty, hardship, or opposition can quench. This second idea has done a great deal to eradicate the first from Protestant theology. The Arminianism of Wesley and others has almost swept away the Calvinism of their Puritan ancestors. It remains now to be seen whether the ordinary evangelical views are to be regarded as final, whether the doctrine of conditional free grace which has been the theme of evangelists for more than a century shall not itself give way before a freer, grander, and more God-like interpretation of that Gospel which claims to be the bringer of good tidings of great joy to all people. A third effect which this assertion of the eternal reprobation of a large portion of our race has upon men's minds is to cause them to reject the Gospel altogether; they cannot reconcile the possibility of such a destiny for any creatures with the idea of a just and holy and loving God."

We believe they are mistaken who think themselves driven to the alternative of accepting the doctrine of endless woe or rejecting Christianity altogether. We prefer to take the most cheering and hopeful utterances of the New Testament in regard to the future of humanity as presenting the highest, purest truth of Christianity, and resting upon them our hope of an ultimate redemption in the providence of God for all mankind.

ROMANISM AS IT IS.

UNDER the title of "English Church Courts and Primitive Ritual" the Rev. EDMUND S. FFOULKES, at one time a convert to Romanism, and since then reconverted to Protestantism, contributes an interesting article to the January number of Macmillan's Magazine, in which he contrasts the secret tribunals of the Romish Church with the courts of the Anglican Church. It is an advantage, in forming an estimate of any religious system, to have the testimony of one who speaks from experience, who gives his evidence from intimate personal knowledge, not from mere hearsay, not even from reading or study as an outsider. This advantage we enjoy in the case of Mr. FFOULKES; and his testimony is certainly remarkable. We commend it to the attention of any who are inclined to think that in the bosom of the Roman Church are to be found veracity, honour, peace.

We quite agree with the writer that "there are times when personal experience may be appealed to without egotism, and studied, for the position they are intended to illustrate, with profit." It is on this ground that he ventures to recall what were his own experiences, and to state them as a salutary warning. Two books written by Mr. FFOULKES while he belonged to the Church of Rome were placed in the Roman Index, and the proceedings connected therewith were the immediate occasion of his quitting the Roman Communion after having joined it in mature life, continued in it fifteen years, and witnessed its workings in a host of countries besides his own. "True," he adds, "those proceedings were neither novel nor peculiar in any case; but till then I distrusted the account given of them in books as being ingrained with prejudice. Brought face to face with them, I found it only too true. Two volumes of mine were placed on the index of proscribed books. I was neither informed of what was in contemplation, nor of the fact. I am unaware to this day who debated them. I was never confronted with my accusers, nor with my judges, nor with the passages in either volume considered unsound." The books had been out and in circulation no less than two years in England previously to their condemnation. Then they attracted notice in Rome, and as soon as they did so they were condemned. "I should be curious," he says, "to have the canon pointed out to me countenancing a judicial process of this kind." Observe how peremptory and secret the whole proceeding was. No opportunity was allowed the author to justify himself, or to defend what he had written. "Open trial in an English court of justice, be it even the Court of Arches, as now constituted, is surely preferable to the arbitrary procedure that we find everywhere else." Looking back now on the arbitrary decision of the Roman authorities, Mr. FFOULKES says:—

Never shall I cease to be thankful for that unrighteous act—that act which enabled me with a good conscience to emancipate myself from a system that I had found on full experience to be completely delusive; just as full of blemishes, and distortions and corruptions as our forefathers had painted it ages ago; falsifying, in fact, almost every pretension it affected itself, or its proselytisers claimed for it; with unity largely dependent on tyranny for its maintenance, and blind to any amount of heart-burnings and internecine strife behind the scenes; with moral appearances largely dependent on secrecy, and truth played fast and loose with in every possible way for palliating, advancing or saving the system. All these discoveries made me rejoice over the unrighteous act that set me free, and enabled me to return to my old home, a wiser, but not by any means a sadder man. I had known Rome now, once for all.

Mr. FFOULKES was not singular in his experience; he speaks thus of the fate of a friend:—

The man who, perhaps, had most to do with my joining the Church of Rome—whose abilities and acquirements commanded my admiration, whose character won my love, whose fate brings tears to my eyes—Père Gratz, of the French Oratory—what was his fate soon after my own breach with Rome? He was hounded to death for daring to speak the truth in a great crisis, as I had done when minds though excited were less vindictive.

It would be interesting to know what are the actual attractions that draw intelligent thoughtful men to Rome—what it is that in their judgment compensates them for the loss of individual freedom. Different causes, doubtless, operate with different minds. Mr. FFOULKES has told us what was the special attraction in his case, and what he has to say in reference to it is highly instructive:—

What attracted me to Rome formerly was the Roman missal, and nothing else. It was not the gorgeous or the musical accompaniments of High Mass, but the Mass-book itself. Transubstantiation, indeed, I never could get over; but it was not written there. I pronounced the word on being assured it pledged me to no more than a distinct acceptance of the doctrine of the Real Presence—a doctrine which had been mine from childhood—and in this assurance I rested for a length of time; till, on re-reading the points at issue between the Latin and Greek Churches attentively, doubts of the two doctrines being identic were started, though I had not leisure to pursue them farther just then. An opportunity presented itself, however, before long, on my being asked for a paper on the "Eucharist," by Dr. Smith for his Biographical Dictionary. I resolved on doing full justice to truth in this article, so far as its limits would permit. What was my surprise, then, when on comparing the Roman missal carefully bit by bit, with the various liturgies which it has either displaced—but of which tell-tale fragments remain,—or is still opposing, I found it was by no means the venerable immaculate landmark of primitive belief in its present form that it had appeared to me to be years ago, but a deceptive composite; again and again altered irregularly by those who should have maintained it intact, to meet the requirements of a doctrine based on counterfeit works of the Fathers, but opposed diametrically to their teaching. The fact is, this missal is just of a piece with what inquiry shows everything else to be, that is distinctively Roman, and tends to the exaltation of Rome, viz., that when its sources have been unravelled and laid bare, they are found invariably to consist of spurious documents, interpolated or distorted passages, or passages construed apart from their context, and giving colour to the false conclusions of which Rome has been in uninterrupted possession so long that she can pass them off still, authenticated as they have been many times over by her supreme heads, upon her much enduring children, and pledge them to their acceptance as part and parcel of her Apostolic heirloom.

In another instructive paragraph Mr. FFOULKES traces the origin and rise of the doctrine of Transubstantiation:—

Now, without going into theological disquisitions of any kind, but keeping to what is matter of pure history throughout, the facts of the case are simply these. Transubstantiation, which has become the distinctive teaching of the Church of Rome, cannot be found in any genuine work that has come down to us before the eleventh century. The first authorities for it are spurious homilies, treatises, or interpolations which began to be current about that time. Up to that time what is called the doctrine of the Real Presence—a doctrine quite distinct from Transubstantiation—had been the teaching of the Universal Church; and up to that time, or very nearly till then, there had been a prayer in every known liturgy throughout the Christian world—as there still is in every known Eastern liturgy—which has always gone by the name of the "Prayer of Invocation," in other words, a prayer addressed to the Father to send down the Holy Ghost from Heaven, to make the Eucharist on its consecration what his Son had pronounced it to be at its institution.

On this interesting question our author maintains, as a matter of fact, that the very first writer who ascribes to CHRIST's words at the supper the effect now ascribed to them on their being pronounced by the priest, is AMALARIUS, a liturgical writer of the ninth century, patronised by the Emperor LEWIS, to whom his work is dedicated, but what rank he held in the Church is uncertain. "How are we to explain the fact," asks Mr. FFOULKES, "that a doctrine so portentous should have been overlooked for more than eight centuries, and then proclaimed to the Western world by a writer so obscure? It is explained in his work, which, being a running commentary, paragraph by paragraph, on the Roman Mass-book, as it stood in his day, and no reference, direct or indirect, being made by him to the Prayer of Invocation, that prayer must have been expunged from the Roman liturgy by them." Its omission made room for the mediæval figment of Transubstantiation.

The greater part of Mr. FFOULKES's paper is interesting to Churchmen chiefly, as it bears directly on present Church difficulties and controversies, out of which he suggests what seems to him a way of deliverance; but the passages we have quoted are of interest to all who hate ecclesiastical fraud and imposture, or are in the least degree likely to be deceived by them. The Roman Church abates nothing of its claims, confesses none of its faults, retracts none of its manifest errors and falsehoods. It stands by the whole, and strives to maintain them intact. And this makes it necessary, especially in an age when it still boasts of its successes, to speak the honest truth about it and show it up in its true colours. At least, what can be done should be done to warn the unwary against the huge imposture of Roman pretension, and we trust that Mr. FFOULKES's warning, given from his own experience, will not be without a salutary effect.

DEATH OF DR. BELLOWS OF NEW YORK.

We have received with the deepest regret the melancholy intelligence of the sudden death of our friend the Rev. Dr. Bellows, who was almost as well known and as greatly respected and beloved among Liberal Christians on this side of the Atlantic as in his own country. Many of our readers will call to mind his dignified person and open genial countenance; as well as the marvellous power of his sermons and addresses on occasion of his visits to this country many years ago. Others have been delighted and instructed by his theological works, and still more by his charming book of travel in the old world, entitled "The Old World in its New Face."

On another page we have reprinted the fine tribute to Dr. Bellows's work as a philanthropist and patriot during the Civil War, which appeared in the Daily News of Thursday, evidently from the pen of Mr. Clayden, who enjoyed Dr. Bellows's friendship and hospitality during his visit last year to the United States. Next week we are promised an outline of Dr. Bellows's work as a theologian and religious reformer, from the pen of our valued contributor the Rev. W. H. Channing. The loss our Liberal cause has sustained is almost irreparable. There may have been greater thinkers and more influential writers in the Unitarian ministry, but there was no man who was so great as an organiser and practical leader, or who was regarded with more profound respect and entire confidence. Dr. Bellows was even more of a Liberal Christian than a Unitarian, more a reconciler than a proselytiser; and it was interesting to observe how his theology broadened and his sympathies widened with advancing age, so that while he occupied what might be considered the central position, he could recognise what is good and true in the work of all "schools" of thought in our somewhat heterogeneous community. But on this and other features in the character of this large-hearted divine we must leave our friend Mr. Channing to bear his testimony, from the fulness of long and intimate personal knowledge.

THE CONGREGATIONAL UNION.—The first list, amounting to £87,000 in definite promises, of contributions to the Special Jubilee Fund in the Congregational Union has just been issued. In Wales a remarkable movement has been initiated in connection with it to reduce the debts on the Congregational churches of the Principality, which are said to amount to £170,000. Of this, £30,000 rests upon the Welsh churches in the Rhondda Valley—a district unhappily so well known on account of the terrible colliery disasters of recent years. Though the district is chiefly inhabited by colliers, yet at a representative meeting recently held at the Tonystad, the churches pledged themselves to raise the whole of this amount during the next eight years, with £10,000 interest thereon.

THE SOLDIERS OF THE CROSS, THE BRETHREN, AND THE DISCIPLES OF CHRIST.

BY THE REV. J. M. DIXON.

About twelve months ago a few poor people commenced a working-men's mission, with the designation of the "Soldiers of the Cross." They meet in a room in Regent-street, Hull. Their humble meeting-house was originally a joiner's shop, and still has unmistakable evidences of its utilitarian origin. In the conversion of the joiner's shop into a meeting-house the Soldiers of the Cross have not attempted anything in the way of ecclesiastical arrangement. There is neither pulpit nor reading-desk, and all the benches are backless. The room and the furniture are of a very primitive character. The Soldiers have several meetings on Sundays, and meet every night in the week. They have no paid officers. There is a committee of five persons, and each member of the committee takes his turn in presiding at the meetings. The evening I attended the assembly of Soldiers the meeting was opened with a hymn and prayer. A chapter in "The Acts of the Apostles" was next read; another hymn, then an exhortation by the young man who presided; more singing; after which several persons, both men and women, spoke their religious experience. The first speaker was an old sailor, who seemed to be filled to running over with spiritual joy. One man, without the sanguine temperament of the previous speaker, and evidently by nature of bilious temperament, said some people said he had a "tile off." He added, if he had a tile off God had let light into his soul by taking away the tile. A woman waxed eloquent in speaking of the joy and delight of her soul. She said she could not tell how happy she was. The next female Soldier was more nervous and subdued in her manner. Most of the speakers closed with the words "May I meet you all in heaven." The Soldiers of the Cross all appeared to be very happy, and the meeting was certainly a lively one.

The "Brethren" or "Open Brethren" meet in the Granville Hall, on Sunday mornings, but have not any week evening meetings. A gentleman, one of the "Brethren," has kindly furnished me with all needful information respecting this section of Christians. He says—"The Christians in Hull known as 'Open Brethren' have begun to meet in Granville Hall, every Lord's Day, at 11 A.M., to remember in the ordinance of the Supper the atoning death of our Divine Redeemer, but as yet we have no meetings during the other days of the week."

Some people manage to get as much temple bread on the Sunday as serves them all the week, and others have to meet every evening in the week to keep the health and vigour of their souls. A cultivated friend of mine, whose logical faculty somewhat encroaches upon his devotional nature, says some people have not as much religion as serves them from Sunday to Sunday, and, therefore, they go on week evenings to religious services to get what crusts and crumbs are to be obtained on such occasions. Still, it is well to assemble often for social spiritual communion, and it is both rational and religious to do so.

I will let the "Brethren state their own case, as they have presented it to the world in a little tract.

"The Brethren.—Those to whom this appellation is applied receive it only as descriptive of their individual state as Christians—not as a name by which they might be known collectively as a distinct religious sect. It is not from any common doctrinal peculiarity or definite ecclesiastical organisation that have the appearance of a separate community; but rather from the fact that, while all other Christians are identified with some particular section of the Church of God, the persons known as 'Brethren' utterly refuse to be identified with any. Their existence is, in fact, a protest against all sectarianism; and the primary ground of their secession from the different bodies to which most of them have once belonged is, that the various tests by which, in all these bodies, the communion of true Christians with each other is prevented or impeded are unsanctioned by the Word of God. They see no valid reason why the Church (consisting of all true believers) which is really one, should not be also visibly united, having as its only bond of fellowship and barrier of exclusion the reception or rejection of those vital truths by which the Christian is distinguished from the unbeliever.

Looking at existing Churches, it appears to them that all are faulty in this matter; national Churches by adopting a too lax—dissenting Churches by adopting a too limited—criterion of membership. The former, it appears to Brethren, by considering as members all within a certain territory, mingle in one body the believers and the unbelievers; while the latter, by their various tests of doctrine or of discipline, exclude from their communion many who are clearly and undoubtedly true members of the universal Church. The Brethren, therefore, may be represented as consisting of all such as, practically holding all the truths essential to salvation, recognise each other as, on that account alone, true members of the only Church. A difference of opinion upon aught besides is not regarded as sufficient ground for separation; and the Brethren, therefore, have withdrawn themselves from all those bodies in which tests, expressed on vital or minor points, are made the means of separating Christians from each other.

"In the judgment of the Brethren, the disunion now existing in the general Church is the result of a neglect to recognise the Holy Spirit as its all-sufficient Guide. Instead, they say, of a reliance on His promised presence and sovereignty as Christ's Vicar on earth, ever abiding to assert and maintain His Lordship in the Church according to the written Word, men, by their creeds and articles, have questioned the sufficiency of Scripture as interpreted to all by Him, and, by their ministerial and ritual appointments, have assumed to specify the channels through which only can His blessings be communicated. All these various human forms and systems are believed by Brethren to be destitute of scriptural authority, and practically restrictive of the Holy Spirit's operations.

"Chiefly with regard to ministry are these opinions urged; the usual method of ordaining special persons to the office being held to be unscriptural and prejudicial. They conceive that Christians in general confound ministry (i.e., the exercise of spiritual gifts) with local charges, as eldership, &c. Such charges they infer from Scripture require the sanction of the Apostles or their delegates to validate the appointment (Acts xiv. 23; Titus i. 5); whereas the 'gifts' never needed any human authorisation (Acts xviii. 24-28; Rom. xii. 1; 1 Cor. xii. xiv.; Phil. i. 14; 1 Peter iv. 9, 10). Further, they urge that while Scripture warrants the Church to expect a perpetuity of 'gifts'—asevangelists, pastors, teachers, exhorters, rulers, &c.—because they are requisite for the work of the ministry (Eph. iv. 7-13)—it nowhere guarantees a permanent ordaining power, without which the nomination or ordaining of elders is valueless. All believers are, it is affirmed, true spiritual priests, capacitated for worship (Heb. x. 19-25), and any who possess the qualifications from the Lord are authorised to evangelise the world or instruct the Church; and such have not alone the liberty, but also an obligation, to employ whatever gift may be entrusted to their keeping. Hence, in their assemblies, Brethren have no pre-appointed person to conduct or share in the proceedings; all is open to the guidance of the Holy Ghost at the time, so that he who believes himself to be so led of the Spirit may address the meeting, &c. This arrangement is considered to be indicated as the proper order in 1 Cor. xiv.—to flow from the principle laid down in 1 Cor. xii.—and to be traceable historically in the Acts of the Apostles. By adopting it the Brethren think that they avoid two evils by which all existing sects are more or less distinguished; the first, the evil of not employing talents given to believers for the Church's benefit—the second, the evil of appointing as the Church's teachers men in whom the gifts essential for the work have not yet been discovered. The Brethren, therefore, recognise no separate orders of 'clergy' and 'laity'—all are looked upon as equal in position (Matt. xxiii. 8; 1 Cor. x. 17; xii. 12-20, &c.), differing only as to 'gifts' of ruling, teaching, preaching, and the like (Rom. xii. 4-8; 1 Cor. xii. 18-23, &c.). The ordinance consequently of baptism, when administered, and the Lord's Supper, which is celebrated weekly, need no special person to administer or preside (Acts ix. 17-18; x. 48; xx. 7; 1 Cor. xi.). Another feature of some importance is, that wherever gifted men are found among the Brethren, they, in general, are actively engaged in preaching and expounding, &c., on their own individual responsibility to the Lord, and quite distinct from the assembly. So that though they may occasionally use the buildings where the Brethren meet, it is in no way as ministers of the Brethren, but of Christ."

The "Brethren" seem to have much in common with the "Friends," and still more with the people usually known as "Plymouth Brethren." Are the "Open Brethren" so open that they would admit to their Church fellowship Swedenborg, with his doctrine of the Trinity all in Jesus Christ, or John Milton or Dr. Channing, holding the Arian view of Christ? All these men objected to such phraseology as the atoning sacrifice of Christ, but they believed in the doctrine of the reconciliation of man to God through Jesus Christ, and bravely and devoutly followed the Well-beloved Son of God. Would the "Open Brethren" welcome Elizabeth Fry as a sister in Christ? In the simple, sublime majesty of the spirit of Christ she went from prison to prison as an angel of love and mercy. Her only baptism was the heavenly grace, and her communion service was the ever new, rich wine of Christian love. While we have our forms and rites as helps to our spiritual life, and our doctrinal views as relative truth, different measures of the infinite truth, which the finite can know only in part, we may see all sections of religious people as members of the one Holy Church of God:—

"One only Church of God appears
Through every age and race,
Unwasted by the lapse of years,
Unchanged by changing place.

From oldest time, on farthest shores,
Beneath the pine or palm,
One Unseen Presence she adores
With silence or with psalm.

Her priests are all God's faithful sons,
To serve the world raised up;
The pure in heart her baptised ones,
Love her Communion Cup.

The truth is her prophetic gift,
The soul her sacred page;
And feet on mercy's errands swift,
Do make her pilgrimage.

O living Church! thine errand speed,
Fulfil thy task sublime;
With bread of life earth's hunger feed,
Redeem the evil time!"

"The Disciples of Christ," sometimes designated Campbellites, meet on Sundays, in a room on Hesse-road. At present they have not any week evening meetings, but trust to have them before long. The originator of this branch of the Christian Church was a Mr. Campbell. The Rev. Thomas Campbell was a minister of the Secession Presbyterian Church, in the North of Ireland. He emigrated to America, and settled in Washington County, Pennsylvania, where he was joined by his son Alexander, who had studied in Glasgow. Father and son began to restore the Church to what they regarded as its original unity. To this end they said all human creeds, confessions of faith, formularies of any Church government, should be laid aside, and the Bible alone should be taken as the rule of faith and practice and the bond of Church unity. Many people responded to this appeal, and on the 7th September, 1810, a Church was formed upon Brush Run, in Washington County. Over this Church, with no creed but the Bible, Thomas Campbell and his son Alexander presided as pastors. Each applicant for admission to this Church was requested to give a satisfactory answer to the question, "What is the meritorious cause of the sinner's acceptance with God?" And on expressing his reliance upon the merits of Christ alone for salvation and manifesting the Christian spirit, the applicant was received into the Church. For some time this Church had unbroken harmony, but a controversy arose on the subject of baptism. The two Campbells and several other members of the Church advocated adult baptism by immersion. Others maintained the rite of infant baptism. A separation took place, the two parties forming themselves into separate Churches. The Campbells and their followers were drawn into closer sympathy and connection with the Baptists. In 1813 the Campbells and their adherents were received into the Redstone Baptist Association, with the distinct understanding that no terms of communion should be required of them than those laid down in the Scriptures. The views which Alexander Campbell urged upon the Baptist Churches made much commotion and division. The Brush Run pastor and Church were regarded with much suspicion, and charged with heresy by many of the Baptists. After much contention and unpleasantness, Alexander Campbell and about thirty members had to leave Brush Run Church. Campbell and his sympathisers immigrated to Wellsburg, Virginia, where they formed a new Church, and connected themselves with an Association of Baptist Churches. There they found a more ready and general acceptance of their views. But even there many Baptists objected to dispense with all human creeds, and the Baptist Churches of the Beaver Association denounced the views of Campbell and his followers as heretical. Finding themselves cut off from communion with the Baptists, Campbell and his fellow-believers formed themselves into a separate religious community, as "Disciples of Christ." When they became a distinct denomination their numbers increased more rapidly. They are not numerically insignificant in America. "In the United States they are most numerous in Kentucky, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, and Virginia. There are a few of the 'Disciples' in the British provinces of North America." The late President Garfield was an honoured and active member of this community. The principles of the "Disciples" soon found their way to England in the writings of Alexander Campbell, but the "Disciples" are not numerous in this country. In The Ecclesiastical Observer of October 15, 1881, a fortnightly journal of the "Disciples," there is a statement of their distinctive principles, which I subjoin:—Sir,—Your correspondent "A. B.," in your issue of the 29th instant, asks to be informed what are the doctrines of the Campbellites, of whose faith was the late President Garfield. Will you permit me to say that the designation "Campbellites" is a misnomer, and that the body of which the deceased illustrious man was a member repudiate the appellation, and always request to be called by such names alone as were with approbation accepted by the early followers of the Lord Jesus Christ, such as "Christians," "Disciples," "Believers," &c., as they disclaim all humanly-invented titles, believing them not only unauthorised, but contrary to the letter and genius of the Divine system propounded by the great Head of the Church, and the Apostles, who were his ambassadors? They revere and esteem the memory of the late Alexander Campbell, whose name is a sort of household word, especially in America, and who was one of several pioneers of what was known as the Reformation (they prefer the term Restoration); and his writings, debates, and discourses have exerted a wide-spread influence in that country, and have been diffused, and are still being disseminated, in almost every land. By "the Restoration" is meant the return to the original order of worship instituted by "the Lord and those who heard Him." They hold "the Bible, and the Bible only," as the authorised basis of their belief and practice, and recognise no humanly-devised or humanly-constructed creed or confession of faith. Their motto is: "Where the Bible speaks we speak, and where the Bible is silent we are silent," in reference to church order and obligations. In order to membership in the Church they require a confession of belief in the Lord Jesus Christ as the Son of God, and the atoning sacrifice for sin, understanding that He, as "the Word," was "in the beginning with God," and "was God," that "all things were made by Him, and without Him was not anything made that was made;" the confession of the belief to be followed by an avowal of repentance produced by that belief, and baptism (immersion) into the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit for the remission of sins. (Acts ii. 14-40). The "body," "church," or congregation thus formed, meet on the first day of the week to attend to "the Apostles' doctrine, the fellowship, the breaking of the loaf, and the prayers" (Acts ii 42), and for mutual edification, and at which any may, in order, take part in the service, provided they are qualified to do so to "edification." They require for their practice, in church order and discipline, a "thus saith the Lord," a precedent approved by the Apostles, or a necessary inference, logically deduced from apostolic teaching; and in matters untaught or of expediency such practices as do not conflict with any principle of law, or the spirit of the Scriptures, and thus "contend for the faith once delivered to the saints." They plead for "the unity of the spirit," and seek to hasten the time when the prayer of the Saviour shall be realised, that those who "name His name may be one, that the world may know that the Father has sent Him."

There are people who simply accept the Sermon on the Mount as the Christ-made chart by which to find their way to Christian character and to heaven. To lovingly accept that sermon is to build our spiritual houses on the rock of truth and righteousness. But different minds, equally sincere and anxious to know the truth, see different aspects of truth, and some have clearer visions of some portions of truth than other minds have. Amid the diversities of judgment we should all cultivate the unity of the spirit and cherish the love which thinketh no evil and never faileth. Then in thought, we can take the nature and surroundings of those from whom we differ into account. We can become them in thought or imagination a while, and see and feel how certain influences affect them, and certain arguments and feelings form their religious views and spiritual affinities and tastes. We thus learn to be charitable towards all who differ from us in religious belief. This large, clear kindly outlook on the human world is the righteous adversary of all bigotry and intolerance.

My week evening wanderings in the many folds of faith have brought me into close contact with many phases of religious life. From the ornate, sensuous, picturesque worship of the Catholic Church, to the stately, inflexible service of the Established Church; through the severe baldness of Calvinistic Presbyterianism; educated Congregationalism, including the Baptists; the eloquent fervour of Wesleyanism; the mid-region of New Connexionism; the now subdued heat of Primitive Methodism; the more open grooves of Free Methodism; the cool region of Swedenborgianism; the intellectual gravity of Unitarianism; the compound ritualism of the Catholic Apostolic Church; the shady peace of the Friends; the measured silence and the unmeasured talk of the Plymouth Brethren, or "Christians;" down to the red hot energy and stormy unction of the Salvation Army, I have travelled. And I have gathered bits of spiritual silver and gold in my journeyings. I have gone from spiritual house to house in the spirit of Christian eclecticism, taking whatever good was to be had.

These articles have brought me into pleasant intercourse with ministers and laymen of many denominations. One of the most pleasant events in this way was the very friendly relation into which I was brought with the liberal, genial, and much esteemed vicar of Sculcoates, the late Rev. Canon Walsham, whom I esteemed very highly.

A MODERN HANS SACHS ON THE JUDENHETZE.

The author of the following skit, which, though primarily referring to the anti-Semitic agitation in Germany, is applicable, in still stronger measure, to the recent Russian atrocities, is no less a person than the celebrated Dr. Daniel Sanders, compiler of the gigantic German Dictionary (1860-1865), and an immense number of grammatical and lexicographical works of a kindred character, among the latest and most important of which are the "Deutsche Sprachbriefe" (third edition, Berlin, 1881), a series of letters, in which all the niceties of the German idiom are illustrated by examples from almost every author from the days of Luther to the present time. Sanders is the Littre of Germany; the completer of the work which Grimm began; and has well been called the "founder of modern High German Philology." Even the lighter words of such a man cannot fail to have their weight, and they may form a wholesome counterblast to the utterances of a Goldwin Smith. Allowance must be made for the inevitable shortcomings of a translation.

THE TWO APOSTLES.

A SKIT BY HANS SACHS THE YOUNGER (DANIEL SANDERS).

St. Peter sits at heaven's gate;
He has not much to do of late:
The keys are resting on his lap,
And he has time to take a nap.
While nodding in profound repose,
A sudden start disturbs his doze.
A wild alarm assaults the sky;
He wonders what it can imply.
Till fairly roused, he pricks his ears,
And words as follows plainly hears:—

"O gracious God from heaven behold
How we thy little Christian fold
These Devils no more aloof can hold:
By cursed Semites overridden,
Until the land be them forbidden."

St. Peter, at the news distraught,
Looked up to God, and him besought
For mercy on the Christian folk
Ground down beneath the cruel yoke,
And when St. Paul had heard the plea,
Not slow to follow suit was he:
For both Apostles, as we know,
With Christian zeal and fervour glow.
And, smiling, God replied, "Go to—
Descend to earth, then, both of you,
The downtrod Christians' plight to view,
And see what huge oppressive throng
My feeble flock afflict with wrong."

So, following the noise and screech,
At length a crowded hall they reach.
"What's up?" asks Paul the first he saw,
"You Jewish rascal, hold your jaw!
We're Teutons—anti-Semites too,
Who stop the jaw of every Jew.
Your hash we'll settle out and out"—
In furious chorus wild they shout.

Dumbfounded Paul at Peter gazed,
Who answered angry and amazed:
"Christians! what mean ye? know ye not
The speaker? have ye then forgot?
'Tis the beloved Apostle Paul;
Dear follower of the Lord of all;
And his companion Peter—I."

"And what of that?" did straight reply
The leader of the hue and cry;
"We simply wont abide a Jew;
And sons of Shem are both of you."

"We know you well. You say you're Paul,
Yes, but at bottom you are Saul,
A genuine Jew and son of Shem;
We Teutons have had enough of them.
And you who call yourself St. Peter,
You scoundrel of a Jewish cheater,
Are Cephas—better Simon Bar
Jonah—yes, we know what you are."

"Turn Saul and the son of Jonah out!"
The whole assembly furious shout.
The Apostles are hustled and jostled; at last Kicked out in the cold, and the doors made fast.
There cramped in a corner of the street
An aged cringing Jew they meet,
To whom says Paul: "Pray tell us straight
The number of Jews in the German State."
"I should say there are half a million or so."
"And how many Christians, do you know?"
"As near," says he, "as I can tell,
In Germany forty millions dwell."

"And you, outnumbered eighty-fold, Oppress them! Can such trash be told!"
The greybeard sad the speaker eyed,
And with a silent shrug replied.
Thus undeceived the Apostles twain,
To heaven betook them back again.
And with a smile said God, "Well, how Fare the poor German Christians now?"
Storms Peter, "The boasted land of thinkers
Is a stinking sink of brawling tinkers!"
"Speak fair and softly," God exclaims,
"And do not call my Germans names,
Because a knot of worthless fellows
With envy blinded howls and bellows.
Has thou not seen the sun's bright beam
Through cloud and mist oft faintly gleam?
It needs but a freshening breeze from heaven,
And straight the murky veil is riven,
And the glad sunshine smiling bright
Floods all the sky with golden light.
Trust me this Anti-Semitic craze
Shall yield to the dawn of better days:
And forth shall shine on the German nation
With stainless pure illumination
Humanity, freedom, and toleration."
That thus his country great may wax
Is the heartfelt prayer of her friend

Occasional Notes.

MR. HERMAN, the Senior Wrangler this year—the last of a long line of Senior Wranglers—is a Nonconformist, as were several of his predecessors during the quarter of a century that the older Universities have been freed from religious tests. His father is deacon of a Congregational Church at Bath, and his uncle is minister of another at Reading. It is a curious circumstance that Orthodox Dissenters who differ so little from the Church in doctrine are seldom tempted by University influences to enter the Establishment, while Unitarians who differ to celo from the whole Orthodox world are constantly passing over to the side of the majority. The present Master of Peterhouse, a Senior Wrangler of three or four years ago, born and brought up a Unitarian, is now an ordained clergyman of the Church of England. But then long usage, if not special enactment, requires that the Master of Peterhouse should be in holy orders.

WE announced a few weeks ago that the fine old house on Newington-green where Samuel Rogers was born is about to be pulled down. He was one of the trustees of the little Unitarian chapel on the Green, the venerable character of which has unfortunately been destroyed by its new and hideous front. In common, we suppose, with most of our readers we were quite ignorant of the interesting fact which Mr. Jeremy has lately mentioned in his valuable series of biographical papers, that the poet was also for a short time one of the trustees of Dr. Williams's Library, one of the oldest and most valuable of Nonconformist institutions. A correspondent of a weekly paper calls attention to the sadly-neglected state of Rogers's tomb in the picturesque churchyard of Hornsey. It is placed in a retired nook, which is said to be a receptacle of rubbish, but which with small expenditure might be made neat and attractive.

IN reference to a remark that the public schools are as usual out of the running in the Cambridge Mathematical Tripos, a correspondent from Harrow writes to the Pall Mall Gazette to offer a reason for the fact. "Schools," he says, "are now divided into two sections—classical side and modern side. Boys on the classical side spend from three to four hours a week on mathematics, and of course have no chance to take honours in that subject. Boys on the modern side who make mathematics their strong point are discouraged from going to Cambridge by the fact that they have learned no Greek. The best of such boys find their way into Woolwich and the Civil Services. Thus the best mathematicians of the public schools are debarred from going to college by an ancient rule of the Universities which makes a smattering of Greek compulsory on all. It is only fair to say that the Cambridge professors and tutors have tried to do away with this piece of bigotry; but, as in so many other intellectual movements, the intelligent teaching body have been outvoted by a swarm of country parsons, who believe that their smattering of bad Greek will preserve our future Tyndals and Huxleys from theological license! There still remains the other reason: the mathematical spirit bloweth where it listeth."

THE Larne Weekly Recorder of Jan. 28 announces the death, on the 25th ult., of Miss Margaret Bailie, Cairncastle, at the wonderful age of one hundred and eleven years. Miss Bailie was born, and spent all her days, in the house in which she died. She occupied the position of a tenant-farmer, as her forefathers had done for generations; and until a few years ago personally superintended the work of her own farm. She was connected with the old Presbyterian Congregation of which Mr. Thomas is now the minister, and of which some of her relatives are respected members.

MANY of our readers will hear with interest the announcement in the Gazette of Tuesday that "the Queen has been pleased to direct letters patent to be passed under the Great Seal of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland for presenting the Rev. Joseph Henry Hutton, B.A., to the Rectory of West Heslerton, in the county and diocese of York, as defined by an Order of Her Majesty in Council, bearing date the 14th day of August, 1879, void by the death of the Rev. Charles William Knyvett, M.A." Mr. Hutton is an old student of Manchester New College, and was formerly Unitarian minister of Octagon Chapel, Norwich, and Upper Brook Street Chapel, Manchester, more recently the successor of the late Rev. Mr. Malleson at Hove School, near Brighton. Mr. Hutton took orders several years ago, and has been for some time past in charge of a parish near Bristol.

ACCORDING to the quarterly return of the Registrar-General, the resident population of the United Kingdom in the middle of last year was estimated at 34,930,035 persons; that of England and Wales at 26,055,406; of Scotland at 3,744,679, and of Ireland at 5,129,950.

MR. OSCAR WILDE lectured at Boston on Tuesday evening to an immense audience. It was announced beforehand that sixty Harvard students would attend dressed in imitation of Mr. Wilde. The audience was largely attracted by this announcement. The students occupied the front seats, wearing dress coats, knee-breeches, flowing wigs, and green neck scarfs, having lilies in their buttonholes and sunflowers in their hands. Mr. Wilde did not wear knee-breeches. He was greeted with applause, which changed to immoderate laughter by the time he reached the desk. After he had spoken for fifteen minutes many went out. Whenever he paused to drink water the audience broke into uproarious applause lasting several minutes. This occurred so often that Mr. Wilde paused, and glared upon the audience until silence was restored. His impressions of Boston are said to be as unfavourable as his opinion of the Atlantic Ocean.

IT is stated that the island at Herm, about three miles distant from Guernsey—a mere islet, considerably less than two square miles in area—has been sold in perpetuity to an English solicitor, the legal representative and agent of two French Roman Catholic priests, who are believed to have purchased it as a settlement for the monastic order of Carthusians. Henceforth, this charming spot in the ocean, visited in the past by many a holiday-maker, and occupied by some two score fishermen and labourers, will become the quiet, undisturbed home of an old religious order.

THE religious census fever has spread to Bournemouth, where there is a population of 17,500. It is not, however, altogether creditable to the town that last Sunday the absentees from Divine worship numbered more than ten thousand. Of the total 12,749 attendances, 7,791 were Church of England, 683 Roman Catholics, and the remainder Nonconformists.

AT a Conservative dinner at Handsworth, on Wednesday, the Rector of the place—who, it seems, is also an Irish landlord—made a violent attack on the Premier. Mr. Gladstone, he declared, in regard to Ireland, had robbed her Church, he was robbing her landlords and loyal citizens, and he had betrayed the men who helped him into place and power. But the crowning offence of the Premier is his recent visit to the Tabernacle. "The last development of this man of mystery was that—accompanied by Herbert, his son—he appeared in Mr. Spurgeon's Tabernacle, sat in Mr. Spurgeon's pew, expressed his high appreciation of the service and sermon, and drank Mr. Spurgeon's health, which was not good, in Mr. Spurgeon's wine, which was very good, and straightway walked home a confirmed Baptist." When will these country clergy learn a little common sense?

WE are glad to see the following paragraph in the Chicago Sunday Times of January 15th, under the quaint heading "Messiah's Annual":—"The Church of the Messiah (the Rev. Brooke Herford's) held its annual meeting last evening in the parlours of the church. The trustees reported a better average attendance and a larger number of pews sold than during the previous year. The receipts were $11,699, and the expenses $11,689. The ladies' association of the church reported a large amount of good accomplished during the year. One of the most beneficent of their enterprises was the establishment of a free kindergarten. The sympathies of the gentlemen of the church had been enlisted, and the school at the corner of Arnold and Twenty-second streets had been a very successful one.

For its maintenance were contributed about $1,100, of which but about $600 was used, leaving a handsome balance. The school was capable of accommodating thirty-six pupils, but many more than that had applied. A resolution was adopted commending the use of the Revised Version of the New Testament in the services of the church, and the meeting adjourned." Our Chicago correspondent, Mr. John Fretwell, from whom we are always glad to hear, writes that the Church is decidedly the most prosperous Unitarian Church West of the River Hudson. The Rev. G. Miln, minister of Robert Collyer's former Church in Chicago, whose sermon on Immortality we printed last week, may be taken as a representative of "advanced Theism," even more advanced than Theodore Parker; and Brooke Herford as a representative of what is often called "Channing Unitarianism."

MR. WALTER LLOYD, whose interesting book on Universal Redemption we have reviewed on another page, was, until recently, a member of Mr. Baldwin Brown's congregation at Brixton. Having adopted Universalist views in regard to the future life, he has gradually found himself drawn into sympathy with Unitarians, and has joined Mr. Worthington's congregation at Effra-road. Mr. Lloyd is a member of the Civil Service, and has occasionally officiated as a lay-preacher both at Newington-green and Effra-road Chapels. Mr. Baldwin Brown has more than once expressed his conviction that there is "no future for Unitarianism." We are strongly inclined to think that if all the members of his and other Independent congregations who are known to hold sentiments very much in accordance with our own were to act as honestly as Mr. Lloyd has acted, the prevailing views as to the future of Unitarianism would be considerably modified.

EVERYONE has now seen or heard of Mr. Burnand's amusing play The Colonel, which ridicules what, ruthlessly degrading a noble word, we are accustomed to speak of as "aestheticism." The Times justly says of it that the mistake Mr. Burnand has made, and all who have preceded or followed him have made, is that he has not sufficiently distinguished between the false and the true—just as our vague use of the word aestheticism does not sufficiently distinguish between the true and single striving after light, and the ignoble vanity of a few foolish people. Whenever a nation first feels the stir and touch of a new life, whether in politics, or religion, or art, or literature, certain follies and extravagances will inevitably go along with, and for a time impede, the movement; especially will they do so in a nation like ours, with no recognised standard, no accepted rule of right and wrong in such matters. But if there be any real vitality in the movement, these parasites will in time decay and drop off, and then, freed from these retarding influences, the true growth will spread and ripen, and its power will be felt and understood. The satirist, if he would be anything more than a general mocker, should make this distinction; for he who "runs a muck at all he meets" is not truly a satirist, but something other, and less. And it is the want of this distinction which a little destroys the effect of Mr. Burnand's work, both on and off the stage, and of others who have worked in the same direction; it has helped to give it, indeed, an effect contrary to the design, for the effect has mainly been that the ridiculous affectations they have desired to lash have assumed so much strength and significance—affectations which without them would long ago have died, as even with them they are now dying.

A WRITER in the New York Independent gives an interesting sketch of a visit to a tobacco manufactory at Richmond, and illustrates the question of the best sort of tobacco by a quotation from a Negro sermon which he heard, which shows that the coloured people prefer the "Golden Leaf":—"The preacher was describing the Heavenly Kingdom: 'My brethren and sistern, you ain't a-gwine to have to pay no ten cents a plug for tobacco there. You kin git jist as much pure Golden Leaf as you wants, and a little more; and you can chaw and chaw and chaw all day long, and it won't cost you a cent.' 'Not a cent!' came exultingly from all parts of the little church." The writer quotes one of the religious melodies, which are never heard, he says, anywhere but in the Virginian factories.

Reviews.

The Hope of the World: an Essay on Universal Redemption. By Walter Lloyd. London: Kegan Paul, Trench, and Co. 1881.

One of the most cheering theological features of the time is the growing acceptance of the doctrine of universal restoration. It is fast superseding the old belief in an elect few and an eternal hell. Not only has this dogma had its day, but it is fast dying out and becoming a superstition of the past. Surely this is matter for congratulation to every mind that desires the welfare of humanity. What an awful burden the doctrine of eternal woe has been to tens of thousands of sensitive hearts and souls! How they have shrunk instinctively from it, yet compelled themselves to accept it on the authority of Church and Creed! It has surrounded with frightful terrors their steps through life, and to the last moment of their existence has been to them an awful mysterious dread looming in the terrible future. It has converted the Gospel message into a sentence of horrible doom to countless millions of the human race. Thank Heaven this superstition has had its day; the spell has lost its former power. What remains of it is but the shadow of the old reality. The spreading knowledge and the growing humane feeling of our day have been too strong for it. It has had to yield and to give place to a brighter and better faith.

We have been led to make these remarks by the book before us, which may be regarded as a sign of the times in relation to this subject. It strikes another blow at the current superstition, and sets forth the reasons for cherishing a bright hope for the future of mankind. It is a carefully written essay, consisting of sixteen chapters, and is pervaded throughout by earnest liberal thought. The author's reflections and observations, as they appear in the course of his work, commend themselves to us as just and reasonable in a high degree. We are thoroughly in accord with him on most points. The higher teaching of Christianity is brought out prominently in his pages. His best spirit animates his mind, and finds expression in his thought. Indirectly he shows conclusively the accord of Liberal Christianity with a pure and noble Theism. The hope of the world is the prospect of its deliverance from its present burden of sin and misery; and that deliverance can come only through the influence of Christ and his Gospel. This idea is elaborated in the book, and the leading points connected with it are ably set forth in the sixteen chapters of the essay.

Having in the first chapter briefly but sufficiently introduced his subject, in the second he sums up the "Gospel of the Lord Jesus:"—

The three most important statements of the Gospel which constitute its good tidings, and which are fraught with comfort and hope for man are these—The Spirituality of religion; the universal love of the Father; the doctrine that in Christ the Father was manifested to the world.

Passages from the Gospels are quoted in illustration of these points, and the author concludes:—

And so we may sum up the Gospel as embracing all spiritual truth under three heads, the triune work of the one God—the Universal Providence, the Universal Mercy, and the Universal Spirit. The providence embraces all his creatures, the mercy is known at present only to the penitent and humble seekers after God, and the power of the Spirit is felt and obeyed by all who are living the Christ-like life. But the providence of God leads men to repentance and repentance leads to spiritual life, and, therefore, the divine purpose of redemption is as boundless as the Eternal Providence.

In the third chapter Mr. Lloyd discusses at greater length the "Gospel according to St. Paul," and aims to show by a brief exhibition of the leading principles of St. Paul's Epistles—

That he believed and taught that the purpose of God in Christ was nothing less than the universal reconciliation of all things to Himself. This was the revelation God had given to Paul; this was the hope which inspired him; this was the truth which filled him with gladness and admiration, and love. It was this which prompted him to call all men to live holy lives; to strike in at once with the design of God, and help forward the grand consummation of all things; it was this which gave him his hatred of spiritual bondage, his contempt for the priesthood and his large sympathy for the Gentile world.

The subsequent chapters discuss the subject under these heads:—Justice and Mercy, Sin, Salvation, the Universal Deliverance, Faith, Hope, Charity, the Outer Darkness, the Wrath to Come, the Judgment, Universalism, the Life to Come.

It will thus be seen that Mr. Lloyd takes his stand distinctly on New Testament ground:—

If we reject the New Testament, he says, there is nothing but a blank; if we receive it, the question we have to ask is, what is the hope it offers? We believe that Christianity has an answer for the questioning of the soul—"What must I do to be saved?"—and that those who reject Christianity are rejecting the true light which has come into the world. It is our duty as Christians to dispel, as far as possible, the darkness with which the ignorance and superstition of our forefathers have surrounded the Gospel. I write for Christians as well as for the world, we are devoted to the cause of one Master, and seek in his name to reconcile the world to God; but I cannot shut my eyes to the fact that the mistakes his followers have made are the cause of the alienation of many who would otherwise, with ourselves also, have been his disciples.

In Christianity, then, according to Mr. Lloyd, is the hope of the world, and Christianity it is which will save the world. But it is not ecclesiastical or sacerdotal or "evangelical" Christianity which will save the world. It is not the Christianity of priesthods or creeds, it is no narrow interpretation of the Gospel, no petty scheme of sectarian theology which will accomplish that great work. All these are inadequate, partial, defective, mistaken, and so far as they have been so they have wrought harm instead of good. Their narrowness, their exclusiveness, their pretentiousness, have been simply mischievous. Their insistence on belief in incredible dogmas has been a huge mistake, and has turned aside from Christian discipleship numbers to whom those dogmas have been utterly repellant. Creeds, dogmas, priesthods—these have been tried, they have had their day, and the result is altogether unsatisfactory. Sin and misery still abound under the very shadow of sectarian chapels and priestly temples. What, then, is the Christianity which will save the world? It is the spirit of love manifested in Christ—the same spirit of love actively shown in every possible endeavour to regenerate, instruct, elevate, and bless mankind.

Christianity (says our author) has planted this divine idea in humanity (that love is the fulfilling of the law), and with it has kindled a divine hope and shed a divine light which must shine brighter and brighter until the perfect day.

Having endeavoured to give a general idea of this book we add one or two passages in further illustration of the author's thought and style:—

Attempts are made to reconcile orthodox notions of future and external punishment with justice and mercy, but such attempts always result in pitiful failures. We must either give up the doctrine of eternal punishment or else our belief in divine mercy and justice. Punishment of an offender is justice, but unending and unalterable punishment would be incompatible with any possible conception of justice, and utterly destructive of every hope of mercy; for it is in the chastened spirit, the amended life, the tendency to better things which follows punishment that the mercy of justice is seen. But where these are not, that is not. For it is easier to believe that the idea of eternal punishment has arisen from the ignorance, the depravity, and the mistakes of the human mind, than to believe, as we must otherwise do, that justice is a mockery, mercy an illusion, hope a deceit, and love a dream.

Again, in the chapter on Salvation, we read:—

Let us leave the next world out of our consideration for a time, and give our attention sympathetically to the misery there is in this world, and we shall soon see the hell in which souls are lying, and the salvation they stand in need of. Consider the impurity, dishonesty, brutality, sensuality, drunkenness, selfishness, avarice, and pride which are burning or crushing all the life and loveliness out of human hearts, making hells of many homes, and the world a pandemonium. These are not mere words; words are nothing; they are quite inadequate to describe what we mean. They are human lives—sensual, selfish, brutal, dishonest lives! Is it not salvation to change these? To make the impure, pure; the drunken, sober; the brutal, gentle; the sensual, holy; the selfish, loving; the avaricious, charitable; the proud, humble? It is salvation to bring peace instead of war, love instead of hatred, sobriety instead of intemperance, justice instead of oppression, kindness instead of cruelty, charity instead of greed—in one word, righteousness instead of sin. This is the work of Christ, the work of the Church, the work of God. . . . It is not difficult to see that the life based upon Christ's doctrine is salvation—salvation to the individual and salvation to the race; a real salvation, very different, it may be, but far more to be desired than the fancied salvation of the theologians. Men are actually in a condition which, apart from all consideration of consequences, is a miserable one—in many cases, awful beyond description. . . . It is salvation to lift men out of this, and to bring them into reconciliation with God. The soul which once opens itself to God receives only blessedness; and all the strain and care and sorrow of life are but training the spirit for sublimer service, and more exalted and enduring joys. This is salvation; this real reconciliation to God, not by an acceptance of doctrines or performance of rites, but in a life of righteousness—the living in harmony with the divine nature.

We commend this book with confidence to the attention of all who wish to acquaint themselves with a rational theology on the subject to which it refers.

The Marriages of the Bonapartes. By the Hon. D. A. Bingham. Two Volumes. Longmans and Co. 1881.

The Napoleon legend is happily stripped of its mythical envelopments, and the recent writings of Lanfrey, Taine, and others enable us to discern clearly the hollowness and essential rottenness of the desolating Imperialism which has been the upas tree of France for the greater part of the century. It is not now the fashion to assume that the first Napoleon was the friend of humanity or the representative of enlightened liberty in antagonism to the old feudalism. And although it is true that the first Empire was an inevitable epoch in the transition from the reign of "terror to Constitutional Republicanism, we now feel that the whole system was so false and rotten, so based upon fraud, deceit, and violence, that we can only regard with wonder the admiration expressed by Liberals of former days for Napoleon, and feel thankful for the utter and we hope final downfall of Imperialism in France.

Captain Bingham, in the Preface to his very pleasantly-written and entertaining work, thinks, with some reason, that the various historians who have dealt with the first Napoleon have hardly paid sufficient attention to the matrimonial alliances by which he hoped to found and consolidate, not only an empire as large as that over which Charlemagne held sway, but several kingdoms in addition. From a very early age Napoleon looked upon marriage as a means of pushing his fortunes in the world, not only his own fortunes but those of all the members of his family, the lesser lights who were to revolve around the central sun. Had he remained much longer on the throne, our author sarcastically remarks, he would have carried out his match-making propensities still further, and would have no doubt revived the old French law, by which, as M. Taine says, "Children of fourteen were bound to march, and widows up to the age of sixty were obliged to re-marry." Born under other conditions, and subjected to other accidents, Napoleon Bonaparte, says our author, instead of becoming a soldier and conqueror like Cæsar, might have made the best and most active matrimonial agent of his epoch. "The business he did in this line in the way of forming family alliances to consolidate his dynasty, and other alliances in the hope of effecting a fusion between the old and the new regimes, was simply enormous, and would have occupied the lifetime of any ordinary mortal, especially when we take into account the thousand intrigues, diplomatic and other, to which many of these unions gave rise." It was in this sense that, as he remarked to Las Casas, even the number of his brothers and sisters was of great service to him by enabling him to multiply his relations and means of influence. Napoleon was fortunate, in a political sense, in both his own marriages. By the first he gained power and influence, especially in aristocratic quarters. By the second he was received into the family of the crowned heads of Europe. The unfortunate Josephine has been the subject of much popular sympathy, but it is impossible to deny that fascinating as she was, she shared in the prevailing corruption of the age. Certainly she was amiable, and Napoleon poses in his relations with her as the very model of an impassioned lover, although one of an imperious order. But her marital and præ-marital infidelities as well as his are matters of history. Notwithstanding many a stirring scene between them Napoleon felt deeply the political necessity which, as he mistakenly thought, compelled the divorce, and although we can never know when he was not acting a part he seems to have sincerely mourned for her loss. On his return from Elba, accompanied by her daughter, Queen Hortense, he paid a long visit to her charming residence, Malmaison, wandered mournfully for some time round the grounds, and stood in mute contemplation before her tomb.

The first volume is chiefly filled with the almost romantic story of Josephine and Napoleon, and the work altogether may well be styled a history of the private life of the Napoleon family, so full is it of interesting, and, in some cases, novel particulars not to be found in the graver histories.

The particulars respecting the father and mother and early life of Napoleon are tolerably familiar to most students of history. The author follows a less beaten track in his account of the marriages of his brothers Joseph, Lucien, Jerome, and Louis, and other members of the family, of whose private life—for the most part very unhappy—full particulars are given. One of the most unfortunate of the marriages was that of Louis and Hortense, the father and mother of Napoleon III. Lucien seems to have been by far the best of the family, and escaped the difficulties in which all the rest were involved by refusing to repudiate his wife, and choosing the happiness of domestic life to a perilous position on one of the thrones filched from their legitimate owners.

Captain Bingham repeats some of the scandal which has been connected with the private life of the late Emperor; but we are glad to see that he pays what we believe to be a deserved tribute to the ex-Empress, as follows:—

It would be ungenerous, in closing this brief notice of the last Imperial marriage, not to pay a tribute of respect to an Empress who has sought an asylum among us, and whose conduct as wife and as mother is entitled to so much admiration and sympathy. Her fair fame was never sullied by even a breath of suspicion. Even those unscrupulous and unmanly enemies who, during the reign of the Commune, lampooned the Empire, could only attack the political conduct of the Empress Eugénie, and accuse her of clericalism, and of having forced on the Franco-German war in the interest of her son. In one sense she resembled Josephine. She aided Napoleon III. in disarming the Faubourg St. Germain, not so much through her relations with the ancient noblesse as through her relations with the spiritual powers. The Church has always been the mainstay of the Legitimist party, and the Church had in the Empress Eugénie one of her most fervent friends. Now and then the Papal Court had to complain of the acts of the Emperor, and the French bishops were goaded into comparing him to Pontius Pilate; but the Empress was always ready to smooth matters down, and to effect a reconciliation between the spiritual and temporal powers. It was difficult for the Legitimists, however they might stand aloof from the Imperial Court, and sulk in their Faubourg or their châteaux, to show open hostility towards a Government which maintained the rights of the Church, and towards a sovereign whose son was the godchild of the Pope.

With this passage we gladly bring our notice to an end. In many respects, the book is not profitable reading, as it is full of scandal, more or less historically credible, respecting those whom the world once regarded as "great" personages. But it is a useful exposure of the heartless immorality and cynical selfishness of Napoleon, and nearly all the members of his family, and will do good as a contribution towards the exposure of a thoroughly artificial, hollow, and corrupt Imperialism.

The Magazines.

Fraser's Magazine has the commencement of a new story by Miss M. Betham-Edwards, entitled "Exchange no Robbery; or Fated by a Jest," an agreeably written tale of German life and sentiment. Mrs. Herbert Martin also contributes a pleasant love story, entitled "Lord of All," the scene laid in a seaside village in Cornwall. There are two political articles—"The Claim of Tenant-Right for British Farmers," in which the Hon. G. C. Brodriek, under the fallacious plea of "freedom of contract," strongly denounces tenant-right as "an agrarian code manifestly based on a Communistic theory"; and "Culture," in the course of which the writer indulges in some Whiggish invective against Mr. Chamberlain on the ground of his Radicalism, and recommends the suspension of individuals rather than "so novel and so sweeping a measure as the clôture." There is only one paper bearing on philosophical and theological questions: this is a discussion of "The Human Ideal," by William Gurney, who criticises the papers entitled "Creeds Old and New," which Mr. Frederick Harrison lately contributed to the Nineteenth Century. "William Ellis and his Work as an Educationist" is a very interesting contribution by Mrs. Fenwick-Miller, of the London School Board, to the biography of one of the most devoted, social and educational reformers of this century, who, born in the first month of 1800, died full of years and honour—not honours, by the way—only last February. The remaining papers all relate to pure literature. They are "John Dryden," an interesting sketch of "Glorious John," by John Dennis; "Robert Southey and Caroline Bowles," an outline of the recently-published correspondence, which adds little to the reputation of Southey, if it does not rather lower it; and "Dr. Sheridan," an amusing sketch of the almost-forgotten friend of Dean Swift, and of the quaint correspondence between the two worthies. The writer—Mr. Stanley Lane-Poole—says of him:—"Tom Sheridan, though he was no poet, could turn out verses like Tom Ingoldsby; he could write letters that match any of Sydney Smith's; and we must search and rummage in Swift's 'Miscellanea' to pick up a few scraps of all this merry humour. He did nothing to make himself live, except being the grandfather of the 'School for Scandal'—but he must have been a delightful fellow to live with. I do not know that we should respect him, but I am sure that we should have loved him." On the whole, this is a number quite above the average.

The Expositor opens with a paper by Dr. Salmon on "The Keynote of the Epistle to the Hebrews." The writer seems to us to overstate the "Paulinism" of the doctrine and language of this Epistle; and instead of bringing out the fine comparison between the lofty spiritualism of Christianity, and the elaborate ceremonialism of the ancient Law, which seems to us the pervading idea of the Epistle, he fastens his attention upon a few isolated texts, and comes to the conclusion that the keynote is "the danger of the disciples falling away, and the terrible penalties which apostasy would entail." We come into a higher arena in the next paper on "The Third Psalm," a fine exposition by the editor, the Rev. S. Cox. The next three articles require no particular comment; they are "Man's Power to Forgive Sins," an exposition of St. Mark ii. 10, by Dr. R. E. Wallis; "The Two Accounts of Our Lord's Infancy," in which the Rev. E. S. Gibson attempts to reconcile what appear to us to be essentially legendary narratives by the ingenious theory that in Matthew we have Joseph's narrative, and in Luke, Mary's; and "Christ and the Angels," a continuation of Professor Robertson Smith's exposition of Hebrews ii. The next article, on "The Second Epistle of St. Peter," will make Bibliolaters stare and gasp if ever they read essays on Biblical Criticism. In a previous article Dr. E. A. Abbott had attempted to prove that the author of this Epistle had read the Antiquities of Josephus; he now shows what is well known to all Biblical students, that he copied the Epistle of St. Jude. "This conclusion," Dr. Abbott says, "will be further confirmed, if we can show that the style of the author throughout is that of a copyist and 'fine writer,' ignorant of ordinary Greek idioms, yet constantly straining after grandiloquent Greek, an affected and artificial style wholly unlike that of the First Epistle of St. Peter, a style so made up of shreds and patches of other men's writings, and so interspersed with obsolete, sonorous, and meaningless words, that it really has no claim to be called a style at all, and resembles nothing so much as the patch-work English of a half-educated Hindoo aping the language of Lord Macaulay and Dr. Johnson with an occasional flavour of Shakespeare." The number is brought to a close with two brief notes on 2 Corinthians viii. 18, and 1 John v. 16, by the Revs. J. E. Denison, and E. H. Sugden.

Good Words continues the two new serial stories, "The Golden Shaft," by Charles Gibbon, and "Lady Jane," a tale by Mrs. Oliphant, characterised by that writer's graceful style and pleasant character-painting. The most interesting contribution this month is unquestionably that entitled "Reminiscences of Carlyle and Leigh Hunt," from the Diary of the late John Hunter of Craigbrook, by Dr. Walter C. Smith, with a portrait of the Diarist. Here is an account of a literary Symposium which reminds us of the noctes canaque Deorum:—

"Carlyle and Hunt were in great force, and came out in the course of the evening in their full strength. They form decided contrasts to each other in almost every respect, and the occasional collisions that took place between them drew out the salient points and characteristic powers of each in the most striking manner possible. I never saw Carlyle in such vigour, and was delighted, even when I most differed from him, with the surging floods of his sonorous eloquence which he poured forth from time to time, illuminated, as they always were, by the coruscations of a splendid fancy, sometimes lurid enough, to be sure, and heated to boiling fervour by the inextinguishable fire of deep emotion that is for ever gnawing his heart and brain. Hunt again was all light and air, glancing gracefully over all topics, and casting the hues of his own temperament on every subject that arose. I do not mean to make any attempt at giving an account of the conversation. That is out of the question in the present instance. It lasted without interruption from five till near twelve o'clock, and embraced the most multifarious subjects. We had the Scottish Kirk, Wordsworth, Petrarch, Burns, Knox and Hume, the Church of England, Dante, heaven and hell, all through our 'glowing hands'; and strange work was made with most of them. I gave some offence to Carlyle, but he recovered from it so swiftly, and redeemed himself so generously, that it heightened my admiration of him. He had been declaiming against Wordsworth, whom he represented as an inferior person to Cowper, adding that from the débris of Robert Burns, a thousand Wordsworths might have been made. We laughed at all this, especially when we found that he had never read, or, at least, had no recollection of 'Laodamia,' and various other things in which Wordsworth's finest powers are exhibited. We next came to Petrarch, whom he crushed to a sapless nothing in his grasp. I stood out a good while on this subject, as did Hunt and Craik. At last Carlyle said—'All I have to say is, that there is one son of Adam who has no sympathy with his weak, washy twaddle about another man's wife. I cast it from me as so much trash, unredeemed by any quality that speaks to my heart and soul. And now you may say whatever you like of him or of me.' I answered hastily—'Then I would say of you that you are to be pitied for wanting a perception which I have, and which I think, and the world in general will think, I am the richer for possessing; and I would just speak of what you have now uttered in these words:—

'Say, canst thou paint a sunbeam to the blind,
Or make him feel a shadow with his mind?'

A slight shade passed over his face at this, and he said—'Well, I admit you are right to think so, whatever I may think of the politeness of your saying it as you have now done.' Hunt interposed to the rescue with, 'Well, that's very good. Carlyle knocks down all our idols with two or three sweeps of his arm, and having so far cleared his way to us, he winds up by knocking down ourselves; and when we cry out against this rough work, he begins to talk of—politeness!' This was followed by a peal of laughter, in which Carlyle joined with all his heart; and then addressed me cordially and kindly—'I believe, after all, you are quite right. I ought to envy you. I have no doubt you have pleasures and feelings manifold from which I am shut out, and have shut out myself, in consequence of the habit I have so long indulged of groping through the sepulchral caverns of our being. I honour and love you for the lesson you have taught me.' This was felt to be very noble. 'There is Carlyle all over,' said Hunt; 'that's what makes us all love him. His darkest speculations always come out to the light by reason of the human heart which he carried along with him. He will at last end in glory and gladness.'

"Towards the conclusion of the evening we had a regular discussion between Carlyle and Hunt, involving the whole merits of their several systems, if I may so call Hunt's fantastic framework of agreeabilities, which Carlyle certainly shattered to pieces with great ease (though without disconcerting Hunt in the slightest degree), in order to substitute his eternal principles of right and wrong, responsibility, awe of the Unseen—the spiritual worship of the soul yearning out of the clay tenement after the infinitely holy and the infinitely beautiful. Hunt's system, I told him, would suit nobody but himself.

"Hunt told us a good story of Lamb. Some one had been talking against eternal punishments and the like, when Lamb turned round on him with 'No; that won't do for me. I can't give up my hell.' This was inimitably characteristic."

Mr. Richard Jefferies, who has attracted so much attention by his articles on country life in the Pall Mall Gazette, contributes a delightful sketch entitled "Out of Doors in February." Under the heading "Sicilian Days," Mr. A. J. C. Hare begins a series of descriptive papers, with several good illustrations. Mrs. C. Garnett describes "The Mountain Homes of the Vaudois," also with effective illustrations; and among the other articles are "Fashion and Physiology," a useful protest against some prevailing fashions in dress, by Dr. Milner Fothergill; "Man and the Gospel," the second of two discourses of a mildly-orthodox character, by the Bishop of Peterborough; and "Light in Darkness," the conclusion of an interesting biographical study, by Mrs. Craig, of F. J. Campbell, the excellent founder of the Royal Normal College for the Blind at Upper Norwood.

The Sunday Review opens with an appropriate tribute by Professor W. H. Corfield to the memory of the late Dean Stanley, a past president of the Sunday Society. Among other articles which deserve attention may be specially mentioned "The Inadequacy of Agnosticism to Satisfy Human Aspirations," by W. Cave Thomas; and "Thoughts About the Work of the Sunday Society," by J. W. Joynt, of Trinity College, Dublin. From the former we take the two following noteworthy paragraphs:—

"Society is threatened on the one hand by religious bigotry, and on the other by Agnosticism, and we scarcely know which is the worst danger of the two. It is for sensible, far-sighted Christians and philosophers to steer a middle course. The Christian must relinquish those dogmas which it is utterly impossible for the rational mind to accept if he would not see the better part, the Immutable Faith, suffer total eclipse. And what would Agnosticism gain by effecting that temporary eclipse but a dead mechanical world, divested of all aspiration and poetry, of all adequate motive to right emprise? It may be all very well for Agnosticism to disport itself in a society protected by Christian influence, which prevents the sense of hopelessness and desolation which would otherwise supervene. How Agnostics and Atheists can consistently disquiet themselves about ambition, reputation, excellence, as mortals do who believe in the distinction between right and wrong, in human responsibility, we are at a loss to guess. The Agnostic makes spasmodic efforts to be cheerful under the influence of what he is pleased to term 'cosmic emotion,' but poetry is not the offspring of Agnosticism, and is only clumsily simulated to cover the weary sense of the nothingness of existence which a one-sided rationalism has forced upon him; poetry is of another creed, and would, as an exotic, entirely disappear from the intellectual domain of the Agnosticism of the future.

"All Rationalists, who are sufficiently rational to be able to comprehend nature under a wider conception than Agnosticism, will never seek to undermine the faith of those who believe in Christianity, but will endeavour to arrive at the better part of the old faith, the Immutable Faith, and to free this from dogmas which have obscured and sullied it—dogmas which were possible of acceptance in a less cultured and less inquiring world. The faith of the past has to be revised for the acceptance of the minds of the present and of the future. It will have to be a revision far more sweeping than that which has recently been effected. Let there be a Free Christian compact, between those who believe more and those who believe less, against utter godlessness, and time shall clear the Immutable Mean of Faith from the wreckage of errors in which it is now entangled and involved."

The Sunday Magazine opens with the second instalment of George Macdonald's new story "Weighed and Found Wanting." There is also a continuation of a new story of New England in the olden time, by Olive M. Birrell, entitled "Justice Warren's Daughter." Our old friend "A.K.H.B." has one of his pleasant Essays, entitled "On the Finding of Nothing," which we sincerely hope will not be understood as applying to his own voluminous works. "Is Mars Habitable?" a question reminding us of the old Plurality of Worlds controversy, is apparently going to be answered in the negative, by E. W. Maunder, F.R.A.S., but we are kept in suspense until a second and concluding article. A pleasing portrait is given of the well-known novelist Hesba Stretton, under the heading "Our Principal Contributors." Among other articles are "The Amaranth," by Dr. Hugh Macmillan; "Sunday Morning on Matheran Hill," by Mrs. Mitchell; and "Sunday Evenings with the Children," by R. H. Smith.

Journal of the National Indian Association contains, among other articles, "Sports and Amusements of the Natives of India," by A. Nundy; the speech of a native judge on "Education in India"; the second part of the interesting tale of Indian life, entitled "The Second Daughter-in-Law," by Pandit Shiva Nath Sastri; and a variety of information respecting the progress of education and social reforms in India.

The Art Magazine is scarcely so interesting this month as usual. A fine engraving of "The Nuremberg Madonna" forms the frontispiece. There is a biographical sketch of "John Bagnold Burgess, A.R.A.," with portrait and engravings of two of his principal works, "Guarding the Hostages," and "The Professor and his Pupil." One of the pleasantest papers is the well-illustrated description of "Alnwick Castle," by the Rev. M. Creighton. There are also articles more or less illustrated on "Book Decoration: Historical and Artistic," by S. Ker-shaw; "Belgian Art," "Colour in Dress," by L. Hemingham; "Antique Spoons," by T. W. Greene; "Nuremberg Art," by W. M. Conway; and "Byways of Book Illustration," with sketches from Baxter's "Pilgrim's Progress," by R. L. Stevenson.

The Day of Rest looks gaudy with its new coloured illustrations and ornamental cover. But even in periodicals intended exclusively for Sunday reading we now have the inevitable serials "The Lord's Pursebearer," by Hesba Stretton. There is also "A Tale of Antwerp," illustrating the principle of charity. Among other articles, some profusely illustrated, are "Christ at Emmaus," "Parable of the Prodigal Son," and "The Snow-drop." We are glad to see that the pleasant "Children's Pages" are retained in even a more attractive form.

Cassell's Family Magazine, like all the others, has its two serial stories, "No Proof," and "Ralph Raeburn's Trusteeship," which are hardly up to the standard of the tales in Good Words or the Sunday Magazine. This magazine, however, is strong in short, bright, and descriptive articles on such subjects as "Real Whitty Jet," "Passages in Girl-life," "A Happy Home Well Ordered," "Under the Crust," a description of the Lancashire Operative; "Our Surnames," and "A Pilgrimage to Harefield," a pleasant sketch of home travel, by the Rev. E. Walford. A new and interesting feature is "The Family Parliament," in which we have debates on two questions, "Are Early Marriages Unthrifty?"—the answer to which depends on the persons concerned, and "Home Life versus Public Life for Girls."

We have also received from Messrs. Cassell:—The Life and Work of St. Paul, Part I. of the handsome illustrated edition of Canon Farrar's well-known work, uniform with the illustrated edition of his "Life of Christ."

New Testament Commentary for English Readers, edited by Bishop Ellicott, Part XXIII.

Cassell's Illustrated Universal History, Part V.
The Family Physician, a Manual of Domestic Medicine, Part XXV.

Literary Notes.

Mr. W. CONGREVE, British Vice-Consul at San Remo, and brother of Dr. Richard Congreve, is printing an Italian version of Comte's "Catechism," as revised by Comte himself, which hitherto has existed only in Dr. Congreve's English translation.

We are not to look for Mr. Browning's fresh volume of "Dramatic Idylls" till the spring. It will be somewhat larger than the two former series were. Five or six Idylls are written—two of some length, the others shorter.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN and Co. will publish immediately a work by the late Lord Justice James upon "The British in India," edited by his daughter, Mrs. Schwabe.

MESSRS. LONGMANS will publish this spring two more volumes of Mr. Lecky's "History of England in the Eighteenth Century," covering the period from 1760 to 1784; and also the first portion of Mr. Froude's "Life of Carlyle," being a history of the first forty years of his life—1795-1835. This latter will also consist of two volumes, and it will contain two portraits and four other illustrations^s etched on steel.

Mr. J. E. CORNISH, of Manchester, has in preparation, to be published by subscription, in demy octavo size, the "Life and Correspondence of Dr. Samuel Hibbert Ware," author of the "Foundations of Manchester." The book will be edited by Mrs. Hibbert Ware, and the impression will be limited to 500 copies. Dr. Hibbert Ware was in frequent correspondence with Sir Walter Scott, Sir David Brewster, Professor Jamieson, and other distinguished literary men, whose letters will appear in the book.

MESSRS. RIVINGTON will shortly publish a volume of "Studies in Philosophy, Ancient and Modern," by Mr. W. L. Courtney, Fellow of New College, Oxford, author of "The Metaphysics of John Stuart Mill." The volume will consist of the nine following essays:—Ancient Idealism—Parmenides; Ancient Hedonism—Epicurus; The Failure of Berkeley's Idealism; A Chapter in the History of the Word "Cause"; The New Psychology; The New Ethics; "Back to Kant"; Kant as Moralist and Logician; and The Hegelian Religion.

The German Spelling Reform Association has just issued a handsome Kalender for this year, and has begun to publish a series of German classics in reform spelling.

A RUMOUR has reached the Academy that the publication may be expected shortly of an important work by Carlyle, hitherto quite unknown, describing a tour in Ireland in 1849.

MR. J. STEVENSON has written an account in the New York Tribune of his researches among the pueblo Indians of New Mexico and Arizona, conducted on behalf of the Smithsonian Institute. He explored a number of rock-built towns, one of which he estimates to have contained a population of 100,000. Dwellings are excavated out of the rock for sixty miles along the face of a winding cliff. Mr. Stevenson has brought back a collection of many thousand objects of pottery.

BLACKLEY.—The Rev. H. T. Basford will retire from the pulpit at Blackley on the last Sunday of July next.

DARLINGTON.—The Rev. F. Haydn Williams, who is leaving for Blackpool, preached farewell sermons to large congregations in the Unitarian Chapel, Darlington, on Sunday last. The rev. gentleman's departure is generally regretted in the district.

POOL.—On Wednesday evening last there was a pleasant meeting of the congregation in order to give a welcome to the Rev. F. Teesdale Reed, who has recently settled here. About fifty were present. Messrs. A. Balston and W. N. Western expressed in a few well chosen words the gratification of the members of the church that Mr. Reed had consented to undertake the pastoral duties in connection with the congregation, and the hope that both minister and people would work harmoniously together for the advancement of those views of religious truth and duty which they so highly valued. Mr. Reed, in acknowledging the kindly words of welcome to which the previous speakers had given expression, spoke of the importance of the step he had taken, and his diffidence in doing so, asking for the kindly consideration of his friends when his efforts seemed to be below par, as well as their appreciation of his more successful work. The congregation think they have every reason to look forward hopefully for the result of Mr. Reed's labours amongst them.

THE LONDON SCHOOL BOARD held its weekly meeting on Thursday, when they discussed a motion to suspend all further expenditure and other proceedings in reference to industrial schools until the result is made known of the promised Royal Commission to inquire into the whole existing industrial school system. The proposition was rejected. Mrs. Surr was re-elected a member of the Industrial Schools Committee.

THE "HOUSTON" DISSECTING MICROSCOPE.—Mr. Browning, of 63, Strand, has favoured us with one of these useful instruments. It is an excellently contrived arrangement, whereby, for five or six shillings, the practical student of botany can obtain all he requires for floral dissections absolutely short of the histological branch of his subject, and consists of a pocket magnifier of two powers, mounted upon a focussing pedestal; the box which contains the whole apparatus serving as a stage whereon the object is placed for examination. There are also forceps, three dissecting needles, and glass and cork object-slips. The lenses are easily removable for use in the field, and indeed the whole thing is so compact that it may be placed in the pocket for outdoor work.

Our Contemporaries.

RELIGIOUS PROGRESS.

The Christian World, in an article on "Philosophical Radicals," speaks as follows of the elder Mill and the Creeds:—

It was hardly surprising that James Mill should have looked upon the ecclesiastical establishment as Antichrist. It was the grand prop of the aristocracy. It trampled on all reform. In the view of its clergy, popular education was the prelude to atheism. James Mill looked at the State Church creeds; to him they seemed to depict the Eternal Creator as a being that rejoiced in the endless torment of those He had called into life. He listened to its preaching; and asked how tirades against Dissent, "converting religion, which ought to be a principle of love, into a principle of hatred," mean views of intellectual independence, and dissertations on dogmatic theology, could promote public morality. It is in connection with the religious position in England to-day that the greatest and most auspicious change has occurred since the time of James Mill. No man looking over the land could now affirm that its religion, taken generally, without regard to State Church or Free Church, is not on the side of humanity, morality, and social improvement. Preaching universally has become less dogmatic, and more practical. Not only in the pulpit, but in the press, by writers of great power and eloquence like Dr. Macdonald, the frightful conception of the Almighty under which our forefathers trembled has been called in question. They seem to have thought of God almost exclusively as Authority; we have been taught to think of Him as Love. And what is the inference that may be drawn from this truly blessed revolution in the thoughts, feelings, practices of religious men? It is that now religion, instead of being a retarding or chilling force in political affairs, may be looked upon as a mighty impulse—a wind, verily, from God—to bear on the ship of reform to new regions of improvement and beneficence.

THE MATHEMATICAL TRIPOS.

The Times, in an article on the Cambridge Mathematical Tripos, speaks of the melancholy interest it arouses:—

It is the last Tripos of the old system; and Mr. Herman, of Trinity, is the last genuine senior wrangler of a series which began in 1747. Mr. Herman may congratulate himself on becoming the master of a curio in the way of distinguished degrees—of the last copy procurable of an honour no longer in circulation. The changes impending have been long decided upon; but they have been delayed to save vested interests. The French Chamber refuses to vote scrutin de liste lest it should discredit the system upon which its members were themselves elected. We should not care to say that Mr. Herman's distinction is discredited by the condemnation of the system under which he has won success. Rather that glory is enhanced by the prospect of extinction. Mr. Herman has, as it were, a certificate to show that he excels his competitors. That is what no future wrangler will be able to say without fear of contradiction. The senior wranglership will, indeed, survive, but only as a shadow of its former self. The old system of examination and of class-lists is well-known. Once upon a time the Cambridge Tripos included every subject taught at Cambridge. Mathematics were only one branch of study in which candidates for this expansive Tripos disputed for the palm. But presently mathematics swallowed up its compeers, as Aaron's serpent swallowed up the serpents of the Egyptians. The Tripos became the Mathematical Tripos. Gradually one subject after another asserted a claim to have a Tripos all to itself. The Classical Tripos soon became an examination rivaling in importance its older brother. But the badge of inferiority survived till quite recent years. Before a student could compete in the Classical Tripos he was required to obtain honour in mathematics. Now that restriction is removed, and the undergraduate, his "Little Go" once passed, can direct his studies in whatever direction his tastes point. The candidates for mathematical honours under the system which produced Mr. Herman and his predecessors presented themselves, at the end of December, after three years and one term of residence, for the first part of the Mathematical Tripos Examination. Those whose names appeared in the preliminary class-list, in alphabetical order, were allowed to compete in the higher examination which took place after a short interval; and their marks ultimately formed part of the grand total. The candidates at the final examination in January appeared in the class-list in three classes, each in order of merit—namely, the wranglers, headed by the magic name which is now to lose most of its glory, senior optimes and junior optimes. The future order of things is to be this:—After nine terms of residence candidates will, in June, offer themselves for the first preliminary examination, similar to the first examination. Those who pass the standard may, a few weeks later, go in for the second part of the Tripos, in which they are examined upon higher subjects, chiefly pure mathematics. The class-list will be in order of merit. A senior wrangler will appear in its front, but he will be a senior wrangler without the stamp of finality. Six months afterwards the third and last examination will be held, in which laurels may be won in each subject or group of subjects separately, without favour or prejudice to the others. But here the examiners will arrange the candidates in classes, and in alphabetical order in each class. Thus the second examination will test the student's general proficiency; and there, it may be predicted, a large number of the examinees will stop short. They will embark on the world forthwith. The more ambitious will work on for a fellowship, or for the pure love of their subject. From the third examination they will emerge as specialists in pure mathematics, astronomy, physics, or heat and electricity. The senior wrangler will thus be the best man up to a certain point; but, even if he figure to advantage in the special examination, he will not necessarily be the best man on the whole. To dispute that honour with him is open to any rival who obtains a first-class in the special examination.

JOSEPH SMITH AT NAUVOO.—II.

BY THE HON. JOSIAH QUINCY.

The clouds had parted when we emerged from the chamber of curiosities, and there was time to see the Temple before dinner. General Smith ordered a capacious carriage, and we drove to that beautiful eminence, bounded on three sides by the Mississippi, which was covered by the holy city of Nauvoo. The curve in the river enclosed a position lovely enough to furnish a site for the Utopian communities of Plato or Sir Thomas More; and here was an orderly city, magnificently laid out, and teeming with activity and enterprise. And all the diligent workers, who had reared these handsome stores and comfortable dwellings, bowed in subjection to the man to whose unexampled absurdities we had listened that morning. Not quite unexampled either. For many years I held a trusteeship which required me to be a frequent visitor at the McLean Asylum for the Insane. I had talked with some of its unhappy inmates, victims of the sad but not uncommon delusion that each had received the appointment of vicegerent of the Deity upon earth. It is well known that such unfortunates, if asked to explain their confinement, have a ready reply: "I am sane. The rest of the world is mad, and the majority is against me." It was like a dream to find one's self moving through a prosperous community, where the repulsive claim of one of these pretenders was respectfully acknowledged. It was said that Prince Hamlet had no need to recover his wits when he was despatched for England, for the demented denizens of that island would never detect his infirmity. If the blasphemous assumptions of Smith seemed like the ravings of a lunatic, he had, at least, brought them to a market where all the people were as mad as he. Near the entrance to the Temple we passed a workman who was labouring upon a huge sun, which he had chiseled from the solid rock. The countenance was of the Negro type, and it was surrounded by the conventional rays.

"General Smith," said the man, looking up from his task, "is this like the face you saw in vision?"

"Very near it," answered the prophet, "except" (this was added with an air of careful connoisseurship that was quite overpowering)—"except that the nose is just a thought too broad."

The Mormon Temple was not fully completed. It was a wonderful structure, altogether indescribable by me. Being, presumably, like something Smith had seen in vision, it certainly cannot be compared to any ecclesiastical building which may be discerned by the natural eyesight. It was built of limestone, and was partially supported by huge monolithic pillars, each costing, said the prophet, three thousand dollars. Then in the basement was the baptistry, which centered in a mighty tank, surrounded by twelve wooden oxen of colossal size.

These animals, we were assured, were temporary. They were to be replaced by stone oxen as fast as they could be made. The Temple, odd and striking as it was, produced no effect that was commensurate with its cost. Perhaps it would have required a genius to have designed anything worthy of that noble site. The city of Nauvoo, with its wide streets sloping gracefully to the farms enclosed on the prairie, seemed to be a better temple to Him who prospers the work of industrious hands than the grotesque structure on the hill, with all its queer carvings of moons and suns. This, however, was by no means the opinion of the man whose fiat had reared the building. In a tone half way between jest and earnest, and which might have been taken for either at the option of the hearer, the prophet put this inquiry: "Is not here one greater than Solomon, who built a Temple with the treasures of his father David, and with the assistance of Hiram, King of Tyre? Joseph Smith has built his Temple with no one to aid him in the work."

On returning to the tavern dinner was served in the kitchen where we had breakfasted. The prophet carved at one end of the board, while some twenty persons, Mormons or travellers (the former mostly coatless), were scattered along its sides. At the close of a substantial meal a message was brought to the effect that the United States Marshal had arrived and wished to speak to Mr. Adams. This officer, as it turned out, wanted my companion's advice about the capture of some criminal, for whom he had a warrant. The matter was one of some difficulty, for, the prophet being absolute in Nauvoo, no man could be arrested or held without his permission. I do not remember what was the outcome of this interview, which was so protracted that it caused Mr. Adams to miss one of the most notable exhibitions of the day.

"General Smith," said Dr. Goforth, when we had adjourned to the green in front of the tavern, "I think Mr. Quincy would like to hear you preach." "Then I shall be happy to do so," was the obliging reply; and, mounting the broad step which led from the house, the prophet promptly addressed a sermon to the little group about him. Our numbers were constantly increased from the passers in the street, and a most attentive audience of more than a hundred persons soon hung upon every word of the speaker. The text was Mark xvi. 15, and the comments, though rambling and disconnected, were delivered with the fluency and fervour of a campaigning orator. The discourse was interrupted several times by the Methodist minister before referred to, who thought it incumbent upon him to question the soundness of certain theological positions maintained by the speaker. One specimen of the sparring which ensued I thought worth setting down. The prophet is asserting that baptism for the remission of sins is essential for salvation. Minister: "Stop! What do you say to the case of the penitent thief?" Prophet: "What do you mean by that?" Minister: "You know our Saviour said to the thief, 'This day shalt thou be with me in Paradise,' which shows he could not have been baptised before his admission." Prophet: "How do you know he wasn't baptised before he became a thief?" At this retort the sort of laugh that is provoked by an unexpected hit ran through the audience; but this demonstration of sympathy was rebuked by a severe look from Smith, who went on to say: "But that is not the true answer. In the original Greek, as this gentleman (turning to me) will inform you, the word that has been translated paradise means simply a place of departed spirits. To that place the penitent thief was conveyed, and there, doubtless he received the baptism necessary for his admission to the heavenly kingdom." The other objections of his antagonist were parried with a similar adroitness, and in about fifteen minutes the prophet concluded a sermon which it was evident that his disciples had heard with the heartiest satisfaction.

In the afternoon we drove to visit the farms upon the prairie which this enterprising people had enclosed and were cultivating with every appearance of success. On returning we stopped in a beautiful grove, where there were seats and a platform for speaking. "When the weather permits," said Smith, "we hold our services in this place; but shall cease to do so when the temple is finished." "I suppose none but Mormon preachers are allowed in Nauvoo," said the Methodist minister who had accompanied our expedition. "On the contrary," replied the prophet, "I shall be very happy to have you address my people next Sunday, and I will ensure you a most attentive congregation." "What? Do you mean that I may say anything I please and that you will make no reply?" "You may certainly say anything you please; but I must reserve the right of adding a word or two, if I judge best. I promise to speak of you in the most respectful manner." As we rode back there was more dispute between the minister and Smith. "Come," said the latter, suddenly slapping his antagonist on the knee, to emphasise the production of a triumphant text, "if you can't argue better than that, you shall say all you want to say to my people and I will promise to hold my tongue, for there's not a Mormon among them who would need my assistance to answer you." Some back thrust was evidently required to pay for this; and the minister, soon after, having occasion to allude to some erroneous doctrine, which I forget, suddenly exclaimed, "Why I told my congregation the other Sunday that they might as well believe Joe Smith as such theology as that." "Did you say Joe Smith in a sermon?" inquired the person to whom the title had been applied. "Of course I did. Why not?" The prophet's reply was given with a quiet superiority that was overwhelming: "Considering only the day and the place it would have been more respectful to have said Lieutenant-General Joseph Smith." Clearly the worthy minister was no match for the head of the Mormon Church.

I have before me some relics of my visit to Nauvoo. Here is the Book of Mormon, bearing the autograph which its alleged discoverer and translator wrote, at my request; and here are some letters addressed to the same personage, which I came by strangely enough. I took them from a public basket of waste-paper, which was placed for the service of the inmates of the tavern. Three of these abandoned epistles I asked leave to keep as memorials of my visit, and no objection was made to my doing so. The most interesting of these letters is dated "Manchester, Aug. 29th, 1842," and comes from an English convert to Mormonism. The man writes four pages of gilt-edged paper to his "beloved brother in the Lord," and sends him by the favour of Elder Snider the following presents:—"A hat, a black satin stock with front, and a brooch." He would fain join the prophet in Nauvoo; but the way is blocked by that not unheard-of obstacle, a mother-in-law, and until this excellent lady "falls asleep" the disciple must deny his eyes the sight of the master's face. The account of himself given by this correspondent shows with what pathetic sincerity the divine commission of Smith was accepted by a class of men which would seem to be intellectually superior to so miserable a delusion. Suppressing the name of the writer, I shall give a portion of this letter, as it furnishes food for reflection and shows that the secret of the Mormon prophet is not to be fathomed at a glance:—

"I take the liberty of writing a few lines, being assured that you are a man of God and a prophet of the Most High, not only from testimony given by the brethren, but the Spirit itself beareth witness. It is true that mine eyes have not seen and mine ears heard you; but the testimony I have received shows plainly that God does reveal by his spirit things that the natural man has not seen by his natural eyes. You may, perhaps, wonder who the individual is that has written this letter. I will tell you, in a few words: My father died about twenty-four years since, leaving my mother a widow, with seven children. . . . I remember her teachings well, which were these: Fear God, be strictly honest, and speak the truth. I remember, when about three or four years old, being with her in a shop. I saw a pin on the floor. I picked it up and gave it to her. She told me to give it to the shopman, with a sharp reprimand, showing me that it was a sin to take even a pin. The remembrance of this slight circumstance has followed me from that time to the present. [An account of the writer's conversion to Mormonism follows, after which he goes on thus.] Previously to joining this Church, I was a singer in the Church of England, had eight pounds a year, and a good situation in the week-time at a retail hat shop. My wife's brother told me I was robbing my children of their bread in giving up the eight pounds. I told him I was not dependent on that for bread, and said unto him the Lord could make up the difference. He laughed at me; but, Beloved Brother, in about one month from the time I left the Church of England my master raised my wages four shillings a week (which was about one shilling per week more than that just sacrificed), and this has continued on ever since, which is now two years this month, for which I thank the Lord together with many other mercies."

I have quoted enough to show what really good material Smith managed to draw into his net. Were such fish to be caught with Spaulding's tedious romance and a puerile fable of undecipherable gold plates and gigantic spectacles? Not these cheap and wretched properties, but some mastering force of the man who handled them, inspired the devoted missionaries who worked such wonders. The remaining letters, both written a year previous to my visit, came from a certain Chicago attorney, who seems to have been the personal friend as well as the legal adviser of the prophet. With the legal advice come warnings of plots which enemies are preparing and of the probability that a seizure of his person by secret ambush is contemplated. "They hate you," writes this friendly lawyer, "because they have done evil unto you. My advice to you is not to sleep in your house; but to have some place to sleep strongly guarded by your own friends, so that you can resist any sudden attempt that might be made to kidnap you in the night. When the Missourians come on this side and burn houses, depend upon it they will not hesitate to make the attempt to carry you away by force. Let me again caution you to be every moment upon your guard." The man to whom this letter was addressed had long been familiar with perils. For fourteen years he was surrounded by vindictive enemies, who lost no opportunity to harass him. He was in danger even when we saw him at the summit of his prosperity, and he was soon to seal his testimony, or, if you will, to expiate his imposture by death at the hands of dastardly assassins. If these letters go little way toward interpreting the man, they suggest that any hasty interpretation of him is inadequate.

I should not say quite all that struck me about Smith if I did not mention that he seemed to have a keen sense of the humorous aspects of his position. "It seems to me, General," I said, as he was driving us to the river, about sunset, "that you have too much power to be safely trusted to one man." "In your hands, or that of any other person," was the reply, "so much power would, no doubt, be dangerous. I am the only man in the world whom it would be safe to trust with it. Remember, I am a prophet!" The last five words were spoken in a rich, comical aside, as if in hearty recognition of the ridiculous sound they might have in the ears of a Gentile. I asked him to test his powers by naming the successful candidate in the approaching presidential election. "Well, I will prophesy that John Tyler will not be the next President, for some things are possible and some things are probable; but Tyler's election is neither the one nor the other." We then went on to talk of politics. Smith recognised the curse and iniquity of slavery, though he opposed the methods of the Abolitionists. His plan was for the nation to pay for the slaves from the sale of the public lands. "Congress," he said, "should be compelled to take this course by petitions from all parts of the country; but the petitioners must disclaim all alliance with those who would disturb the rights of property recognised by the Constitution and foment insurrection." It may be worth while to remark that Smith's plan was publicly advocated, eleven years later, by one who has mixed so much practical shrewdness with his lofty philosophy. In 1855, when men's minds had been moved to their depths on the question of slavery, Mr. Ralph Waldo Emerson declared that it should be met in accordance "with the interest of the South, and with the settled conscience of the North. It is not really a great task, a great fight for this country to accomplish to buy that property of the planter, as the British nation bought the West Indian slaves." He further says that the "United States will be brought to give every inch of their public lands for a purpose like this." We who can look back upon the terrible cost of the fratricidal war which put an end to slavery now say that such a solution of the difficulty would have been worthy a Christian statesman. But if the retired scholar was in advance of his time when he advocated this disposition of the public property in 1855, what shall we say of the political and religious leader who had committed himself in print, as well as in conversation, to the same course in 1844? If the atmosphere of men's opinions was stirred by such a proposition when war-clouds were discernible in the sky, was it not a statesmanlike word eleven years earlier, when the heavens looked tranquil and beneficent?

General Smith proceeded to unfold still further his views upon politics. He denounced the Missouri Compromise as an unjustifiable concession for the benefit of slavery. It was Henry Clay's bid for the presidency. Dr. Goforth might have spared himself the trouble of coming to Nauvoo to electioneer for a duelist who would fire at John Randolph, but was not brave enough to protect the saints in their rights as American citizens. Clay had told his people to go to the wilds of Oregon and set up a government of their own. Oh! yes, the saints might go into the wilderness and obtain justice of the Indians which imbecile, time-serving politicians would not give them in the land of freedom and equality. The prophet then talked of the details of government. He thought that the number of members admitted to the Lower House of the National Legislature should be reduced. A crowd only darkened counsel and impeded business. A member to every half million of population would be ample. The powers of the President should be increased. He should have authority to put down rebellion in a state, without waiting for the request of any governor; for it might happen that the governor himself would be the leader of the rebels. It is needless to remark how later events showed the executive weakness that Smith pointed out—a weakness which cost thousands of valuable lives and millions of treasure; but the man mingled Utopian fallacies with his shrewd suggestions. He talked as from a strong mind utterly unlightened by the teachings of history. Finally, he told us what he would do, were he President of the United States, and went on to mention that he might one day so hold the balance between parties as to render his election to that office by no means unlikely.

Who can wonder that the chair of the National Executive had its place among the visions of this self-reliant man? He had already traversed the roughest part of the way to that coveted position. Born in the lowest ranks of poverty, without book-learning and with the homeliest of all human names, he had made himself at the age of thirty-nine a power upon earth. Of the multitudinous family of Smith, from Adam down (Adam of the "Wealth of Nations," I mean), none had so won human hearts and shaped human lives as this Joseph. His influence, whether for good or for evil, is potent today and the end is not yet.

I have endeavoured to give the details of my visit to the Mormon prophet with absolute accuracy. If the reader does not know what to make of Joseph Smith, I cannot help him out of the difficulty. I, myself, stand helpless before the puzzle.

ECCLIASTICAL QUESTIONS IN THE COMING SESSION.—We anticipate that there will be an increased amount of time bestowed upon ecclesiastical questions, which are likely to be pressed from different quarters, and to lead to discussions of a very instructive, if not of a directly practical character. In the first place, there is the motion in favour of the disestablishment of the Scottish Church, of which notice has been given by Mr. Peddie, which has, to a considerable extent, had its intended effect—in exciting discussion in Scotland, and preparing the way for decisive electoral action. Then a "Cemeteries Bill" will be brought in by Mr. Richard, and a Bill for amending the law relating to Nonconformist marriages will also be introduced. Should the Bill for reforming the administration of charities in the City of London be again brought in, it is intended to raise the question whether the now useless ecclesiastical charities shall be applied to new ecclesiastical purposes. Probably the question of clerical headships and fellowships in the colleges of Oxford and Cambridge will be settled for a long period to come. We hope that there will also be commenced a movement for the abolition of ecclesiastical tests in training colleges mainly supported at the national expense. Then there are the remaining ecclesiastical grants in the colonies to be dealt with; but if Lord Kimberley continues to move forward on the lines he has laid in the cases of Ceylon and the Straits Settlement, there will not be much left to be effected by a Parliamentary motion. The Church Reformers also are likely to be far more active this year than for some years past, and they will, to some extent, aid the Liberators.—The Liberator.

EPPS'S COCOA.—GRATEFUL AND COMFORTING.—"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately-flavoured beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. Hundreds of subtle maladies are floating around us ready to attack wherever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.—Made simply with boiling water or milk. Sold only in Packets labelled—"JAMES EPPS & CO. Homoeopathic Chemists, London." Also makers of Epps's Chocolate Essence for afternoon use.

THE HOME MISSIONARY BOARD.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—The letter signed "Verax," which appeared in the Inquirer of the 28th ult., cannot but have caused pain to many readers, because it reveals feelings of disappointment, such as a minister unable to obtain a pulpit is naturally likely to display. It is a matter to be deplored that some of the old students of the Board are not yet settled with pastoral charges. But how the Board can be reasonably blamed for such a state of things I cannot see. It does its utmost for its students when it provides them with the best equipment in its power. The use to which they put that equipment depends upon themselves. In all theological colleges men are met with who have mistaken their vocation, and who, for want of pulpit ability, or for some other reason, are not likely to become acceptable ministers. In the twenty-seven years during which it has been in existence such cases have not been numerous among ex-students of the Board. That there should be some comparative failure is, however, inevitable. But men who do not prove to be acceptable to settled congregations may do good service as ministers-at-large. A difficulty, I know, is often experienced in filling the pulpits of mission stations, possibly because ministers, possessed of the higher culture now bestowed upon the students of the Board, look for pulpits elsewhere rather than to such work. And yet than such work none is nobler; and to prepare for such work the Board was established. At the present time two of our most important mission stations are vacant—one at Birmingham, by the decease of the Rev. J. Wilson; and one at Liverpool, by the resignation of the Rev. H. S. Solly. The friends of the Board would delight to see the duties of such a work undertaken by old students of theirs who would thereby follow the examples of the Rev. J. Harrop and the Rev. B. Walker in Manchester; the Rev. W. Matthews in Bristol, and others similarly occupied, though not known by the title of domestic missionaries. So long, however, as mission stations remain vacant, ex-students of the Board cannot say, with reason, that there is not ministerial work for them to do.

WILLIAM CROKE SQUIER.

[It is worth adding that there are but six old students of the Board, out of the whole number of eighty-six, who are not actively engaged in ministerial work—an unusually small proportion for any profession.—Ed. of Inq.]

THE NAMES "UNITARIAN" AND "SOCINIAN."

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—I have not a copy of the report of my sermon referred to by Mr. Gordon, nor of the Inquirer containing the extract from it. I can therefore only speak from recollection; but, so far as I remember, the report gave fairly the substance of what I said—allowing always for the omission of a few qualifying expressions which would impart a somewhat less positive tone to my statement. The sermon was written many years ago, and when delivered last September it did not occur to me to question or to verify the particular sentence under notice. It would have been well, however, to omit the few words which are open to exception, for I was not unaware of the uncertainty respecting the origin of the term Unitarian. To this uncertainty I alluded, observing also that in its earliest use the term was half political and half theological, the latter import remaining, and predominating in later times. This was mainly founded upon the introduction to the Racovian Catechism, which, however, as Mr. Gordon shows, is not to be relied upon. I very readily accept his account, being aware that he has studied the subject with a degree of minuteness and care to which I can make no claim.

It was only, I think, for the sake of explanation to a popular audience that I mentioned that Transylvania is now a province of the Austrian empire, and the words "provincial parliament" were only introduced cursorily in explanation of the word "Diet." I also spoke, not simply of a "resolution," but of a resolution which became a "law." As to Priestley and Channing being rightly or wrongly termed Socinians, all that I meant to convey was this—that they would not have admitted that they were so, in the sense of having learned their Christianity from Socinus, but would have claimed to be disciples only of Christ. Broadly speaking, again, the fact that the Socinians admitted the worship of Christ, and that the modern Trinitarian does the same, appears to me to expose the latter to the imputation of being a Socinian in one of the most important aspects of this term. Christ was not worshipped by the Socinian for himself, for his own sake, but as the representative, the "human agent" of the Deity; that is, it was the Deity in him or through him which was really worshipped. And the same may be said of the Trinitarian. He worships Christ, not simply as a man, but as a God-man, the two combined, and for the sake of the Deity of whose manifestation the man was only the human agent. I did not imply nor say that Trinitarian worship is idolatrous. I only said that to worship Christ would to the modern Unitarian be idolatrous; and to this extent surely he is not a Socinian.

THE IRISH QUESTION.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—My letter of the 14th ult. was substantially an endorsement of Mr. Chamberlain's defence of Irish Coercion. In corroboration of the necessity of such measures, I instanced the lawlessness, tyranny, and intimidation of the Land League and its allies in the case of the Rev. Dr. Webster, of Cork. What, then, was my surprise on reading Mr. J. Orr's letter in reply, in your impression of last week, no allusion either to the masterly defence or to the locally attested instance? In lieu of this "regular" mode of paper warfare, Mr. Orr enters on a sort of flighty, guerilla raid or rail against "W.W." who, though he has lived in Ireland thirty years, is only an Englishman, and "moving in a select but limited circle; his knowledge is evidently confined to Cork politics," and "it is very evident that he can throw but little light on the question he presumes to treat." He, then, in his irregular route (route I suppose he thinks it) takes up a letter of "W.W.'s," which appeared in your journal more than a year ago, and hangs thereon a high-flown panegyric on the Irish priesthood—a topic, at this time and in this country, somewhat dangerous to those who cannot keep close, like Mr. Orr, to their side of the hedge? I shall, therefore, as I cannot recant, remain silent. What I have written, I have written.

Mr. Orr, however, does ask two or three questions strictly pertinent to the point in dispute, e.g., whether the founder (of the League) "denounced such crimes?" 2. "When their growth took place," &c. To these questions Mr. Orr will find a much abler reply than he would willingly take from a mere Cork politician, in the "Defence," by the Right Hon. J. Chamberlain, the whole of which I affectionately advise Mr. Orr to read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest, before he again puts pen to paper, or even opens his lips on the subject to his parish priest. He will find it in the Truthseeker for this month, pages 19-21, price 3d. Perhaps, Mr. Editor, you will allow me to quote a few passages from the "Defence," which some of your readers may not have seen:—

"The avowed objects of the League—the examination into a system—the reform of an unjust law—were objects approved by the Government which had pledged itself to effect them if it could. But the means by which these objects were sought to be advanced—cruelty to animals, arson, outrage, even assassination—are not, in the opinion of any Liberal Ministry, permissible instruments for effecting political reform. . . . The Land League was not suppressed—and, in fact, I doubt if it could have been legally suppressed—until the leaders issued the disgraceful 'no rent' manifesto. . . . Mr. Parnell, who had originally recommended Griffith's valuation as a fair rent, now urged the tenants to be content with nothing higher than 'Prairie value.' He should not get more for the land than its value when the flood left it."

Mr. Healy, M.P., said what they wanted was that no landlord should be able to put a penny of rent upon a tenant, and the Land League would never cease from agitation till this question was settled on that permanent and certain basis. . . . It cannot be borne that their (the farmers') goodwill, and liberty of action shall be over-riden and made of no effect by the teachings and acts of those who have never concealed their sinister desire to make reconciliation impossible. These men used the discontent arising from unjust laws to promote their objects. So long as the grievance existed it was difficult to decide how far they were the leaders of a legitimate agitation for reform, and how far they were only promoters of anarchy and revolution. When the grievance was removed, the unwavering object was the only one remaining, and, in my opinion, it became not only justifiable, but imperative, to use promptly and vigorously the exceptional powers which Parliament had placed at the disposal of the Government, in order to prevent the success of such objects by such means."

What the "sinister" object above alluded to was has inadvertently cropped out—sometimes in public, oftener in private—even from the sacred lips so indiscriminately belauded by Mr. Orr. As a first step to the desiderated goal the landlords were to be made so uncomfortable that they would be rejoiced to sell out—the Government so harassed, and Ireland so expensive to keep in order, or rather disorder, that Parliament would find out that the cheapest and easiest way would be to advance some millions as a loan to the tenants to purchase the land. This little step taken, and the present tenants secured in their tenure, subject to a small percentage on the Government loan, the new, but numerous little landlords (ninety-five per cent.) being Catholics, the Isle of Saints would find itself a good day's march nearer Rome. It is needless to indicate the next move.

THE BRADLAUGH CASE.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—The time is rapidly approaching when this matter must again come before us. It is not very inviting, but we can hardly avoid discussing it. It is easy to throw about strong epithets, to denounce "bigotry," and talk wildly with regard to the question. Not a little of this kind of thing has been indulged in by some of the "friends of freedom." It is well, however, to try to bear in mind the real question that will be before the House. Party feeling has got so mixed up with it, and there is so much prejudice surrounding it, or otherwise I doubt whether at least one aspect of it would have presented any difficulty. I refer to that so ably adverted to by your contemporary the Christian World, i.e., ought an avowed atheist like Mr. Bradlaugh be permitted to take his seat before the disability has been removed by Bill?

We hear a good deal of the wrong done to Northampton and its member by keeping the latter out of the House. Who, however, keeps him out? Not the House at all; but the law. For who can pretend that there is not a theistic test? Nobody prevents Mr. Bradlaugh from taking the oath; he simply cannot, and has ostentatiously proclaimed to the House that he cannot take it; for has not Mr. Gladstone expressly said that going through the form of the oath is not taking it? Our Courts of Justice are happily above suspicion of party feeling, and everyone must know that Mr. Bradlaugh would not be permitted to make a mockery of the oath in one of these.

Even if a vote of the House permit him to go through the form, would this settle the question? It would be very presumptuous, as your contemporary points out, to say that it would. But, be that as it may, of one thing we may be certain: we should hear no more of the proposed Bill of relief, the only remedy. And this result would be reached—Mr. Bradlaugh would be admitted, and Mr. Holyoake excluded. Any settlement more unfortunate could not be brought about.

We need not spend much sympathy upon either Northampton or Mr. Bradlaugh. The constituency, as Greenwich when it returned the Jew, Alderman Salomon, knew that the law would stand in the way of the member's entrance, and in the latter case member and constituency waited and agitated, and eventually brought down the barrier, in a constitutional way. And bad laws are only got rid of by being repealed. The alderman did not collect a mob in Trafalgar-square, and then go down to the House and expect to be seated by force. That at any rate has not been the English method of progress, and surely we may all hope it never will be. Whether Mr. Bradlaugh will this time go down to the House with the men whom Mrs. Besant advised to learn their drill we have yet to be informed.

I do not dwell upon the ethical aspects of the case. Why need I enforce the lesson so admirably taught us by Mr. Holyoake, who tells us that he could not, and therefore, would not take the oath. I am bound to add that I have not a little contempt for much of the flabby sort of liberalism that has been talked and written over this matter. It means, if anything at all, that we are quite wrong in our denunciations, often so freely indulged in, of the Broad Church party; and that those of us who do not object to the theory of a National Church are as mistaken in keeping outside. All this it means, and a great deal more, that is utterly mischievous and degrading.

A "LIFE of Klopstock," by Herr Franz Müncker, is announced for publication this coming spring.

Religious Intelligence.

HUNSLET, NEAR LEEDS.—The annual meeting of the East Cheshire Christian Union was held at Staleybridge on Saturday last. The business meeting included reports from the assisted congregations. Divine service was conducted by the Rev. J. Freeston, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. James Black, M.A. After tea a public meeting was held under the presidency of A. Aspland, Esq. Addresses were delivered by ministers of the district, and by the Rev. Henry Ierson, M.A., and Mr. Lindsey Aspland, LL.D., who were a deputation from the British and Foreign Association.

ROCHDALE.—On Sunday week an advertised lecture, "Is there a God?" by the Rev. T. Carter, drew an unusually large congregation to Blackwater-street Unitarian Church, including not only a few Churchmen and members of various Nonconformist Chapels, but many who seldom attend religious services. The church was completely packed, every standing-place in aisles, chancel, and vestry being crowded. The lecture, which occupied nearly an hour in delivery, was listened to with the closest attention and interest, and must have led the minds of the audience to a lofty and spiritual conception of the subject. Great satisfaction was expressed at the way in which the lecturer treated his theme. In addition to the crowded congregation there were between two and three hundred persons who had to go away disappointed in not being able to gain admittance. The lecture was redelivered last Sunday evening. After the lecture Mr. Carter announced that he would answer any questions at the close of the service on the subject of the lecture. Some sixty to seventy persons availed themselves of this offer, and until nine o'clock a very brisk and even-tempered discussion ensued. Mr. Carter answered readily and courteously the many varied questions. As one result of this discussion Mr. Carter was asked to lecture on the Bible, which he consented to do, and as he was informed that the Secularists would on the next Sunday be engaged at Bury and Oldham, he, by request, deferred this lecture until Sunday evening, Feb. 5.

STOURBRIDGE: PROVIDENT SOCIETY.—The annual meeting in connection with this ancient society was held at the Wollaston-road Schools on Monday, the 16th ult. The meeting for the transaction of business (at which Mr. Charles Cochrane presided) was held at four o'clock. The reports and statements read by the Secretary, Mr. Job T. Short, showed that the receipts for the past year were £246 19s. 3½d., and that the expenditure included £98 16s. for sickness, old age, and death, that there was a balance in hand of £95 10s. 7d., and that the average amount per member was £42 9s. 4d. The invested funds amount to £2,510 17s. 9½d., cost price, now valued at £2,944 2s. 4½d. The assets and liabilities of the society have been valued as required by Act of Parliament, and the report of the valuer is of the most satisfactory character. The report and statement of accounts as read by the secretary were unanimously adopted. Thanks were voted to Mr. Benjamin Shakespeare, treasurer, and to Mr. Job T. Short, secretary, and both gentlemen were unanimously re-elected to the same offices for the ensuing year. A committee and auditors were chosen, and two candidates for membership, a son of Mr. Thos. Guest and a son of Mr. Philip Drewry, were balloted for and admitted; and a very cordial vote of thanks to the chairman closed the business meeting. A social meeting of the members and friends was held at six o'clock, when over one hundred and thirty persons partook of a substantial tea. After tea the Rev. D. Maginnis was called to the chair, and spoke at some length of the history of the society, of its principal benefactors, and of the benefits it confers on its members for a very small subscription. The Revs. A. W. Worthington and Lindsey Taplin also spoke. Thanks were voted to the ladies for presiding at the trays. On the motion of Mr. Short, thanks were voted to the chairman, with earnest-wishes, heartily endorsed by the meeting, for his speedy recovery to good health. Music, vocal and instrumental, followed, contributed by several members of the congregation, and a very enjoyable evening was brought to a close by a quadrille.

EAST CHESHIRE CHRISTIAN UNION.—The annual meeting of this Union was held on Sunday last at Staleybridge. Lunch was served in the school room before two o'clock, after which the business meeting was held, the Rev. Joseph Freeston presiding. The minutes of the last annual meeting having been read and passed, the Rev. P. M. Higginson read the Secretaries' report, which was not altogether favourable. In the absence of the Rev. H. E. Dowson, Mr. Hig-ginson read the treasurer's account, which showed receipts amounting to £467 15s. 6d. and an expenditure, including a balance of £23 10s. 9d. owing to the treasurer at the end of the year, of £529 1s. 1½d., so that the present balance owing to the treasurer is £61 6s. 5d. The reports were passed and ordered to be printed, on the motion of Mr. Cottrell, seconded by the Rev. John Russell. On the motion of Mr. John Jackson, seconded by the Rev. G. H. Vance, B.D., the Rev. P. M. Higginson was appointed secretary, and the Rev. H. E. Dowson treasurer, and on the motion of Mr. E. B. Broadrick, seconded by the Rev. E. Turland, the simultaneous collections were agreed to be taken on the second Sunday in March. At half-past three service was held in the chapel in Canal-street, the devotional service being conducted by the Rev. J. Freeston, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. James Black, M.A. The evening meeting was held in the Unitarian church, Canal-street, at six o'clock. Mr. A. Aspland, J.P., occupied the chair, and was supported by the Rev. Henry Ierson, M.A., and Mr. Lindsey Aspland, LL.D., London, who came as a deputation from the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. We are compelled to postpone a full report until next week.

ROTHERHAM.—On Thursday evening, January 26, a congregational meeting was held in the old chapel. There were upwards of 150 persons present, under the presidency of the Rev. W. Blazeby, B.A. In his opening remarks the Chairman gave a hearty welcome to all present, including any friends from other churches. In alluding to their congregational "stock-taking," he was gratified to be able to say that they had progressed well in their new church. They had made the new edifice entirely free, and found the new offertory exceeded the old pew rents. The congregation, too, had increased considerably. It was still necessary for them to have some membership, and this was provided for by an enrolment of names, with the payment annually of a shilling per member. This enrolment was understood to imply attendance at the church, and a general concurrence in the form of worship and the pulpit ministrations. They had no close trust and no confined theological creed. As Unitarian Christians they enjoyed an exceptionally free church position, and were agreed to worship together the one true God, the Father, in the spirit of Christ. He could not say that their body had multiplied equally with other denominations, but then it had always required great courage to avow unpopular opinions. Even in 1787 Dr. Priestley had to deplore that the great Newton, though a Unitarian, had not the courage to declare himself such, and act accordingly. He (Mr. Blazeby) hoped his hearers would, at any rate, have the courage of their convictions, and act true to their principles. Mr. Councillor Leggoe, the treasurer, said that although the expenses of the church were double those of the old chapel, yet owing in a great measure to their minister's ingenuity and to the choir, who had given a service of song a short time ago, they were almost free from debt—(cheers).—Mr. John Hill, the secretary of the congregation, heartily welcomed the Sheffield friend. The Rev. Eli Fay rejoiced to hear of the prosperity of the cause at Rotherham. The greater their prosperity the stronger would be the congratulations which they would receive from the minister and congregation of the Upper Chapel.—Mr. Councillor Walker offered a hearty welcome on behalf of the congregation to the ministers who had recently settled in the district.—The Rev. C. H. Osler, Uppertorpo, replied, and said he was glad to have come into a district where neighbouring congregations, as those of Sheffield and Rotherham, were united in such close friendly terms. Mr. Robert Marsden, of Sheffield (one of the trustees), thought Unitarianism had done much in the neighbourhood to liberalise both politics and religion. This was the greatest work that Unitarians were doing. Mr. Councillor Bramley (Sheffield), Mr. C. Woollen (Sheffield), and others followed, and the proceedings closed with the usual votes of thanks.

LEICESTER.—The annual gathering of the members of the Great Meeting congregation was held on Wednesday, Jan. 25, in the rooms adjoining the chapel. The upper hall was beautifully decorated for the occasion, with evergreens, coloured lanterns, flags, &c. On the walls there was a collection of large photographs, and, on numerous tables, various works of art, including some clever water colour drawings, and a number of nice ferns and flowers. The reports that were read spoke of the various institutions connected with the congregation as being in a very healthy condition and as doing good work. The various resolutions were spoken to by Mr. E.

Clephan, Alderman Paget, Alderman Kempson Councillor Else, Mr. Fielding Johnson, J.P., Mr. E. F. Cooper, the Rev. J. P. Hopps, and others. The meeting was probably the largest of the kind ever held, and was felt to be in every way a most successful, social, and friendly one.

"THE AVERAGE PREACHER."

STAMFORD-STREET CHAPEL.

Under the heading "The Average Preacher" the Christian World is publishing a series of articles by "A Promiscuous Hearer," describing visits to average churches of different denominations. Last week a Unitarian church was visited, with the following results:—

The recent statistics of attendance at religious worship—from which, no doubt, many false and hasty inferences have been drawn—have shown, at any rate, that, judged by this method, the Unitarians are a very "feeble folk" numerically. It was found, I believe, that the entire number of persons attending all the Unitarian chapels in London upon a certain fine Sunday morning could have been held twice over in Mr. Spurgeon's Tabernacle. No doubt a Unitarian might fairly urge—although, possibly, modesty would prevent him from doing so—that heads must be weighed as well as counted. It is certain that the Unitarian body has always exercised an influence and commanded an attention singularly out of proportion to its actual numbers. It has had, and still has, the advantage of the adhesion of a few men of exceptional ability, and in some cases of rare genius, of whom the world has been compelled to take note, and who have been recognised by all sections of the Church as great, if in some points mistaken, religious teachers. Still, it must be admitted, Unitarianism does not secure the popular ear, or seem to make much impression upon the popular heart. To go into all the reasons for this would lead me into discussions with which for the present I have nothing to do. I may remark, however, that one reason probably is that "the average preacher"—the man of the rank and file—of such a community is very apt to be merely a fac-simile, more less imperfect, of its few great men; the ordinary voice which makes itself heard from this prophetic standpoint is but an echo—often a feeble echo—of the few specially skilful voices which, perhaps from their rare quality rather than from the distinctive substance of the message delivered by them, command interested and even reverential attention.

Some such thoughts as these were passing through my mind as I listened, on Sunday evening, to a Unitarian minister, who might, I suppose, be fairly regarded as of the average type. The chapel was one of those odd structures—architecturally a cross between Paganism and Christianity—which are to be found occasionally in connection with the worship of all denominations, which date as far back as that period of the Georgian era when anything or anybody was nothing or nobody if not classical. In short, it was a sort of Greek temple; but, alas! a Greek temple in a London atmosphere has, at the best, a poor time of it. And when its interior walls and pillars are constructed of or covered over with common plaster, rudely washed with a yellowish-drab colouring, and stained by the condensed fog or dirty rain which has trickled down them, and when the centre is fitted up with straight-backed pews of another shade—the deadest, dullest of all shades—of drab, the result is depressing. The effect is as incongruous and unpleasing as would be that of the spectacle of a Greek merchant, on a wet wintry day in London, with his picturesque raiment bespattered with the black mud of the streets, and his head adorned with a chimney-pot hat. While such monstrosities in the way of buildings for public worship exist, they must, I suppose, be used; but the sooner they are improved—off the face of the earth—the better. There were some signs of life in the chapel, however. The announcement of services and meetings indicated the existence of an active and earnest organisation, even if it might be upon a small scale, and showed that the minister and his coadjutors were making praiseworthy efforts to secure a hearing for their religious teachings, and to excite the intelligent interest of the population around them. A series of sermons on Unitarian teaching was in course of delivery; there were Bible classes, sewing meetings, and home missionary enterprises on foot; and there was a pretty numerous and evidently zealous choir, chiefly of young people, whose ambition had not, however, led them much beyond such familiar tunes as the "Old Hundredth," "French," and a very easy chant. The congregation consisted of perhaps fifty adults, exclusive of the choir, which might number twenty more.

The preacher was young, probably not more than thirty, and with a not unpleasing bloom—reminding one of green fields and country air—upon his face. He had caught, I suspect, something of the manner and intonation of one of his college professors, and he had not yet escaped that immature stage of ministerial experience when the idea of the young divine is that a sermon should be something of an academic prelection. Genius has, no doubt, its imitative period, and so also has mediocrity. To which order the preacher of Sunday evening belonged, perhaps it would be prophetic to say. It struck me, however, that his theology and philosophy were in a somewhat underdone, if not raw, condition, and that his experience of and sympathy with things human and Divine were of a rudimentary kind. The subject was, "God: How and What we may know about Him; the Ever present Creator, the Just and Loving Father." The text chosen was, "O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable are his judgments, and His ways past finding out!" These words, the preacher told us, were those of a man who was always endeavouring to find out the reason for the faith that was in him, and who was ever conscious of the existence of intricacies which he could not unravel, and of mysteries which he could not understand. However, we were assured that the utterances of Paul were in harmony with the highest thoughts of our day, and we were reminded that the days of elaborate theological creeds had now come to an end, and that it was now felt to be best and safest and surest to confine ourselves to very simple affirmations about God and about Divine things. It was desirable with respect to such a subject, that, on the one hand, we should be careful not to over-estimate our own powers and capacities, and that, on the other hand, we should be careful not to underestimate them. The first error might be corrected by considering the limitations of all human knowledge; the second, by reflecting upon what knowledge had been actually acquired by the human intelligence. The knowledge of God certainly transcended all our powers; but it was to be remembered that mysteries were not confined to the subject of religion, but were to be found in connection with the most familiar phenomena of daily life. We were continually acting upon assumptions. Our duty was to trust our human faculties as far as they would go; they were the only instruments we possessed for the attainment of knowledge. In the past ages God had been supposed to make Himself known by wonderful and supernatural prodigies; but even if we could be quite sure that these prodigies actually occurred we wanted evidence of a more abiding character about God, evidence which did not rest in traditions or in supposed oracles. All our knowledge was partial; we knew little of ourselves and little of God; but we might gain at least sufficient knowledge to enable us to go on our way cheerfully and hopefully. Taking our stand, then, on the intuition of the mind and conscience, we might infer that the visible universe had been brought into being by some Power, Force, or Intelligence, behind which there was a living Will. The preacher touched upon the development of the idea of the unity of God, and upon the obsolete notions that God could act by caprice, or that he had created the world in six days, and then retired to rest. But if we would know God as a just and loving God, we must go to some other source than the contemplation of nature. First, we must listen to the voice of conscience; we must cultivate thoughtfulness of spirit; and especially we must rely upon our own religious affections. What men and women want are not arguments about God, but an experience of Him in their own hearts; they must find the proof of His existence, His justice, His love, in their own breasts. We ought not, indeed, wholly to set aside the teachings of the great, the wise, and the good; indeed, we might learn much from the revelations which had been made to the great and wise of all ages. Among the great religious teachers, Jesus of Nazareth stood first. The characteristic conception of Christianity was the Fatherhood of God. The expression was imperfect, no doubt, because of the inadequacy of human thought and language; but it was difficult to see how the idea could have been expressed better. It was admitted that there were difficulties in the way of accepting this idea of God, but it was maintained that however great might be the difficulties of belief, the difficulties of unbelief were greater. The belief in a God of justice and of love supplied an adequate interpretation of the facts of experience, afforded a practical rule of life, and met the deepest aspirations of human nature. The only objection to Unitarian doctrine which could be advanced was that it made God too good and loving, inasmuch as it dismissed the myth of Eden and the teaching about judgment and hell. We were exhorted, in conclusion, to trust in the simple, pure, and holy affections of our nature, as the purest and best revelation of God, to live by them, and to follow them.

This is a very condensed account of a sermon which lasted for some forty-five minutes. It will be seen that there was what Germans call "Stoff" in the sermon. There were faults of manner, which may be got rid of; and there were in its teachings faults and defects which the vast majority of Christendom, in spite of the most persuasive eloquence, will probably continue to regard as radical.

THE REV. G. C. MILN, OF CHICAGO.

The Chicago Morning News of Monday, January 2, gives the following interesting sketch of the well-known successor of Robert Collyer at Unity Church:—

"Robert Collyer's Church" is what Unity Unitarian Church will be called as long as one stone of it remains on another. The grand old man who spent the best twenty years of his life with it, who built it, who assembled his terror-stricken fold in its smoking ruins the Sunday after the great fire, and rebuilt it, can never be separated from its title or its destiny. Standing at the corner of Dearborn-street and Walton-place, and facing the lovely little Washington park, no church in the city is more beautifully situated. It has, of course, two unfinished towers, covered in with pine boards, as a sort of concession to the city fashion, but with that exception it is a model church edifice, within and without. In size, in arrangement, and in decoration it is a marvel of unpretentious comfort and quiet good taste. Its sloping floor, its converging aisles, its concentric pews, its dome-shaped roof, and rounded corners, make its acoustic properties almost perfect, and its plain, but tasteful frescoping seems to embody the strong good sense of the man whose untiring exertions raised it from its ashes ten years ago. It will probably seat 1,000 people, and make them as comfortable for purposes of seeing and hearing as any other building in Chicago. Yesterday it was rendered still more attractive by its elegant holiday decorations of evergreens and flowers, which were disposed around the room in a most pleasing manner.

The house was as sweet and attractive as ever, but any visitor who had been absent two or three years felt a touch of sadness when the congregation were seated and the services began. The best Hook organ in the city was still in the gallery over the pulpit, but where was the inspired and lamented organist, Arthur Creswold, of Church Choir "Pinafore" fame, who, with his organ and his pianissimo voluntaries, conveyed a man's soul away to dream-land, and constituted a fine religious service in himself? Mr. Harry Wild, who succeeds him, was his pupil, and probably learned from him all that could be imparted, but a teacher cannot impart his soul. Where, too, is Miss Curtis, who sung the same solo every Sunday in the year, so that it was better liked every time it was sung? It is said she is pursuing her musical studies in Paris, and surely it would be worth a voyage across the ocean to hear from her again "The Lord's Prayer," with Creswold's inimitable accompaniment. The quartette which takes her place is good enough, as things go, especially the alto, but an old-timer doesn't feel that they fill the place which death and the Paris Conservatoire have made vacant.

The congregation of Unity Church belong almost exclusively to the upper classes of society. One seated in the gallery and looking down on them will not see a single seedy coat or unfashionable lady's hat. They all looked well-nourished, well-fixed, and determined to remain so if possible. There is at heart no lack of hospitality, but a visitor misses the anxious attention which the ushers of some orthodox churches lavish on strangers. But this is not necessary, as there is generally enough unoccupied seats for every one to suit himself without encroaching on reserved rights. The congregation is not large, though there is only one service on Sunday. The attendance yesterday was smaller than usual, probably on account of the cold weather. There were about 250 people in the house when the sermon began. And yet, taking the year round, the house is as nearly filled as it was during Mr. Collyer's ministry.

The Rev. George C. Miln, the first year of whose pastorate in this church is about to expire, has attracted the attention of the public within a week past by resigning the charge which he has so recently assumed. Coming so soon after the resignation of Mr. Galvin on the west side, and followed so soon by that of Dr. Rider on the south side, it has caused a thrill of expectation concerning the future of liberal Christianity in the west to run through the minds of the Chicago people. In Mr. Miln's case, however, the explanation of his course is to be found in a serious defect in his health. He is not threatened with softening of the brain, as has been rumoured, but he has been suffering with some affection of the nervous system which makes it prudent for him to withdraw from the labours of the pastorate. To this subject, however, he made no reference yesterday.

Mr. Miln's history is interesting. Like Robert Collyer, he is an Englishman. He was born in London thirty-one years ago. His father was a Scotchman and his mother was the daughter of one of the editors of the London Times, and a descendant of the Huguenots. And as his mother's mother was Welsh he has an ample opportunity to illustrate the physical and mental advantages of a mixture of races. He was educated at the Blue Coat School in London, and he and his parents immigrated to this country during the rebellion. On the voyage the vessel in which they sailed was captured and burned by the rebel cruiser Tallahassee, and they were put on board a coal-barge, on which they made their way to New York city. Mr. Miln's first employment in America was that of a printer's devil in the Brooklyn Eagle office, when Theodore Tilton was its editor. When he conceived the idea of studying for the ministry he took a course of Armenian theology under Dr. Mahan, of Adrian College, in Michigan. Then he took a course of Calvinistic theology under Dr. Charles Hodge, of Princeton College, for whose published works he still entertains great admiration. His first settlement as a pastor was with the Presbyterian Church at Liberty Corner, N.J., and lasted two years. Then he was pastor for two years of the Congregational Church at Mt. Carmel, Conn. And he then was pastor for over three years of the Puritan Congregational Church in Brooklyn. Near the close of his pastorate in Brooklyn he preached a sermon called "Shifting Light," on the decay of orthodoxy, which excited some alarm among his brethren, and which ultimately led to his abandoning the Congregational ministry. He made up his mind, at first, to abandon the ministry altogether, and to go to Denver and study law. But before he had completed his arrangements he received the call to Chicago, and, at the earnest solicitation of his friends, accepted it, last January. He expresses himself in the most enthusiastic manner concerning the welcome he received, and the warm attachment existing between himself and his present charge.

Mr. Miln is distingué in appearance, and would be selected out of any crowd as a man of intellect and of marked character. He is quite small, being not over five feet six inches in height, but is well formed and muscular, and by no means a person of insignificant physique. His physiognomy is pale and large featured, he is as clean-shaven as a Catholic priest, and his hair is long. His countenance sometimes resembles Collyer's, and sometimes Edwin Booth's. He dresses very plainly, and he is entirely free from the nervousness and fussiness which are so apt to characterize small men. He is evidently by nature a freethinker, in a good sense, and a fearless investigator of truth. In conversation the other day, when a friend remarked to him that the doctrine of the imputation of Christ's righteousness was not taught in the Scriptures, he replied:—"It makes no difference to me whether it is or not." And that is probably a fair indication both of his theological bent and of his independent spirit.

Mr. Miln's sermon yesterday morning was on the text, "Be thou strong and very courageous"—Josh. i. 7., the words addressed to Joshua by the Almighty, on his succeeding Moses in the command of the Israelitish hosts. The preacher treated the words as an appropriate motto for the new year, and made a plea for manhood and self-reliance in the battle of life. The sermon was said by one of Mr. Miln's most intelligent admirers not to be at all up to his standard of excellence. He made it very evident, however, that he possessed some of the very highest gifts of a popular and powerful preacher. His voice is very musical, his enunciation and intonations are uncommonly good, his features are expressive, his manner in the pulpit is natural, dignified, and free from affectation, and his action is temperate and very graceful, and possesses the charm of beginning moderately and growing in intensity gradually as he goes along. He has a taste for poetry, and made several quotations yesterday, one

SPECIAL AND URGENT APPEAL.

In March, 1880, an order from the Metropolitan Board to remove the Temporary Iron Chapel within twelve months forced upon the Committee the alternative of abandoning the cause, or building a permanent Church. But the prospects of success were too encouraging to allow of any hesitation; the only question was, as to the erection of a Schoolroom in addition. This was quickly decided for them by the handsome present made by the late Mr. Samuel Sharpe, of a Plot of Freehold Land, on which was erected the Schoolroom, completed in 1881, one of the best structures of the kind in London, though built at a very moderate cost. The Congregation has worshipped in this building since the removal of the Iron Church, and the attendance so much improved that the Committee felt it their duty to lose no time in proceeding with the building of the New Chapel, the Foundation-stone of which was accordingly laid by Sir James Clarke Lawrence, Bart., M.P., in June, 1881. But the works had to be suspended on account of insufficient funds, and the Committee feel that such a prejudicial influence will be exerted on the Unitarian cause in the neighbourhood should the work remain longer in abeyance that they are impelled to make an urgent appeal for a sufficient sum to enable them to proceed with the building.

The neighbourhood is rapidly enlarging, the influx of inhabitants is great, the spirit of inquiry is rife, and the quote from the report in the leading local paper, of the laying of the foundation-stone, "the district in which Mr. Carter administers so ably is one which has grown with marvellous strides of late years, and it is quite probable that before long it will form an important centre of Unitarianism."

Under these circumstances, and the Congregation not numbering amongst them persons of affluence, the Committee must depend on the generous aid of the Unitarian body generally to enable them to complete a building really required in the locality, and for which a promising future may be anticipated.

Subscriptions may be paid into the London and South Western Bank (Peckham Branch), or will be received by the undersigned, and acknowledged in the Unitarian papers.

THE HOUSE AND MR. BRADLAUGH.

THE unprecedented and, as we view it, unconstitutional conduct of the Speaker in allowing Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE to intervene with a motion to prevent Mr. BRADLAUGH doing that which the law of this country says he must do if he wishes to take his seat in Parliament still permits the recurrence of a scene which is getting monotonous, and which but for the very serious issues arising out of it would be almost ridiculous. On Tuesday last Mr. BRADLAUGH again presented himself at the table of the House for the purpose of taking the oath which the Statute applicable to the matter says he is bound to take. Thereupon Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE moved that "Mr. BRADLAUGH be not permitted to go through the form of repeating the words of the oath"—a somewhat extraordinary, but, no doubt, generally speaking, accurate way of describing what is represented by some persons as a very solemn proceeding. To this the Home Secretary on the part of the Government moved "the previous question," stating the position taken by them, and which may be shortly summed up in the statement that they regarded such a resolution as illegal. A warm debate ensued; Mr. BRADLAUGH, in a speech not wanting in either dignity or eloquence, rebutted many of the charges made against him, and offered, if an Affirmation Bill were passed, not retrospective in its character, to resign his seat and seek re-election. This offer Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE declined, though Mr. GLADSTONE considered it was a reasonable one. Other members joined in the discussion, including the pious Mr. O'DONNELL, who made it an occasion to vent his ill-bred spleen on Mr. GLADSTONE. The division that followed was the largest that has been taken on this question, and resulted in the Government being defeated by a majority of fifty-eight, the leader of the Opposition being reinforced by twenty-eight Liberals and thirty-eight Home Rulers.

What will be the next step in this business we cannot say. No one supposes that it will end here. Some strongly urge the Government to attempt legislation on the matter, but they have very little encouragement to do so. Even assuming that an Act were passed abolishing the oath and substituting for it a simple affirmation—a rather bold assumption in the face of existing feeling on the subject—there is no guarantee that the same illegal conduct on the part of the House of Commons will not be repeated. Indeed, from expressions which fell from some of the members who spoke we feel justified in expressing a very strong belief that it would. No Atheist, some say, ought to sit in the House of Commons; no one who, like Mr. BRADLAUGH, has professed Republican opinions, say others, ought to sit there. If therefore such a Bill as has been suggested were passed, the same objections would still apply to Mr. BRADLAUGH, and, we doubt not, would be made use of. Whether they would prevail we cannot say, but there can be little room for hope that they would not. The kind of prejudice felt against Mr. BRADLAUGH is not likely to be appeased by any such legislative enactment as is so glibly talked of, as if the passing of an Act of Parliament were a mere every day occurrence. We cannot therefore blame the Government for not being very keen on the matter. That an Affirmation Bill is much needed we are quite prepared to admit, but that it is a pressing matter we do not feel certain.

When a man has determined to do an unjust or an illegal thing it matters very little to him what false positions he takes up. If a man's theological opinions are no bar to his receiving the confidence of a majority of any constituency they ought not to be so to his taking his seat in the House of Commons, any more than the colour of his hair, the cut of his clothes, or the length of his legs. To give the franchise to all householders, irrespective of creed, and then to prevent the exercise of their franchise taking effect, because their choice has fallen on some one not disqualified by law, but obnoxious to a majority of other members is absurd. But absurd or not, it is just what the majority have done. If we thought they would listen to reason, we should be inclined to ask those members who voted for Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE'S motion, what real good they suppose they have done for religion? Is it an advantage to make the advocate of mistaken opinions popular? Is it an edifying spectacle to see men who should be sober judges indulging in partisan jeers? What good is done to religion when notorious evil livers pose as defenders of the faith? These are questions we challenge the supporters of illegality to answer. It is because we feel very strongly that nothing can justify the illegality of the course pursued by the majority, and still more strongly, that religion is prejudicially affected by such acts as these, that we deplore what has taken place. We know that it is said by some that their conscience will not allow them to sanction what is to them a profanation, but when we learn that it is the open, and, we will add, honest avowal of Atheism that is objected to, we confess that we are unable to pay much respect to such subtlety of conscience. We wish to judge no one harshly, but we cannot avoid saying that there is far more of casuistry than honesty in such a position. We could understand a man saying that no Atheist ought to sit in the House, and on being told there were some already, moving for a return of the theological opinions of every member, with the view of eliminating the element he objects to, but we have little sympathy with those who take their stand against the honest avowal of Atheism, and wink at the dishonest suppression of it.

"GREAT BRITAIN AND ROME."

THE Right Rev. Monsignor CAPEL has just published a pamphlet entitled "Great Britain and Rome; or, Ought the Queen of England to hold Diplomatic Relations with the Sovereign Pontiff." We should like to ask Dr. CAPEL who are the subjects of the "Sovereign" with whom the Queen of England is invited, or rather warned to hold diplomatic relations? There are only two possible replies. (1) The inhabitants of Rome and Central Italy. (2) Persons of various nationalities who believe in the Roman Catholic dogmas, and desire to receive Roman Catholic Sacraments.

Let us consider the alternatives.

(1) Dr. CAPEL inserts a Papal Encyclical to inform us that it is in the power of a nation to select its form of government, but that when it has been selected, it receives a Divine sanction and rules by a Divine right. An Englishman who is not a "Domestic Prelate to His Holiness" would argue that even upon such principles the King of Italy is now ruler of Rome, by virtue of the popular voice elected, and therefore to be regarded as "the prince, the minister of God." But an Englishman living under a monarchy established by a successful revolution does not need encyclical sanctions for the recognition of liberty. It is, doubtless, quite true that Papal authority has proved itself willing to bless alike an immoral absolutism, or a political pretender, or a democratic revolution, subject to two conditions—success, and homage to the Pope. During the last three hundred years the policy of the English nation has been to recognise a de facto Government without requiring the additional condition of subserviency to Papal aspirations. If we enter upon diplomatic relations with the "Sovereign" of the "States of the Church," we may next under a Conservative administration be invited to enter upon diplomatic relations with DON CARLOS, HENRI DE BOURBON, and the dethroned rulers of Naples and Florence. When we send envoys to tyrants justly deposed, we prepare ourselves for a "holy crusade" against the liberties of the nations, but are rewarded with the willing service of a Connaught and Munster Brigade, along with the blessing of the Pope and the hesitating encouragement of BISMARCK. To hold diplomatic relations with the "Sovereign" of the "States of the Church" would be to declare war against the King of United Italy. In order to secure the loyal services of Irish Roman Catholic bishops, we are invited to insult the de facto Government of a friendly power, of a liberated nation.

(2) If it be not so, what then? The alternative is—recognise the "Sovereign Pontiff" of British subjects who believe in Roman Catholic dogmas, and wish to receive Roman Catholic Sacraments. We reply, an independent nation knows no "Sovereign" over its subjects save its own. Surely our Roman Catholic countrymen can go to confession and receive Holy Communion and be anointed in sickness and have masses offered for the repose of their departed souls, without our entering upon diplomatic relations with any sovereign but our own. We do not profess to understand much about the modes of promoting repose amongst departed souls, but we have the sad experience of history to inform us how we may the most effectually disturb the repose of living souls:—Carry on diplomatic relations with a power claiming a Divine supremacy, and only able to enforce it amongst those who protest, by the artifices of scheming agents, who support their persuasions by the insolent suggestion that it is in their power to injure us if we do not yield. Then we prefer their injuries to aid proffered to us on the ground of our feebleness.

Dr. CAPEL tells us, in the words of Cardinal NEWMAN, that "We must never murmur at that absolute rule which the Sovereign Pontiff has over us, because it is given to him by CHRIST, and in obeying him we are obeying his Lord. We must never suffer ourselves to doubt that in his government of the Church he is guided by an intelligence more than human. His yoke is the yoke of CHRIST; he has the responsibility of his own acts, not we; and to his Lord must he render an account, not to us. Even in secular matters it is ever safe to be on his side, dangerous to be on the side of his enemies." "There are kings of the earth who have despotic authority, which their subjects obey indeed, but disown in their hearts." Not so with the Pope. "We must never oppose his will, or dispute his word, or criticise his policy, or shrink from his side." Dr. CAPEL wishes us to realise that "in India" and "throughout the British Empire" there is "a strongly organised body" bound by such convictions to the service of the "Sovereign Pontiff" that it is the part of prudence through his influence to obtain the loyal support of Irish bishops, and through them of their flocks. We are obliged to Monsignor CAPEL for the clearness of his statements. When we need Russian policemen, or Neapolitan generals, or Bourbon soldiers to aid us in the government of our country it may be time for us to consider whether to purchase the pretence of loyalty by the sacrifice of a principle, whether to seek the questionable alliance of a "Sovereign" who, whilst aspiring to universal dominion cannot in the midst of "believers" preserve his own dominions; whether by the prostration of our honour to offer the prestige of our ancient renown to feebleness claiming infallibility. A father has fallen very low when compelled to call in an assuming hostile stranger to aid him in the management of his household. We have yet to learn from some authority more competent than Monsignor CAPEL, that England has fallen so low as to need the aid of any Italian "Sovereign" in the government of India, Canada, or Ireland. If we submitted to this degradation, we should deserve the failure so sure to accompany it. Alliance with the "Sovereign Pontiff" has always been the forerunner of disaster. His aims can never be those of any independent Government. Whatever power we concede to him, whatever right of interference we permit him, must ere long be exercised against ourselves. As soon as we cease to yield to his ever increasing claims his patronage is changed into open or secret enmity. He has his objects, and those objects can never harmonise with the action of any independent nationality. It has been a remarkable fact in history that the Pope has again and again by interference caused mischief, whereas he has never been able to extirpate the sources of mischief peculiar to Roman Catholic countries, and by their nature the most justly open to ecclesiastical legislation. Secret societies of a character perilous to peace, virtue, lives and property, are invariably successfully founded and maintained in their career of mischief by persons professing the Roman Catholic belief. The vast Secret Society in Ireland, called by various names, "Hibernian," &c., made as one of its conditions the exclusion of "Protestants and other enemies." It is not true that the Roman Catholic clergy encouraged it, they laboured against it with the most honest and ineffectual zeal. Agrarian interests were supposed to be on the side of the Secret Societies, therefore the clergy were almost powerless. If the Pope and his Predecessors, the Bishops, could command the influence we might expect, and which Dr. CAPEL threatens us with, it would be unsafe and unwise to make a very fervent Roman Catholic Viceroy of India, or occupant of any high political or judicial function; such is the conviction of each of the Roman Catholic countries; whereas in the British Empire we venture to hope that the spirit of our insular independence may correct and save us from a danger apprehended universally on the Continent.

Dr. CAPEL with amusing naïveté assigns another benefit to be attained by diplomatic relations with the Sovereign Pontiff: he would aid us in the Conversion of India to Christianity. The zealous Monsignor must not be deceived by the weak concessions of Non-Catholics in London society. He may depend upon it, that to the vast bulk of the English nation there is no fascination about modern Vaticanism. There are happily still millions of electors quite ready to hurl from political power any future Government convicted of an attempt to proselytise to the Roman Catholic religion, the only Christianity signified by Dr. CAPEL. There are, indeed, very many now who, whilst confiding profoundly in Mr. GLADSTONE, read with regret in Roman Catholic periodicals that Lord RIPON, accompanied by a Jesuit chaplain, delights to visit and encourage Jesuit Colleges and Roman Catholic institutions to such a degree that, according to Papal newspapers, special arrangements are being organised by the Vatican to enable the emissaries of the Holy See to avail themselves of the opportunities so unexpectedly presented to them. There are very many thoughtful men, who, though entirely tolerant and kindly in personal feeling towards English and Irish Roman Catholics, yet being well acquainted with India can perceive no features of superiority distinguishing native Romanism from the better form of indigenous religion in India. A Christianity presenting as God a small circular piece of bread which can be only approached successfully through the medium of prayers offered to JOSEPH's Beatified Wife, is surely a form of religion not equal to the spiritual worship of the Brahmo Somaj, and may be permitted to stand upon its own merits, without seeking the unwonted apostolic aid anticipated as the result of diplomatic communications with the Holy See.

Monsignor CAPEL has not informed us in what light his scheme would be regarded by Irish Roman Catholics. We happen to know that it would be received with indignation by those who represent the feelings of the masses. Doubtless, if it were our desire to sow the seeds of bitter disunion amongst Irish Roman Catholics, we should adopt a proposal so acceptable to those who love the Purple, so hateful to those who loathe to see an English Government combining with the Pope for the management of docile flocks. But surely we have in former days sufficiently affronted the national religious sentiments of the Irish Roman Catholics, without now adopting a Jesuitical mode of governing them by dividing them. To those amongst us willing to sacrifice our honour for the sake of inflicting a wound on the Irish Roman Catholic Church, the scheme of Dr. CAPEL will be naturally entertained. But why does the Monsignor urge upon us a scheme repugnant to all who regard religion as a spiritual affair, not needing the intervention of a diplomatic corps? The reason is not far to seek. It would unquestionably add greatly to the prestige of English Romanism. When we had thrown down the gauntlet before the Italian people and enlisted Protestant England on the side of the patron of all the deposed or restrained absolutisms, we should be rewarded with the presence of a Papal Nuncio at the Court of St. James. If we did not concede to him precedence over all other ambassadors, we should be accused of bigotry and persecution; and then resident Cardinals, to whom London society is beginning to give precedence over English Bishops, would easily assume the position they covet. In the present state of our so-called "Upper Classes" we feel no doubt that the result would be a not inconsiderable accession to the Papal Church; and a discouragement to the cause of religious liberty over the Continent. But it may be said there is a highly respectable and respected body of English Roman Catholics; the English prisons are occupied by Roman Catholic criminals vastly beyond the relative proportion in the population; the question of children in the workhouses, and in Roman Catholic and Protestant schools is a matter of anxiety to all zealous Roman Catholics; how are the wishes and apprehensions of the English Roman Catholics to be made known to the Government? We reply, by the same means as those adopted by Wesleyans, Presbyterians, Quakers, and other denominationalists, namely by themselves, by English gentlemen commissioned to represent their grievances. The "Catholic Poor School Committee" has in a singularly efficient way sustained and carried every point desired by themselves, probably more thoroughly than could have been attained by the agency of Italian diplomacy. "My Lords" listened always with sympathetic courtesy to the straightforward remonstrances of well-known English gentlemen and the English Roman Catholic Ecclesiastics allied with them. So in regard of our sister country, why should a Nuncio in London, with a resident Cardinal-Archbishop at one ear and some future Lord BEACONSFIELD at the other ear, decide on the grievances of Irish Roman Catholic schools, colleges, and prisons? If the Roman Catholic chaplains in India or native Roman Catholics have any grievances, surely an English Viceroy can receive and, if needed, forward to the Home Government any reasonable requests without the humiliating intervention of a foreign sovereign dispossessed of his States because he could not govern them. When the Pope possessed provinces, what did he ever do for religious or political liberty to entitle him to our special gratitude now that he can only try upon the subjects of other States modes of suppression which alienated his own subjects?

It is a great mistake to suppose that Papal intervention is really desired by the bulk of the English Roman Catholic gentry. Unquestionably, if asked, they would as a point of honour be obliged to advocate whatever gratified the ambition of their English and Roman ecclesiastical rulers; but it is an utter error to suppose they desire an increase of a despotism to which they have reluctantly yielded as a matter of conscience. Why should an English Government strive in the nineteenth century to submit the English Roman Catholic laity to a foreign yoke loathed by our ancestors in the "Ages of Faith?" R. R. S.

HENRY WHITNEY BELLOWES, D.D.

No message from the Western World has for years reached us more fitted to touch the heart of our whole Liberal Communion, than last Tuesday's brief telegram, that our friend H. W. Bellows has been suddenly called to "come up higher." He appeared to us, in imagination, so abounding in vital vigour, though on the verge of three score and ten—so continually expanding in mental grasp, largeness, and energy; so overflowing in sympathies, patriotic, humane, and Christian; so elastic with ideal enthusiasm and practical resource; so prompt in response to each call of professional duty, from North to South, across the continent; so expectant in hope of ever-widening beneficence; and so indispensable in his own peculiar sphere, that his Work so far from being finished at sunset, looked still at high noon. True, for a full half-century he had tasked his powers to the utmost; and, true also, he had been threatened, again and again, with serious illness. But after every attack he had exhibited such exhaustless power of rejuvenescence, and he was so manifestly each year surpassing our expectations, and steadily unfolding from his better to his best, that his compeers were wont to feel that, rich as already were the harvests of his reaping, yet other ripe fields lay waiting for him to garner. And now that he has been so swiftly withdrawn from their companionship, his comrades will recognize, as never before, how unique he was in complex and balanced elements of character, in versatile many-sidedness, receptivity, and breadth of vision, in stimulating unexpectedness of original suggestion, and sudden outbursts of splendid zeal; while, at the same time, how reliable and commanding was the position he held, by his indomitable steadfastness to his mature convictions. With him our Communion has lost a central focus of quickening influence, which his own generation will not readily supply.

How quickening in radiant light and heat this influence was, and how all alive with youthful glow our friend kept to the close of his bright course, appears from the record of his very last weeks of active service. In the Christian Register, of January 19, is a letter from his pen, commending in the heartiest terms, Mr. Mayo's "Educational Mission in the South," wherein he writes:—

"As I have not observed any zealous interest in this mission (chiefly a self-assumed one), among our Unitarian people, I have deemed it my duty to say, that Mr. Mayo is doing a work in the South, which, if he can be moderately supported in it for ten years, will prove the most fruitful we have ever essayed in that region. He is known as one of our ministers, as a representative of our educational notions, and is preparing the way for Christian Missionaries of the faith we love. And having heard him speak on Southern educational problems, with great personal edification, and now hearing from several independent sources of his successful work in the South, I am impelled to call the general attention of our Unitarian Churches and of our wealthy laity to the claims of this mission. It would be a great calamity to have it cease for want of the small amount of money it requires to support it."

Just returned from a fatiguing journey of 4,000 miles, going and returning, to the great West, to dedicate the new "Church of the Messiah," in St. Louis—thus did his generous sympathies next overflow towards the Schools of the Freedmen and of the poor Whites in the moral wildernesses of the South. And as indicating the depth and tenderness of his affectionate nature, as well as its largeness, in the very next columns of the Christian Register, appears this brief sketch of his New Year's Sermon, on "Intuition and Experience," in his own pulpit of "All Souls," New York:—

"This discourse was marked by a breadth of sympathy for the young, peculiarly beautiful in one who has garnered up such riches of experience. It was a noble rebuke to Pessimism and Cynicism. 'It is the hollow heart,' he said, 'which discovers the hollowness of the world. The rooted conviction of man's baseness is not seldom a projection of self. If the world within us is sound and sweet, the world without will not look so bad. The beginning of all true Social Reform, therefore, is a reform within.'"

On our table, too, lies before us a pamphlet, containing the "Two Sermons preached in All Souls' Church, on the Sundays preceding and following the Nation's bereavement, September 18th and September 25th, by Dr. Bellows." And did space permit we should like to quote long extracts from these most generous-hearted and truly ennobling discourses.

If our survey should be continued for still six months further backward, we should come upon his loyal, yet discriminating, tribute of reverent friendship to his life-long comrade, Rev. George Washington Hosmer, D.D., in the Unitarian Review for August, to his untiring labours in the "Civil Service Reform Association," of which organisation he was the President in New York, to his incessant exercise of the hospitalities of the "Union League," of which also he was the head, to whose counsels he lent the guidance of his experienced judgment, and whose debates and festive entertainments he enlightened by his genial tact and brilliant wit, and thence to the denominational meetings of Anniversary Week, last Spring, where he had invariably been an inspiring centre, by his dignified and benignant presence, his hearty brotherly kindness, and his magnetic oratory. And now, if we ask for the secret of such exuberant spirits and unflagging energy, preserved up to the period when veterans might rightfully claim a few calm years ere entering into rest, and ripening for the new birth of Immortality, the only satisfactory answer must be found in the combined results of the happy and refined home influences by which from early childhood his rich emotional temperament was unfolded to balanced roundness—of the symmetric training of his bright imaginative intellect, by systematic training at the Round Hill School and in Harvard University, of the felicitous fortune which cast his destiny, in the first years of his ministry, in the chief commercial capital of the Republic—of the habit, formed partly from self-confidence, partly from business discipline at the outset of his course, promptly to accept every trust to which he felt himself summoned by Providence—and above all, of his lofty Ideal of the Christian minister's functions, and his fervent aspiration, by brave devotedness and generous fidelity to become worthy of closer communion with the beloved Son, risen and glorified, and with the heavenly Father of all souls. And from first to last he never wearied in expressing his gratitude for the blessed guidance which led him, while yet a Student of Divinity, to make the sainted Henry and Mary Ware, his parent-confessors, and to seek spiritual refreshment at the Fountain of Life, which flowed from the pulpit of William Ellery Channing. In his "Memorial Discourse" at the "Centenary Celebration in Newport," he thus bears testimony to this last source of inspiration:—

"Of Channing's preaching I was the glad and fortunate beneficiary, and one among the not too many living witnesses of its transcendent power. There is no spot in Boston so sacred to me as the profaned site of the old Federal Street Church; for thither, a youth of twenty-one, I was wont to repair (and it was a walk then of several miles) on every other Sunday morning, for two critical years of my theological studies, to hear Channing preach. There were excellent preachers to be heard nearer home; but there was that in Channing's mind and soul, in his voice, manner, and look, that separated him from them, as the Prophet is separated from the Priest. Indeed, he did not preach, in the ordinary sense of the word. Gowned as he was, it was not the Preacher, but the Apostle one saw and heard. Even in the pulpit he lived the things he said. The greatness of human nature shone on his beautiful brow, sculptured with thought and lighted from within; his eye, so full and blue, was lustrous with a vision of God, and seemed an open door into the shining Presence. His voice, sweet, round, unstrained, full though low, lingered as if with awed delay upon the words that articulated his dearest thoughts and trembled with an ever restrained but most contagious emotion. . . . And there was little in the words themselves to fix attention, except their purity and grace. It was the subject that came forward and remained in the memory. He left you not thinking of him nor of his rhetoric. He had no startling figures, no brilliant fancies, no sharp points, little for admiration or praise, but everything for reflection, inspiration, illumination. . . . So profoundly helpful was his preaching, that I, for one, lived on it from fortnight to fortnight, and went every time with the expectation and experience of receiving the Bread of Heaven on which I was to live and grow until the manna fell again."

Thus it appears, from his own grateful acknowledgment, that Dr. Bellows drew his life and strength from "Channing Unitarianism," as defined and described in this "Memorial Discourse."

"His theological opinions," he says, "in my judgment, upon a recent very careful reconsideration of them, prove much more systematic, definite, and positive than it is common to allow; but they are also much more comprehensive, inclusive, and inconsistent with the Sectarian spirit or form, than they are sometimes assumed to be. They are profoundly conservative and profoundly radical, holding on to all that is eternal, going down to all that is eternal, and going on to all that is eternal. . . . We are not left to speculate about his fundamental Ideas. They are not only given with transparent simplicity and unflinching courage, and with a reiteration that to many is wearisome, in his collected writings; but he has prefaced his own works, at almost the conclusion of his life, with a deliberate statement, in which he distinctly, and with the most solemn emphasis, calls attention to the true Ideas which he wishes to be regarded as the dominant notes and master-keys of his whole system of religious and political thinking and feeling. One is unqualified Reverence for Human Nature; the other, boundless Faith in Freedom. They are easily interchangeable and become in his writings one and the same."

This reverent yet free disciple of Channing justly then deserved the high privilege of being appointed as the organ of the Unitarian Denomination to render fit honour to their great Apostle, not only on the occasion of laying the corner-stone of the "Channing Memorial Church" in Newport, but also of preaching the sermon at its dedication on Oct. 19, when he took as his theme, "The significance of the Divine Humanity in the Founder of our Religion," and delivered a discourse, even surpassing in profound and comprehensive thought, in large and lofty aspirations and commanding eloquence, his preceding oration on April 7, 1880. The breadth of universal sympathy with earnest Christians of every communion indicated in this sermon was really the goal, to which Dr. Bellows' aspirations had always tended; although there were frequent periods when to his fellow-believers of the Unitarian denomination, as well as to various Evangelical associates, and even to impartial readers of his Editorial articles in the Christian Inquirer, it seemed as if, through dread of extravagant radicalism and iconoclastic free-thought, he might seek congenial companionship within the guarded fold of some Orthodox Church. Probably his nearest friends even forgot, at such times, how many facets the varied experiences of theological controversy had carved and polished in his intellect, and so mistook the flashing tints of his transient moods for changes of conviction. But, meanwhile, to his own conscience he stood justified by an ever eager quest for the clear crystal light of Solar Truth. His conscientious aim to be impartially just to all tendencies of man's religious and intellectual nature reappears strongly in the very original, brave, and free-spoken Discourse on "The break between Modern Thought and Ancient Faith and Worship," with which, during the winter of 1871-72, he opened the Series of Lectures, given through invitation of the Executive Committee of the American Unitarian Association, at Hollis St. Church and King's Chapel, by several distinguished leaders of Liberal Christianity. This entire discourse is grandly commanding in Christian Earnestness, while candidly generous to the claims of Scientific Search, that only a perusal of it, as a whole, can enable one to form a fair estimate of its excellence.

Finally, to prove conclusively Dr. Bellows' maturest ideal, hope, and end, as a Liberal Christian Scholar and Seer, let an extract be given from his "Introduction" to the volume of "Institute Essays," published in 1880, describing the object of that "Ministers' Institute," of which he was in 1877 the chief advocate and organizer.

"Thoughtful people are discovering that the Scientific Method, properly understood, is just as applicable to one form of Truth as another; that religion can no more escape it, or profit by neglecting it, than political economy or agriculture; in short, that it is simply treason to Truth to doubt or deny that the same logic, caution, thoroughness and reliance on critical rules should be applied to the investigation of religious Truth as to all other. When it is understood that the Scientific Method is only another name for the employment of all the best means for discovering or testing Truth, and involves in the treatment of every department of knowledge, the use of the means that are appropriate to that department, the remaining prejudice against its employment will disappear. Some have carelessly imagined that the affections of the heart, the light of the conscience, the native sensibilities were to be ignored by science; but when we are studying what concerns the heart, science will compel us to take the heart itself into counsel as the chief witness. To study theology without faith is a vain effort. To pursue religion in an irreligious spirit is futile. No doubt the study of metaphysics by physical methods, and of theology by unspiritual methods, will prove barren, and will soon be discovered to be as unscientific as it is destructive. . . . The Ministers' Institute has no creed. . . . It cordially welcomes the testimony of religious minds of all faiths, when it knows them to be learned, earnest, and profound. It will hear the Jew and the Gentile, the Hindoo and the Persian, the Roman Catholic and the Protestant, if men of virtuous and pious lives, of accredited learning and high gifts of expression, will come and teach them what they think they know. . . . Meanwhile the Ministers' Institute will improve such opportunities as it finds open for broadening the platform of religious truth and sweetening the charity of common Seekers after God."

Thus has the best effort in his power been made by a fellow-countryman of Dr. Bellows to redeem the promise made in last week's Inquirer to present "an outline of his work as a Theologian and Religious Reformer." But the writer frankly owns that his wish would rather have been to draw a sketch of our departed friend under the aspect of the devoted, self-sacrificing, magnanimous and indefatigable "Philanthropist and Patriot," in his peculiarly characteristic sphere, as the chief Organiser and guide, inspirer and head of the Sanitary Commission. For it was during the four years' heroic effort of that grand Association to carry the Home into the Camp, the Hospital into the Battle Field, and the spirit of the Prince of Peace and Elder Brother into the awful fratricidal strife for "Freedom and Union, One and Undivided," that the great, good heart, the intuitive genius, the animating and exhaustless energy of Henry Whitney Bellows shone forth in brightest beauty. What a "Great Cloud of Witnesses" of the once lost now found again, of the once dead now living, of brave husbands and bereaved widows now re-ved, of longed-for fathers and orphans now re-gathered, of brothers and sisters, friend and friend, once more united, have already welcomed our new-born Brother in the Father's House! And so farewell, dear friend, to meet again in the World of Light. You have finished your work, you have fought a good fight, and fairly won your crown. Once more, in hope, Farewell!

DISESTABLISHMENT AND FREEDOM OF THOUGHT.

The Liverpool Daily Post, whenever it discusses the question of Liberationism, displays great sagacity in urging that the triumph of the policy of the Liberation Society may result in the suppression of that diversity of thought which now exists in the Church of England, which constitutes one of its greatest attractions, if not its greatest, to large numbers of Englishmen, and which unquestionably is one of the sources of its hold upon cultivated men within its ranks. The Daily Post knows well enough that it is presenting one of the strongest possible points in favour of the existing establishment when it is presenting this point, and shrewdly warning us of the limitation of freedom of thought which disestablishment may involve. I noticed that in an article on Mr. Williamson's recent address to his constituents at Cupar it significantly said that the English Church had not ejected Bishop Colenso or Dean Stanley—it did not mention Mr. Voysey, nor did it allude to what Mr. Stopford Brooke's conscience had constrained him to do, nor did it refer to the set of irritating influences directed against the Rev. John Macnaught, formerly of St. Chrysostom's, Everton, which ultimately drove him from Liverpool, and which keeps Liverpool destitute of the presence of a clerical representative and exponent of Broad Churchism.

But, now, what does the Post's argument amount to? It amounts to this—that freedom of thought is ample compensation for all the evils of a State Church, and that it is better to endure these evils than to jeopardise that freedom. But are we to admire freedom of thought at the price which is paid for it in the State Church? Before and above the gospel of freedom of thought is the gospel of veracity. "Freedom" and "liberality" of thought are not built on the right lines if thorough probity, honesty and transparent rectitude are not at the foundation of them; and, to me, it is one of the saddest of things that men, who have expelled some of the Thirty-nine Articles and Creeds from their minds, and have come to convictions with which these do not consort, still hold a position to which nothing entitles them but their explicit and implicit submission to the Articles and Creeds they now so coolly despatch. Freedom of thought is what some of us toil for and pray for day and night; but far better were its day of complete triumph delayed a thousand years than that it should win its way at the cost of moral stamina. Give us liberal ideas; but before them, above them, beneath them, give us transparent uprightness and downrightness.

I rejoice at the practical comprehensiveness of the Church of England—though it is fundamentally inconsistent with the legal basis of the Establishment, the Act of Uniformity, and though it is the strongest condemnation and the most effective satire on the conduct of the Establishment towards our Nonconformist forefathers; but my joy is greatly tempered by what appears to me the absence of perfect integrity. Are oaths valid or invalid? If the former, the conduct of men who have sworn to the Articles and Creeds, but who have now departed widely from the theology of those standards, and yet hold fast to the office to which their faith alone gives them a claim, seems to me to be of a mischievous tendency. If, on the other hand, it has come to be understood that oaths, at least oaths of the theological sort, oaths on the most solemn of all things are not binding, why not abolish them as the shams they really are? It is, through the subtle influence of example, profoundly injurious to national morality for a teacher of religion to subscribe with his hand to a creed or a doctrine which his intellect refines away, which his heart will not admit, which his tongue proceeds to attenuate, or to gloss over, or to transform by poetic phraseology into something it was never meant to be; and yet this is practically what the late Dr. Arnold and Canon Kingsley advised young clergymen troubled with unorthodox tendencies to do; and this is, too, what the late Professor Maurice illustrated when he declared he could prove that the Athanasian Creed was the most lovable of all theological formulas!

It may be said, as Principal Tulloch and the late Dean Stanley have said, that conscience is relieved by the knowledge that dissent from the Articles and Creeds is so generally winked at that no one is deceived. But the example of such solemn subscription being lightly cast aside, or being reduced into meaning "everything in general and nothing in particular," is calculated to foster a low sense of honour. It is calculated to adulterate public morals, to poison the purity and honesty of trade, to weaken the conscientious devotion of men to their engagements; for, if paltering with an oath, if repudiating an oath, if disavowing doctrines, obedience to which was vowed with the most weighty asseveration it is possible for a man to make, be allowed in the pulpit, why may not the same laxity be permissible in the shop and the warehouse? If in religion a solemn contract may be broken, and the breaker yet claim the position and emoluments it undertook to secure to him on his explicit promise of fidelity to the conditions, why may not the same license be pursued in commerce? Freedom of thought is what we all prize; but I believe that as it exists in the Church of England to-day it tends to furnish pretexts for laxity of morals in business, and it also tends, as Mr. Leslie Stephen has pointed out, to produce scepticism, not as to this or that theology, but as to the very existence of intellectual good faith. For this reason, and for many more in addition, I am for disestablishment, assured that it is not in the power of any ecclesiastical corporation whatsoever to sweep back the advancing tide of "independence, freedom, and liberality in religious matters."

S. F. W.

STROUD, GLOUCESTERSHIRE.—The Unitarian Church held its first Committee meeting of the year on Feb. 1st. The various meetings held and movements minuted and carried out, or otherwise, since the Rev. W. Birks's settlement, were passed in review, and considerable progress reported. On April 12 last year, at a general meeting of the congregation, the members present resolved themselves into a Church with connected institutions—Sunday-school and library (which have been since formed)—and elected Officers and Committee of Management. The minister reported the grant of books and tracts by the Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and of books from the Sunday School Association, all of which had been of great use both to School and Congregation, and also in visiting. Most of the denominational papers were being taken in by one or other of the members, and the pamphlet on the Athanasian Creed, published by request of the congregation, had been extensively circulated, and had brought many strangers to the services. The chancel walls had been tastefully painted and inscribed with the mottoes "God our Father," and "Heaven our Home"; and the pulpit and communion table upholstered at the cost of the minister. In order to provide the church with new hymn and tune books and other requisites, such as book case, Church announcement boards, &c., a special fund had been formed, to which it was hoped friends at a distance as well as friends at home would contribute, in consideration of our small and striving congregation having much to do beyond their present means. To improve the finances of the church it was decided that a monthly collection be made at the doors, in addition to the special collections for the Hospital, the Sunday-school, and the Western Unitarian Association. The general position of affairs in the church since the settlement of Mr. Birks was noticed by the Secretary, who stated that several additional names of subscribing members had been added recently, that the congregation had considerably increased, and that several persons were attending regularly who might reasonably be expected to become subscribing members. It was proposed by Mr. Higgs, seconded by Mr. Sims, and carried unanimously—"That this Committee desires to record its unabated and increased confidence in its minister, Mr. Birks, and congratulates him on the amount of success, moderate though it be, which has attended his ministry, and on the prospect of increasing progress. The Committee is also glad to recognise the success which has attended the Lansdown Literary and Social Union, and the valuable assistance rendered thereto by Mr. Birks."

The philosophical faculty of the University of Breslau has conferred upon Mr. T. W. Rhys Davids the honorary degree of Philosophiæ Doctor, in consideration of the services he has rendered to the comparative study of the history of religious belief. We may add that Breslau has the reputation among German Universities of being specially stringent in the granting of such degrees.

Occasional Notes.

AN Association of ladies has recently been founded in Scotland, under the auspices of Dr. Berg and other divines of the same school, "for the Defence of Purity of Worship," the object of which is to maintain and promote the uniformity of Scotch worship according to the regulations of the Presbyterian Church, and to oppose all innovations contrary to these rules, such, for example, as the singing of hymns other than the inspired Psalms, sitting or kneeling in prayer—standing being the prevailing practice—and the use of organs and harmoniums. As regards the mode of action, the Association declares that it will use its best endeavours to deprive of their salaries those ministers who countenance the innovations it condemns—a characteristic specimen of Scotch bigotry.

THE Century for February has a short article on "The Disappearance of the Schoolmaster." The writer thinks that the excessive amount of system and the amount of cramming represses the individuality of the American school-master. "He becomes a hearer of lessons, a marker of registers, a worker for examination week." The school system "has well-nigh lost its flexibility." "The great truths announced by Pestalozzi and Froebel have had little really important influence on our system." The teacher of the primary schools is enjoined to keep them quiet at all hazards; while a little child should be constantly employed, and never kept in a state of enforced quiet. "There are ways in which Froebel's more natural system could be applied in a measure inexpensively to all our primary schools."

SPEAKING on Wednesday night in the Congregational Memorial Hall on "Nonconformity in Wales," Mr. Richard, M.P., said that Nonconformity in that country had been affected by the appointment of English bishops to Welsh dioceses, which drove the people to seek elsewhere the religious nourishment denied them in the English Church. For eighty years after the Reformation in England there were no Nonconformists in Wales, but when the Act of Uniformity was passed 106 ministers in Wales were deprived of their livings for conscience sake. The lecturer went on to describe the persecutions suffered by the early Nonconformists, and contrasted these with the present flourishing state of Dissent in the Principality. Speaking of its marvellous growth during the last 140 years, he said:—In 1742 there were only 110 Dissenting chapels in all Wales. In 1775 they had grown to 171, in 1816 to 993; in 1851, the year of the religious census, to 2,826; in 1871 to 3,407, and in 1882 to 3,892. The growth of the Congregational Churches has been as remarkable as any. In 1715 the number of their congregations was 35—the rest of the 100 already mentioned being Presbyterians and Baptists. In 1742 they had grown to 88. After that there is no enumeration on record until 1801, when they were 766; and now they have 1,071. It is estimated that at present 800,000 of the population of Wales are members or adherents of the four evangelical bodies—the Calvinistic Methodists, the Independents, the Baptists, and the Wesleyan Methodists.

THE Nonconformists not only provide their religion for the people of Wales, but also their literature. Nearly the whole modern literature of Wales is Nonconformist. There are nine commentaries on the whole Bible, and nine besides on the New Testament alone, some original and some translated from English, and only two of these were done by Churchmen, and even they were Dissenters when they began their work. There are eight Biblical and Theological Dictionaries, and as many bodies of divinity or systems of theology; and no Churchman has had a hand in the production of any one of them. There is a History of the World, a History of Great Britain, a History of Christianity, a History of the Church, a History of the Welsh Nation, a History of Religion in Wales, all by Dissenters, besides elaborate denominational Histories of the Calvinistic Methodists, the Independents, the Baptists, &c. All the ecclesiastical histories in the language are Nonconformist, and all the general histories except the History of Wales by the Rev. Thomas Price, and a small work called the "Mirror of the Principal Ages." There is a valuable work, illustrated by many excellent maps and diagrams, entitled "The History of Heaven and Earth," treating of geography and astronomy, by the Rev. J. T. Jones, of Aberdare, formerly a Nonconformist minister. There is another large Geographical Dictionary in course of publication by a Dissenting minister. There are two copious Biographical Dictionaries, edited and principally written by Dissenters.

WITH regard to the practical fruits of Nonconformity, Mr. Richard referred with just pride to the social and moral condition of the Principality. In filling the chapels we have emptied the gaols. In some parts of Wales serious crime can hardly be said to exist. Hardly any assize passes without, in one or two instances at least, the judge being presented with a pair of white gloves, as a symbol of its being a maiden assize, without a single prisoner to try. Indeed, some of the judges are beginning to question the necessity of being sent to Wales at all.

CENSUSES of Church attendance in the important towns of Greenock and Ayr have to be reported this week. In Greenock, out of a total of 30,898, accounted for in the forenoon and afternoon services, the Free Church is credited with 8,502, the Established Church with 6,657, and the United Presbyterian Church with 4,375. In Ayr, the attendance at one service in the Established Churches was 1,861, in the Free Churches 1,233, and the United Presbyterian Churches 664. The attendance at other churches numbered 1,000.

"A GREAT Niece of the Poet Rogers" writes to us as follows in reference to some observations quoted from a weekly journal:—"In consequence of some remarks in your 'Occasional Notes' last week I visited Horsey Churchyard this morning and carefully examined the tomb of the late Mr. Samuel Rogers. The tomb stands in a central position, in full view of the high road, from which the churchyard, traversed by a public footpath, is only separated by a low hedge; it can hardly be said to be in a 'retired nook.' Having been erected nearly fifty years the stone bears the natural marks of age, but is in a good state of repair, with a perfectly legible inscription, and a few dead leaves were the only representatives I could find of 'rubbish.'"

MR. A. J. SHEPHEARD announces in the Nonconformist and Independent this week that the Dissenting Deputies, after much consideration of the Amendment of the Marriage Laws question, have decided to confine their Parliamentary action to the introduction of a Bill extending the legal hours for marriages to six o'clock. The present limit is eight to twelve. The Bill that is to be introduced will authorise marriages between eight A.M. and six P.M. The committee propose, also, to ascertain what parishes or districts are inconvenienced by reason of there not being a sufficient number of district registrars; and where such inconveniences exist, they will take measures to secure the appointment of additional registrars. We are glad to see that no attempt is to be made to abolish the attendance of the Registrar, which we think a decided advantage rather than otherwise, as the representative of the civil authority.

WE take from the Christian World the following note respecting the minister of Bedford Chapel:—"With very much regret we learn that the Rev. Stophord Brooke continues very seriously indisposed. For some eight weeks or so Mr. Brooke has been quite laid aside from work, and his chapel for almost the whole of that time has been closed. We do not pretend to give a strictly scientific or medical account of the malady from which Mr. Brooke is suffering, but as vague announcements of 'serious illness,' 'prolonged indisposition,' &c., are often both puzzling and distressing to interested and sympathetic readers, we may state that we understand the occasion of Mr. Brooke's indisposition to be the existence of a clot of blood in one of the veins of the leg. Neither medical nor surgical skill, it appears, can deal directly with a case of this sort, the only hope being in the recuperative forces of nature. The slightest exertion has to be avoided, because of the danger of arresting the circulation of the blood, and the hope is that under a careful system of dieting the mischievous and dangerous substance will gradually be absorbed. We most earnestly unite with Mr. Brooke's congregation, and with the thousands of persons, in all parts of the English-speaking world, who know him through his books, in the hope that his recovery may be speedy and perfect, and that he may yet have before him many years of activity and usefulness as a religious teacher." Since the above was published, we have received much more cheering intelligence. Mr. Brooke has been able to go out during the week, and we are glad to announce that Bedford Chapel will be reopened, and that Mr. Brooke will preach next Sunday morning.

THE Sunday Mirror, the organ of Keshub Chunder Sen and his adherents, has been discontinued, and in its place a well-printed and ably edited Sunday paper appears with the beginning of the year entitled The Liberal—a very felicitous title—which announces that it takes the place of the Mirror as the organ of the Brahmo Somaj of India and the exponent of "the New Dispensation," that is, in other words, of Keshub Chunder Sen's views. There are some good things in The Liberal mixed up with other things that seem very much like rubbish to our colder occidental minds. We leave it to our readers to decide under which category they would place the following "hymn," as it is styled:—

SPECIAL TRAIN.

The Railway Train of the New Dispensation starteth. There is no time to lose, O brethren, come ye quickly.

Jesus and Chaitanya are the guards stationed behind and the Lord Himself sitting in the engine moveth the machine.

There is no steam-engine, neither is there coal or water, the divine power, God-force, moveth every wheel thereof; outside the carriage shine jewels and precious stones, on beholding which the eyes are soothed.

"There is no intermediate station," cries Keshub Shan, "the special train runneth direct to heaven;" little children on their mothers' arms travel free.

Saith blind Premdas, I am deluged with tears, O brethren, leave me not behind, I catch hold of your feet.

DR. JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE, of Boston, U.S.A., whose works are always valuable, and whose literary productiveness astonishes us, has just brought out a new book, entitled "Events and Epochs in Religion. Being the substance of a course of Twelve Lectures delivered in the Lowell Institute." The subjects treated are "The Catacombs," "The Buddhist Monks of Central Asia," "The Christian Monks and Monastic Life," "Augustine, Anselm, Bernard, and their Times," "Jeanne d'Arc," "Savonarola and the Renaissance," "Luther and the Reformation," "Loyola and the Jesuits," "George Fox and the Quakers," "The Huguenots," "John Wesley and his Times." The main idea which these lectures enforce is, that no historic event is so important as the advent of a conviction of a new truth. "I have tried to show," says Mr. Clarke, "the power of such convictions in the human soul to build up institutions, to change the course of events, and to alter the tendencies of human affairs; and that, among all convictions, there are none so strong, permanent, and unconquerable as religious convictions."

JUST as we are recording the lamented death of Dr. Bellows, of New York, we read in the Christian Register the following brief notice:—

The Rev. Dr. Bellows's New Year sermon was on Intuition and Experience. It was marked by a breadth of sympathy for the young, peculiarly beautiful in one who has garnered up such riches of experience. The discourse was a noble rebuke to pessimism and cynicism. It is the hollow heart which discovers the hollowness of the world. The rooted conviction of man's baseness is not seldom a projection of self. If the world within us is sound and sweet, the world without will not seem so bad. Therefore, the beginning of all social reform is the reform within.

FEW of our readers have any idea of the salaries which are given to some of the leading ministers in New York. It is stated by a well-informed religious paper that Dr. Dix, Minister of Trinity Church, receives £2,000 a year; Mr. Morgan, £1,600; Mr. Hall, £4,000. Marriages and funerals considerably increase these amounts. Dr. Talmage of the Tabernacle receives £1,400, but his income is as much as £4,000, for he charges from £25 to £50 for each of his lectures. Henry Ward Beecher receives a salary of £5,000, the largest paid in the United States to any minister, exactly the income of an English bishop, and he also has from £40 to £50 for each of his lectures. The late Dr. Bellows received from various sources £4,000, and there are about 20 other ministers in the city of New York alone who receive from £2,000 to £2,400 a year. On the other hand, it must be remembered that the expenses of living in New York are much greater than even in London or Paris, so that these salaries would represent at least one-third less than the same amount here. But even with this qualification these are truly episcopal incomes.

Brahmo Public Opinion announces the appearance of the "Brahmo Pocket Almanac for 1882," published by order of the General Committee of the Sadharan Brahmo Somaj. It is the work of Babu Shib Chunder Deb, the President of the Sadharan Brahmo Somaj, and does infinite credit to him. Everything connected with the Brahmo Somajes in different parts of the country is carefully noticed—Brahmo mottoes, principles of Brahmoism, meditations and prayers, important events in the history of the Brahmo Somaj, Anusthans or Brahmo rites, a list of the Brahmo marriages, of marriage registrars, and of Brahmo Somajes, institutions under the management of Brahmos, periodicals under Brahmo management, new publications, and the result of the census taken of Anusthanik Brahmos. The future historian of the Brahmo Somaj will find ample materials from this little book. Although it purports to be a Brahmo Almanac, the general public will also find information of varied kind.

THE French journals see clearly that Orthodox bigotry—or what they call "clericalism"—is at the root of the opposition to Mr. Bradlaugh's just political claims. La France, for instance, says Mr. Bradlaugh is a victim of the narrow clericalism which would make a political assembly a Christian council. His personality disappears, it thinks, before the immense cause he represents—that of liberty of conscience.

WE regret to hear that Berthold Auerbach, one of the greatest novelists and poets Germany has produced this century, breathed his last on Thursday, at Cannes, whither he had resorted to recover his health. It is stated that Auerbach, who is of Jewish origin, had been much troubled of late by the Jew-baiting which has become so prevalent in Germany. Auerbach lived for his country, wrote for his country, and loved his country, and has now been helped to his grave by unscrupulous German "Jingoes."

ROTHERHAM.—On Sunday last the Hospital collections at the Church of Our Father, amounted to the sum of £13 12s. 3½d; the minister, the Rev. Wm. Blazeby, B.A., being the preacher.

MANCHESTER.—On Tuesday evening a lecture was delivered to the members of the Beard Memorial Union in the Memorial Hall, by the Rev. J. E. Odgers, M.A., on "Dr. John Byrom, of Manchester, and some of his Contemporaries." Mr. F. W. Holland occupied the chair. The subject was admirably treated, and at the close of the lecture remarks were made by Mr. Alderman Bowes, Messrs. W. H. Bailey and J. Evans.

THE LONDON SCHOOL BOARD held its weekly meeting on Thursday. Mr. Freeman, chairman of the Finance Committee, made his annual statement as to the estimated cost of education during the ensuing year. The precepts to be issued to the rating authorities are very slightly above those of last year, and the rate is under 6d. in the pound, notwithstanding that 24,000 additional children have to be educated. An amendment reducing the estimates was submitted and discussed. Ultimately the proposition of Mr. Freeman was agreed to almost unanimously. A letter was ordered to be addressed to the Education Department with reference to a proposal to divide Lambeth into two divisions.

Lectures on the Origin and Growth of Religion as Illustrated by some points in the History of Indian Buddhism. Being the Hibbert Lectures for 1881, by T. W. Rhys Davids. Williams and Norgate.

When Gotama Buddha preached, and taught the common people in the country round the sacred city of Benares, he is supposed to have used one of the vernacular dialects of India. After his death the Buddhist missionaries carried the words of their Master, and translated them, as Christian missionaries did the words of Christ into the language of other countries. Hence is it that while the exact words which Buddha spoke are as unknown as are the Syro-chaldaic words of Christ, their meaning is found enshrined in the Sacred Books of Ceylon, Thibet, Nepal, China, Burmah and Siam, Mongolia and Japan. The Books of Ceylon are written in Pāli, and are among the most ancient. They were put into their present form within the early period between 400 B.C. and 250 B.C. "For this period, they have preserved for us," say the Committee of the Pāli Text Society, "a record quite uncontaminated by any outside influence of the every-day beliefs and customs of a people nearly related to ourselves, just as they were passing through the first stages of civilisation." Mr. Rhys Davids is one of the few Pāli scholars in England, and he has used the Pāli Texts as the foundation of his Hibbert Lectures. He has already told the story of Buddha's life and teaching in the excellent Manual published by the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, and he now grapples with the problem—What is the true position of Buddhism in the general religious history not only of India, but also of the world? In the history of Buddhism he sees "an epitome of the religious history of mankind," and by applying the comparative method he endeavours to ascertain the process by which men have come to believe as they do. While he modestly professes to "touch the fringe only" of this great subject, he yet lays so firm a hand upon it that his lectures form a most valuable contribution to the study of the Philosophy of Religion.

When Professor Max Müller inaugurated the Hibbert Lectures in the Chapter-house of Westminster Abbey he traced the growth and development of the religious thought of India from its childhood in the hymns of the Veda, through its manhood in the ritual of the Brāhmanas, to its old age in the philosophical dialogues of the Upanishads. The ideas which in the Rig-Veda "appear only like the first dim stars, become more numerous and more brilliant as time goes on, till at last they form a perfect galaxy in the Upanishads, the last literary compositions which belong to the Vedic period, and which stand unrivalled in the literature of India, nay, in the literature of the world." The object of the Upanishads is to show the worthlessness of all ritual and sacrificial observances; and to lead men to know the Great Soul of all, so that a man's own self may be united to the Supreme Being, who is the only True Self. This knowledge of the self represents the highest point of the old Indian philosophy; and it is difficult to see what further step was even possible on the old lines. It is at this point that Mr. Rhys Davids takes up the history of the development of Indian religious thought, for as he writes:—

The distinguishing characteristic of Buddhism is that it started on a new line, and looked at the deepest questions men have to solve from an entirely different standpoint than did the Upanishads. It swept away from the field of its vision the whole of the great soul-theory which had hitherto so completely filled and dominated the minds of the superstitious and of the thoughtful alike. For the first time in the history of the world it proclaimed a salvation which each man could gain for himself and by himself, in this world and during this life, without any reference to God, or to gods, either great or small. Like the Upanishads, it placed the first importance on knowledge; but it was no longer a knowledge of God, it was a clear perception of the real nature, as they supposed it to be, of men and things. And it added to the necessity of knowledge, the necessity of purity, of courtesy, of uprightness, of peace, and of universal love, "far-reaching, grown great, and beyond measure."

All men, without distinction of caste or of race, were invited to join the new sect, for which the only qualification was earnest aspiration after a higher and nobler life. They were to strive, says the Sutta, to be

"Full of confidence, modest in heart, ashamed of wrong, full of learning, strong in energy, active in mind, . . . they are to live in the practice of those virtues which, when unbroken and unspotted, make men free, and which are untarnished by the belief in the efficacy of any outward acts of ritual and ceremony, or by the hope of any kind of future life."

This extract contains some essential characteristics of Buddhism. It teaches that virtue is to be cultivated for its own sake, that ritual is useless, and that the desire for a future life is a "fetter" of the mind, and a "spiritual bondage," which must be broken before the "noble salvation of freedom" is reached in this life. To attain to this state is to enter Nirvana. Nirvana is a word that means "the going out, the becoming extinct," and refers not to the extinction of the soul, but to the going out of the cravings and desires of life, and to the extinction of the three fires that consume a man,—lust, hatred, and delusion. The nearest analogue to the Buddhist Nirvana in Western thought is found in the Christian phrases "the kingdom of heaven within you," the "peace which passeth all understanding shall keep your heart and mind." We are told that a woman seeing Gotama Bhudda said, in words which reminds us of the story in the Gospel:—

Blessed be thy father, blessed be thy mother, and blessed be thy wife," but he answered, "By what can every heart as well as mine attain to this lasting blessedness of happiness and peace? When the fire of lust is gone out, when the fires of hatred and delusion are gone out, when pride and all other sins have ceased, then peace is gained! Sweet is the lesson this woman teaches me, for the Nirvana of Peace is that which I have been trying to find out."

Mr. Davids aptly places side by side with this passage the following from F. W. Robertson:—

Peace is the opposite of passion, and of labour, toil, and trouble . . . that state in which there are no desires—in which there is no remorse, no misery, no sting. And to this, says the Apostle, ye are called—the grand peculiar call of Christianity—the call, "Come unto me all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you—REST."

It was the distinguishing characteristic of Gotama, and made him the "very Buddha," that he not only found rest and peace for himself, but that he offered and imparted it to others. In order to attain to this Nirvana of rest and peace he taught that it was necessary to follow the "excellent way" of self-culture, and self-control. That "way" was found by grasping the four conditions of "the noble conduct of life, the noble earnestness in meditation, the noble kind of wisdom, and the noble salvation of freedom." When these four things are "seen face to face and are comprehended," then is the craving for existence rooted out, and there is no more birth. To point out the path of escape from this craving was the chief aim of Gotama; for the craving after existence is the cause of men being born again into this world of misery and sorrow.

Buddha's doctrine of pre-existence must be carefully distinguished from the Pythagorean, and the Transmigration theory current in India before his time. The doctrine of the transmigration of souls did not exist in the early Vedic period, but it was completely accepted in India at the time when the Upanishads were composed, about 600 B.C. "This doctrine," says Mr. Davids, "has never been found mentioned at all, or even referred to in the Pāli Pitakas, and I have no hesitation in maintaining, therefore, that Gotama, did not teach the transmigration of souls." What he did teach was the transmigration of character, or more properly, the doctrine of "Karma." Gotama Buddha held that after the death of any being, whether human or not, there only survived that being's "Karma,"—the result, that is, of his mental and bodily actions. Each individual, therefore, is the last inheritor and last result of the Karma of a long series of past individuals. This theory, formulated by Gotama, is based upon "the earnest seeking after a cause, and the overpowering sense of the necessity of justice." It therefore is in agreement not only with the modern speculations which explain each man's character by the character he inherited from his ancestors, formed through an endless series of past existences, but also with the problem of the Book of Job, that the actual distribution of good fortune or of bad is entirely independent of the moral qualities which men call good or evil. He taught a real connection of cause and effect between the present and the past, in making each man to be in his present life the product, in the way of natural consequence, of that which he had made himself in the past. The new birth of the individual is said to be caused by a craving desire, a particular thirst of the creature when dying. This idea finds a curious coincidence in Plato (Phaedo 69), who, when adopting the Pythagorean transmigration suggested that the souls wander about the invisible world, until, "through the craving after the corporeal, which never leaves them, they are finally imprisoned in another body;" but that, "the philosopher or lover of learning, who is entirely pure at the time of his departure, is alone permitted to attain to the divine nature." This coincidence Mr. Rhys Davids regards as

A very striking instance of the most important fact which the comparative study of Buddhism has to show—the fact that, given similar conditions, similar stages in the course of religious inquiry, men's thoughts, even in spite of the most unquestioned individual originality, and though they have never produced quite the same results, have tended in similar directions.*

Mr. Davids treats with great skill the problem of the striking resemblance and the not less striking difference between the effects of causes which must have operated in the history of early Christianity and of early Buddhism, such as are seen in the outward condition under which both religions arose, in the mental qualities of the early disciples, and in their personal feelings towards the Christ in the one case and towards the Buddha in the other. He points out that the earliest Buddhist ideas of Gotama were influenced by two ideals which in those days dominated the minds of men. The one, the ideal of a king of righteousness, the other, the ideal of a wise man. Gotama became in the minds of his followers the personification of Righteousness, and the personification of Wisdom. The picture of the ideal king is given in the story that when he was once proceeding in a royal progress, the people besought him, "O King, pass slowly by, that thy people may look upon thee for a longer time"; and he said, "Drive the chariot slowly, charioteer, that I may look upon my people for a longer time." Such is the mutual love which reigns in the golden age between king and people. He is described in the Suttas as "a king of kings, a righteous man ruling righteously." In comparing this with the Jewish ideal of the Messiah we observe that while they differ in detail because they grew out of different experiences, and are clothed in words of different literatures, yet when they came to be applied to a living person, the Christian Messiah is as much nobler a conception of the first-century Jews as is the Buddhist king of righteousness of the previous Hindu conception of the King of kings. In each case the teacher is put in the place of the king, and the ideal kingdom finds its home in the hearts of men. Again, the Buddhist gives the most gorgeous description of the earthly "imperial palace," where Gotama came to live the life of a despised mendicant and a lonely homeless wanderer; and the Christian describes how Jesus laid aside his glory to take upon him the nature of man and humble himself to the death on the Cross—showing that the deepest impression made on the disciples of both was the lesson of divine self-sacrifice. "The Great Renunciation" is a watchword of the Buddhist. "I lay down my life" of the Christian. The second ideal is the ideal of wisdom. It also existed before the time of Gotama. It was held that from time to time there appear in the world "very Buddhas,"—or wise men, for the word Buddha is the Sanskrit form of the Greek δίδα, and the Latin video, and signifies knowledge, or spiritual insight. Gotama Buddha was only one link in the chain of Buddhas who had preceded and who are to follow him. A "very Buddha" is one who not only himself "understands, and sees, as it were, face to face, but who also makes his knowledge known to others, both in its letter and its spirit." This idea is very similar to that of the Christian "Logos." These two ideals were the principal influences in determining the opinions of the early Buddhists and the early Christians as to the person of their Masters. The method followed in the biographies of Christ and of Buddha is "the same, and it led to similar results, though the details are in no particular quite identical."

The resemblance of the legends of the birth of Buddha to those of the birth of Christ gives rise to the question whether the latter, which are five hundred years later in date, might not have been borrowed from the former? This subject has been most ably and exhaustively treated by Mr. Ernst de Bunsen in the "Angel-Messiah," a work full to overflowing with scholarship. We quite concur, however, with Mr. Davids's conclusion:—

There is no evidence whatever of any actual and direct communication of any of these ideas from the East to the West. When the Gospel narratives resemble the Buddhist, they seem to have been independently developed on the shores of the Mediterranean and in the valley of the Ganges; and strikingly similar as they often appear at first sight, the slightest comparison is sufficient to show that they rest throughout on a basis of doctrine fundamentally opposed, . . . the similarities of idea are evidences . . . of similar feelings engendered in men's minds by similar experiences. And when it is considered that only twice in the history of the world have all the circumstances combined to render the origin of such ideas possible, it must be acknowledged that the lessons drawn from the study of early Buddhism may be found as useful for the true appreciation of early Christianity as the Vedas are useful for the true appreciation of classical mythology.

These are some of the interesting comparisons made between Buddhism and Christianity. Mr. Davids does not compare Buddhism with the other historical religions. Had the time at his disposal permitted, he might have pointed out resemblances which apparently unite religions essentially different, differences which apparently separate religions closely united. In applying the comparative method, the work of Philosophy is to seek for the clue to the spiritual meaning of the positive religions, to ascertain the principle of thought, of order, and of law which underlies their resemblances and their diversities, and which binds them together in organic unity; and so to grasp that unification which is characteristic of all developing thought. The principle of this unification is found in the essential idea of religion, which, manifesting itself in the outward form of positive religions, remains constant and unchangeable throughout all time. In this essential idea we find the clue to the significance of the positive religions, and the standard which determines their relative place and their value in the ascending scale that marks the evolution of the religious consciousness of mankind. It is to this essential idea of religion that St. Augustine refers in the ever-memorable words:—

"The essence (res ipsa) of that which is now called the Christian religion existed in the ancient world. Never, indeed, was it lacking since the human race began till the day when Christ came in the flesh. Henceforth, true religion, which already existed, took the name of Christianity."

How this implicit revelation became explicit* is one of the great problems of the Philosophy of Religion.

The Nineteenth Century. Kegan Paul and Trench. The Contemporary Review. Strahan and Co.

The Nineteenth Century is not to our minds so attractive as usual, and for once, we think, must yield the palm to its rival the Contemporary.

There are two articles in the Nineteenth bearing on theological subjects. The first—which is in many respects the most interesting in the number—is entitled "The Wish to Believe," and is in the form of a dialogue in a Catholic College, between two of the Professors,—one of them a convert, the other Catholic born,—and a barrister, a graduate of Muriel (Oriol or Balliol) College, Oxford, and a sceptical man of the world. The writer, Wilfrid Ward, is, we presume, a member of the well-known Catholic family of that name; and his main position is indicated in the following sentence:—"I was determined to get at the truth," replied Walton. "I believed Christianity to be the truth, and I was resolved, if there was a way to seeing its truth more clearly, that I would find it; and I have found it." The dialogue reminds us of some of Mr. W. H. Mallock's, but it is far superior, and has the ring of genuineness and sincerity about it. The other theological article is on "The Babylonian Account of the Deluge," by the Rev. Dr. Wright, an interesting Essay on Comparative Mythology, although the writer would probably not allow that the account in Genesis is essentially of the nature of a myth.

The Contemporary Review has two papers bearing more or less directly on theological matters. "Free Thought: French and English," by W. S. Lilly; and "Has Science yet found a basis for Morality?" by Goldwin Smith. The former is written with a strong bias against "free thought" in France, which takes the form of a vehement anti-clericalism combined with an indiscriminate rejection of all religion. Several extracts are quoted from the Catéchisme du Libre Penseur, which certainly show an intensely strong anti-religious spirit; but the writer omits to notice that this is the almost inevitable reaction from the fierce persecuting spirit of Romanism, wherever it is the dominant faith. We hope to notice this paper more at length in a separate article. Mr. Goldwin Smith's article is in the main an examination of Mr. Herbert Spencer's philosophy of morality, as expounded in his "Data of Ethics." He seeks to show that Mr. Spencer fails in his attempt to find a moral sanction, independent alike of religion or of the idea of duty.

The Nineteenth Century is strong this month in political articles. First comes "The Clôture and the Tories," by Lord Sherbrooke (Mr. Lowe), who exaggerates, we think, the dangers of obstruction, while he lectures the Tories for their threatened opposition to the Government propositions. In his essay on "Political Opportunism," the Marquis of Blandford, writing from the standpoint of philosophical Liberalism, discusses effete old Whiggism. Radicalism, the Population question, Education, Emigration, and nearly the whole programme of present day politics. The following is one of the most interesting passages of a very able Essay:—

The Church, if it is to exist as an institution would do well to take an active part in the scheme of general liberal education of the people. It is quite as much interested as the politician in the problem of the future. Its own existence is not assured to it by a lease in perpetuity. Its nine millions a year of revenue is not intended solely to enable it to maintain a genteel class of teachers of one particular view of the dogmas of Christianity. The example of family improvidence, which many of its members are not ashamed to be guilty of, is not one whit less mournful as an example to the poorer classes than the irresponsible rubbish which the politician often thinks fit to discharge himself of for the benefit of the free and independent electors. Some persons would seem to think that, because within the last few years an embryonic system of primary education, founded on a more or less religious basis, has been provided for the people, we are at liberty to rest and be thankful that the country possesses the necessary machinery for civilising the labouring classes. Education, however, is unworthy of its name if it is simply to stop short at a system of pedantic book-teaching flavoured with an admixture of mild, undenominational religious teaching. The narrow-minded education of the school of Jesuits, with its solid backbone of fanaticism, would be better than such colloidal stuff as the present Board Schools sometimes offer under the name of national education.

The remaining political articles are "The Review of the French Constitution," written, we are glad to see, in vindication of the greatly-misunderstood policy of Gambetta, by M. Joseph Reinach; "Breakers Ahead," a discussion of financial and fiscal questions from the American point of view, by F. B. Thurber, member of the New York Chamber of Commerce; "Opium and England's Duty," a reply, by Storrs Turner, to the paper on the same question by Sir Rutherford Alcock, in the last number, which defended the opium duty and abnegated England's duty: "The Conflict in Germany," a vigorous philippic against Bismarckism and Imperialism, by the old revolutionist, Karl Blind; and "The Grievances of the Farmers," a conclusive reply by James W. Barclay, M.P., to Sir Bartle Frere rampliant Toryism, as manifested in the last number by his vindication of the landlordism in Aberdeenshire, against which the most intelligent and scientific farmers are rebelling. "The Proposed Channel Tunnel" is written in somewhat of an alarmist spirit by Admiral Lord Dunsany, in vehement opposition to the scheme of the South-Eastern Railway Company. There is no contribution to pure literature or science this month, unless we may include under the latter heading the only remaining article, "The Uselessness of Vivisection," by Mrs. Algernon Kingsford, M.D. The writer endeavours to show that the balance of evidence is against the claim of vivisection to contribute a serious method of study for the cure and treatment of disease, and that it is a method the nature of which renders it inimical to the objects of practical medicine. With some exaggeration, characteristic, we fear, of the leaders in this movement, she concludes by defining the position of the leading champions of vivisection as "repudiation of the religious and sympathetic sentiments, and of the doctrine of man's moral responsibility as superstitious and untenable."

* Mr. Rhys Davids refers to Lessing's view on pre-existence, but he is not apparently aware that the subject is treated fully in Die Erziehung des Menschengeschlechts, where Lessing is compelled to adopt it by the exigency of his argument.

Returning to the Contemporary, the Duke of Argyll writes on "Agricultural Depression" from the landlords' point of view. He thinks the depression wholly due to bad seasons, and looks forward to the revival of British agriculture with the reappearance of the sun. He lays great stress on the continuous corn-cropping advocated by Mr. Prout, and appears to think that much may be done in this direction. By the way, some interesting remarks are dropped on the right division of the work of "improvement" between the landlord and the tenant. In "How Money Does its Work" Professor Bonamy Price replies to M. de Laveleye, and incidentally takes occasion to break a lance with the bimetalists. "O. K."—Madam Novikoff—in an article on "The Crisis in Serbia," discusses the ecclesiastico-political crisis in that country, from the Russian and Greek Church point of view. In his article on "Municipal Government of London" Mr. Benjamin Scott, the City Chamberlain, no doubt represents the views generally entertained by those who are interested in maintaining the present system. The main drift of his paper is that the City will resist any scheme for "absorbing all London and all its governing bodies into one vast corporation," but will, on the other hand, regard with satisfaction the conferment of corporate independence upon the outlying parliamentary boroughs of the Metropolis.

One of the most interesting papers in this number, although bristling with statistics, is Mr. M. G. Mulhall's, on "The Rise of the Middle Class." Mr. Mulhall answers the common statement that in modern England the rich are getting richer, and the poor poorer, by an examination of the figures which show on the contrary that wealth has never been so widely diffused as now, the middle class never so large, and the working class never so well off. The only remaining papers are "The Functions of Wealth," a characteristic essay, by W. H. Mallock, and "The Art of Watts," a fine and appreciative while discriminating piece of art criticism, by Harry Quilter.

Literary Notes.

A SECOND rudimentary book on legible shorthand will be issued on the 15th inst., entitled "Monosyllabic and Progressive Exercises," being an alphabetical list of all short words, classed according to the rules of the system, with numerous illustrations and exercises.

The February number of the Antiquary contains an article on "St. Valentine's Day," in which the associations that have accidentally grown up around the day of St. Valentine, priest and martyr, are fully treated of. The author sets himself to explain how it is that England (in common with France and the Netherlands) has become a special valentine district, and quotes largely from Chaucer downwards in illustration of this point.

The well-known book, "Philosophy in Sport," was used by its author, Dr. Paris, as the vehicle for satire on his acquaintance at Penzance. Mr. G. A. Boase has written a curious key to this book, which appears in the February number of the Bibliographer. Among others, it contains an amusing anecdote of Mr. Tremeneere, who had but a small congregation, but on one occasion when a stranger was announced to preach a good congregation assembled. As the clergyman was going into the pulpit Mr. Tremeneere pulled him back, saying he would preach them one of his own sermons instead.

STILL more sixpenny editions. A sixpenny People's Edition of "Tom Brown's School-days" will be published by Messrs. Macmillan and Co. on the 6th March. It will contain all the illustrations by Messrs. Arthur Hughes and Sydney P. Hall which appear in the ordinary editions of the book. Messrs. Bradbury, Agnew and Co. will issue next week for sixpence "Mrs. Caudle's Curtain Lectures," by Douglas Jerrold, with sixty illustrations by Charles Keene. Carefulness in printing will be the feature of this edition, so that the cuts shall be as well brought up as in books of higher price.

A SERIES of papers on Mr. Ruskin and his teachings will be contributed to the new series of House and Home by Mr. Edmund J. Baillie, of the Ruskin Society.

THE American Library Association has prepared a Bill to be laid before Congress by which one library in each congressional district, as well as another to be named by the representative, and also every library in the United States containing over 100,000 volumes, shall receive gratuitously all public documents ordered to be printed, provided that the libraries undertake to preserve them for public use.

A NEW edition of the "Bibliography" of Ruskin, corrected and augmented to the present time, is in the press, and will be issued shortly by Mr. Elliot Stock.

It is announced that, at the instance of the Marquis of Lorne, the initiatory steps have been taken for the establishment of an academy of eminent literary and scientific men in Canada, after the plan of the assembly of the Immortals in France. The proposed body is to be composed of six sections, representing English and French letters, history and archaeology, and the mathematical, physical, geological, and biological sciences. It is probable that there will be ten or twelve members in each section. Dr. Dawson is spoken of as the first president.

THE number of publications issuing from the French press last year is officially stated to have been 18,717. These include pictures, maps, music, and photographs, but the books and pamphlets nevertheless number 12,261, which is more than double the number of publications ordinarily appearing in Great Britain of which we have any record. In France, however, the "dépôt légal" includes numerous publications of an ephemeral kind which in England are apt to escape notice. It is observed that the above figures show a slight falling off as compared with the preceding two years.

A JOURNAL is to be founded in Vienna under the title of the Internationale Kosmopolitische Polyglotte Centralzeitung von Wien. It will contain articles in twelve different languages and dialects.

THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—You were good enough to print a few weeks ago the programme of the National Conference of Unitarian, Free Christian and other non-subscribing congregations, which is to be held in Liverpool on 18th, 19th, and 20th of April. Will you kindly render the Committee further assistance, by inserting in your next issue the accompanying address, in which the Secretaries explain the object of the Conference?

A. W. WORTHINGTON.

Old Swinford, Stourbridge, Feb. 7.

P.S.—Any minister or secretary of a non-subscribing congregation who has not yet received the programme and invitation to the Conference will have them forwarded on application to me.—A. W. W.

"There has long existed among the Unitarian and other Free Churches of the United Kingdom a conviction that they ought and could promote more effectually than at present the cause of true religion, if only the opportunity and method of united action could be provided. Scattered through the kingdom are congregations of faithful men with earnest ministers, who have long been quietly doing a noble work in comparative isolation, and have culled the fruit of rich and varied experience. By means of a National Conference of these Churches it is sought to afford the opportunity for the interchange of these experiences, in the hope that problems which have long disturbed anxious minds may be solved: that lights may be discerned to guide us through ways that have hitherto seemed dark and difficult; that plans may be formed, and resolutions taken which will promote the growth of true religion, strengthen the cause of virtue, and open to our Churches a field for action which they are well fitted to occupy and cultivate.

"The Conference may and ought to bring together all the energy, all the wisdom, all the piety, all the generous sympathy and humanity of the Free Churches; to give them new coherence, to confirm their strength, to develop their life. Among non-subscribing Churches, such as it is sought to bring together, there are, no doubt, 'diversities of gifts, differences of administrations and diversities of operations,' but we believe that it is 'the same Spirit' which actuates them all, 'the same Lord' whom all follow, and we know that it is the same God which worketh all (things) in all.' We trust therefore, that all among us, instead of accentuating the slight differences which seem important when we are separate, will assemble with that generous large-heartedness which acknowledges the reality and worth of our common brotherhood in seeking and declaring the truth of God, in strengthening and extending His kingdom. We appeal to the true genius of our gospel of love for God and man. It can see the good that exists everywhere, and can foster and develop it till it outgrow its imperfections and provide for its deficiencies. It is impossible to foretell what may be accomplished by hearty and united action; sinking all minor differences, and recognising the broad deep sympathies that underlie our whole religious life.

"How far the Conference Committee may have succeeded in giving shape to this general desire for co-operation it is not for us to say; but to their genuine desire and anxious effort to provide the opportunity of free conference for the non-subscribing churches of the United Kingdom we can bear conscientious and emphatic testimony.

"They propose for consideration three subjects of the utmost importance; (1) the development of the religious life within our churches; (2) the practical means by which our churches can enlarge and extend their religious influence; (3) the position of our ministry. These subjects should be discussed in a manner that will lead indirectly, if not directly, to valuable practical results. What resolutions may be passed; what recommendations may be offered to the governing bodies of our existing institutions; what independent committees may be formed; what funds may be raised—these things must be left to the Conference itself, which can alone determine what plans may wisely be adopted.

"We have reason to anticipate the success of the Conference. The Local Committee in Liverpool have entered upon their work with the greatest and most generous spirit. Many ministers and laymen from all parts of the United Kingdom have already announced their intention to be present. Many congregations have chosen delegates. Various Associations in the metropolis and the provinces have already appointed representatives. A spirit of hearty co-operation is making additions to the programme of proceedings prepared by the Committee.

We appeal to the denomination in all its sections to unite heartily and zealously in the determination that this Conference shall be—what all have long desired—the means of enabling the non-subscribing churches of Great Britain and Ireland to assume their true position and power in the religious life of our country.

"H. W. CROSSKEY,

THE Century magazine has secured the right to bring out in serial form an unpublished diary of the late Mr. Carlyle. As we (Athenaeum) read some of it in manuscript about two months ago, we can testify to its merits. It is a full account of a tour in Ireland in 1849, written in the author's raciest style, and containing frank observations on such points of national character as are of the highest interest at the present political juncture. The MS., which is an autograph, was given by him to a friend who is now dead, who preserved it, as a kind of secret treasure, so carefully that its existence was long unknown. Mr. Froude had never heard of it; it has lately passed through his hands, and he has been so deeply impressed with its importance that he has volunteered to write an introduction to it when it ultimately appears in book form, which it will do next October, when it will be published, along with other matter of importance, by Messrs. Sampson Low and Co. The diary opens with a description of Carlyle's going on board, on the 30th of June, 1849, a steamer in the Thames bound for Dublin. The present Irish Secretary was one of his companions in part, at least, of the tour.

Our Contemporaries.

THE MATHEMATICAL TRIPOS.

The Nonconformist writes:—The abolition of the University Tests, which had so long operated as a barrier to the admission of Dissenters to the privileges of the National Universities, opened a new era for Nonconformists, who have not been slow to avail themselves of the opportunity thus afforded. It was customary, when Churchmen were secure against competition at the Universities, to sneer at the educational qualifications of members of our Free Churches. A fair field afforded, the unjustifiable character of that taunt was soon made apparent—not fitfully, but by a long succession of victories. In twenty-two years the distinction of Senior Wrangler has fallen to Nonconformists fifteen times, leaving less than half that number of victories to the most highly-cultured youths connected with the Church of England. We rejoice to believe that this result has been achieved without any spirit of sectarian jealousy being unduly fostered or provoked in University life. The ancient seats of learning, once the preserves of a favoured sect, are now pervaded by an atmosphere of large-hearted liberality which promises well for the future of this country. The advantage of free and fair competition in respect to the honours in the gift of our Universities is as ungrudgingly acknowledged throughout the nation at large, which cannot fail to benefit by the new order of things. The changes which are about to be introduced into the Mathematical Tripos are undertaken under the influence of a similar spirit, and we doubt not that we shall have to record in future years the names of other members who will unmistakably demonstrate that the ardent pursuit of intellectual culture, which under adverse circumstances so markedly characterised the leading friends of Nonconformity, is still cherished with unabated zeal in the more favoured circumstances in which members of the Free Churches now find themselves, as the result of the struggles of their illustrious forefathers, whose names future generations are not likely to permit to pass into oblivion.

THE RELIGIOUS OUTLOOK.

The Springfield Republican, one of the best papers in America, comments as follows on the progress of Protestant thought in Great Britain and America:—

With regard to that progress, which measures without reasonable question the advance of religious life, his conclusions are true. We see at every step the harmonising of religious action by the decrease of religious prejudice. Notwithstanding ecclesiastical trials here and there, there is nothing more plain than that the consensus, the general agreement, of the multiplicity of sects in Protestantism, is that the old dogmas, the old forms, are mere bagatelles, and that the people of all these sects accept worship, duty, and fellowship in each other as equivalents. But this is to confine our consideration to the inside of churches, neglecting the outside forces which are so potent in the community. Materialism will always remain outside, the refuge of the shallow and the vicious, with rarely a misled intellect closed to its own nature, blind and deaf to the myriad aspects and voices of the universe, wandering in that hideous vacancy. Agnosticism is tentative; the mind that says it cannot know may be compelled to know, and meanwhile it may work, as many such a mind does work, to the constant good of its fellows; and such have their reward. Natural revelation is the one embracing, overwhelming faith. Into its ocean, the narrow stream of supernatural revelation must finally merge and be lost. To the soul that believes in the living voice of God forever speaking in the mighty causes and vital emergencies of history, and equally in the daily needs and aspirations of the humblest lives, what is a special and circumscribed appearance at one era or another? To such a one there are newly begotten sons of God for each age, and the bestowals of pentecostal fire each day.

THE CHURCH REFORM UNION.

The Church Times, in a spiteful article against this movement of some Broad Churchmen, contends that their programme means the transformation of the Church of England into an entirely new organism, consisting of different persons from those of which it was originally composed, and existing for different objects from those for which it was at first intended, the idea being borrowed from a writer (Matthew Arnold) "who is not only non-Christian, but even non-Theistic in any coherent sense":—

But the imbecility of the scheme is still more remarkable when it is considered for a moment what would be the practical result on the ministry and the lay fellowship of the Church if the programme of the Church Reform Union could be carried out.

In the first place, there would be an immediate exodus of thousands of the clergy and many ten thousands of the laity. Every one who sets any store by the creeds, the sacraments, the ministry, the whole positive and theological framework of the Church, would at once shake off the dust of his feet from a society which had ceased to be in any intelligible degree Christian. It is clear that when Anglican doctrines and worship had been so altered as to present no difficulty to Mr. Voysey, Dr. Vance Smith, Dr. Tyndall, Mr. Matthew Arnold, Professor Huxley, and Mr. Bradlaugh, there would be no place left for Bishop Wordsworth, Canon Liddon, Lord Shaftesbury, Deans Oakley and Payne Smith, or any other believer in dogmatic Christianity. And so far from attracting in the Nonconformists, all the leading denominations, Methodists, Presbyterians, Congregationalists, Baptists, would be more repelled than ever; while, out of the total of over one hundred and seventy other sects and denominations, we can only find about a dozen from whom recruits could be reasonably looked for. These are the "Eclectics," "Halifax Psychological Society," "Independent Religious Reformers," "Progressionists," "Rational Christians," "Recreative Religionists," "Secularists," "Theistic Church," three varieties of "Unitarians," and "Unsectarian." Probably all these, except the Unitarians and Secularists, could all be got into St. Paul's at once without inconvenient crowding, so that if they were to come over bodily to the new society they would not fill one half of the gaps left by the extruded clergy alone.

PROFESSOR CLIFFE LESLIE.

The Spectator writes of this distinguished economist:—"Professor Cliffe Leslie, whose death took place last week, had long held the Chair of Political Economy and Jurisprudence at the Queen's College, Belfast. It is too soon to form an estimate of the permanent impression which he has made on economic science. He identified himself with the historical or inductive, as distinguished from the deductive, method of political economy, and, indeed, ignored too much the scientific results of the latter method, without which we should not at present have had economical teaching worthy of the name. Although himself somewhat sensitive to criticism, he was an acute and formidable critic of other people's systems. If the political economy of the Mill school is less in favour than it used to be, Leslie's repeated attacks upon the wages-fund theory, upon the assumed uniformity of wages and prices, and upon other doctrines of the orthodox school, are certainly responsible for the change in a considerable degree. His writings, though possibly deficient in scientific precision, abound in varied information; and he enjoyed the advantage, too often wanting in economists, of possessing a graceful and interesting literary style. His writings all take the form of detached essays, contributed to the leading monthly and quarterly reviews. He appears to have intended to produce a more constructive treatise on political economy, founded on historical inquiries; but this, like many other literary undertakings, has been prevented by a too early death."

THE BRADLAUGH CASE.

The Christian World writes:—"What admits of no doubt is that, under one of the most strongly Liberal, nay Radical, Administrations that ever governed England, a large majority of the House of Commons hold that the existing Parliamentary oath excludes atheists, and that notorious atheism to-day has the same effect in empowering the House to exclude a member that notorious Judaism and Catholicism had seventy years ago. It is, therefore, perfectly obvious that, if atheists are to be admitted to the House, they can be admitted only in the same way in which Catholics and Jews were admitted. The door must be constitutionally opened to admit Mr. Bradlaugh as it was to admit Baron Rothschild. We rejoice that the House has asserted its right to treat the oath as a reality, and not as a sham; and since it is an undeniable fact that the invocation of God would be, in the mouth of Mr. Bradlaugh, a meaningless form, we think there is no reply to the argument that the House is bound to refuse its sanction to such an act of profanation.

THE NAMES "UNITARIAN" AND "SOCINIAN."

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—I am much obliged to Dr. Vance Smith for his courteous reception of my letter under this head. There are, however, two points which I do not seem to have made clear.

Doubtless Priestley, in calling himself a Socinian, did not mean that he derived any doctrine from F. Sozzini, as its ultimate source. Neither does a professed Calvinist imply that Calvin is the fons et origo of his creed. Each claims, of course, to take our Lord as the one sole Master. These rival names indicate special schools of Scriptural interpretation and religious philosophy, no more. By the adherent of either school the sectional term is welcomed simply as a convenient definition, marking off clearly what the disciple conceives to be the true line of interpretation of the Master's teaching. The Socinian or the Calvinistic position may have been quite independently reached. On the other hand, it is possible that the later disciple may owe something, perhaps much, to the pioneering and expository work of the particular theologian with whose school, both historically and practically, he owns a connection. It would be wrong to speak of a Socinian Church in the absence of evidence for collective Socinianism, in the shape, for example, of a binding creed, or a proved consensus of doctrinal belief. But we may fairly describe individuals as Socinians: unless, indeed, they warn us that the classification is distasteful to them.

Dr. Vance Smith still thinks that the Evangelical "worship of Christ" is practically one with the much canvassed but little known Socinian tenet as to invocation. If so, the converse must be true; viz., that the Socinian tenet is substantially Evangelical. Hence it will follow that both Sozzini himself and his "orthodox" critics fell into the strange error of seeing a radical difference, where there is nothing but identity. I believe I was correct in saying that the "orthodox" Protestant worships Christ simply on the ground that he is God Most High. The Catholic, I know, worships also the sacred humanity of Jesus. Sozzini does not; he expressly argues against it. Indeed he does not employ the general term worship (or any of its Latin equivalents) in the formulation of his doctrine. He defines as adoratio the reverential attitude of the soul towards Christ, which he maintains will and must be present in every true Christian. This, on his system, does not necessarily lead to any outward act; and of course it is a feeling which admits of degrees. Whether we think his term a fortunate one or not there is little, so far, to separate him from any class of Christians. But further, he permits, without however enjoining, what he calls invocatio, and here he clashes not only with the Orthodox but with the Arians, as well as with the more "advanced" anti-Trinitarians of his day. By invocatio he means the presenting to Christ, as the subordinate officer of God, petitions relating exclusively to spiritual matters. Now I can hardly conceive that any one should regard this as an Evangelical view. Indeed, I find it difficult to account for its proving satisfactory to any mind. As Sozzini himself admits, the tendency of his permission is to allow a subordinate to fill a place practically more honoured (honoratio) than that assigned to the Creator. But it may be recollected that Sozzini's whole doctrine of prayer is somewhat peculiar. While he rightly treats the particular exercise of prayer as a thing quite separate and distinct from the permanent devotion of the heart, it is strange to find him strenuously denying that Scripture embodies any express injunction to pray at all. And though he owns that a pious mind will naturally resort to prayer—a contingency foreseen by Scripture, which contains enactments in that case made and provided—yet heavenly sets a much higher value on prayer as a public offering than as a private practice. I find no trace in his writings of any actual invocation of Christ, or, except in a few epistolary phrases commending his friends to God, of prayer in any sense.

It is apart from the question, but may not be without interest in view of a current controversy, to note the fact that, in commenting upon the Lord's Prayer, Sozzini argues strongly for "Deliver us from the evil one," in the sense of Satan. Also in Matt. v. 37 he adopts the rendering "Whatsoever is more than these is of the evil one," again in the sense of Satan. In both these cases I prefer his rendering to his interpretation. The Quarterly Reviewer scents

Socialism in the Revisers' margin, but does not instance these palpable texts, though he belabours here the judgment of the Revisers.

"THE IRISH QUESTION."

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—Your correspondent "W.W." in his accusation of the Land League, and defence of the policy of coercion, shelters himself beneath the shield of the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, of whose defence he says, "My letter of the 14th ult. was substantially an endorsement."

Well, if it were needful for him to endorse the statements of the highly esteemed President of the Board of Trade it may be permitted to me, if believing they were founded on the misrepresentations of the League's enemies, at least so far to question them; and as I was a member of that League, and took, of course, some interest in its working, I might be credited with as much knowledge of its purposes and doings as those gentlemen who had no such means of information.

But the most important part of these statements I have no reason to question. I am even thankful to Mr. Chamberlain for his bold defence of "the avowed objects of the League"—a defence which went the round of all the papers—a defence for which Mr. Chamberlain has been much censured publicly by his enemies, though your correspondent again, with a Rip van Winkle simplicity, takes merit to himself for having disinterred it from the sepulchre of The Truthseeker.

It is only where Mr. Chamberlain speaks of "the means by which the League sought to advance its objects" that I confidently venture to impugn the accuracy of his statements. He says those means were—"cruelty to animals, arson, outrage, even assassination." Of course no man who has any regard for his own character and safety, any more than a "Liberal Ministry," will say that these are "permissible instruments for effecting political reforms." But where are the facts in the whole constitution and proceedings of the Land League to substantiate such a statement? Can he lay his hand on any document bearing the stamp of its authority—publicly or privately issued by its secretaries, to convict it of inciting to these offences? Or does he mean to accuse C. S. Parnell, John Dillon, Mr. Sexton, our representatives in Parliament and leaders of this movement, of designedly inciting to "cruelty to animals, to arson, outrage, and even assassination?" If he have such facts or documents to warrant him, then I say it was the paramount duty of a Liberal Ministry not only to disapprove its action, and imprison its leaders, but to bring these men to trial, and to convict them by such documents of such horrible crimes. This is an issue which its own character, not only for liberality but justice, imperatively demands of it—which our boasted maxim of English law, that no man is to be held as guilty till convicted, itself demands. For so long as a Liberal Ministry retain these men in prison as "suspects," only so long they set us Irish an example of outraging the law and violating justice.

I do not, of course, speak of the "no rent" manifesto, which, whether unjustifiable or otherwise, cannot be pleaded in justification of their imprisonment, as it was not issued till those men were incarcerated. And if unjustifiable, as is alleged, why were they, though in prison, not regularly prosecuted for it? Besides, what evidence is there to show that the organisation of the League was responsible for it. Many members and friends of the League, like Archbishop Fisher, publicly disapproved. And unless we class Irish landlords amongst "animals" it cannot be pleaded as inciting to cruelty to such, much less to "arson, outrage, or assassination."

As to the action of individual members, or even of local branches, such as that of the Cork branch in Dr. Webster's case, to which "W.W." refers, I think it needless to speak, as Mr. Chamberlain is quite capable of discriminating, and much too just, I believe, to attribute such action to the regular organisation. As well might we attribute to the late Earls Grey and Russell, and other advocates of a Reform in Parliament, the various excesses then so common throughout England. The Land League was avowedly an open and constitutional organisation. It is to be judged on its own merits, not by the actions of Captain Moonlight, and every ruffian throughout the country. Having learned by dear experience, for which he paid the penalty, the sad effects of secret organisations in the Fenian movement, the founders of the League resolved it should be organised and conducted upon open and constitutional principles, and strictly bound by legal limits. If its leaders have violated these principles, let them be convicted, and punished for it. But it is hardly fair, even for the President of the Board of Trade, to take advantage of his high position to brand men, hitherto deemed "honourable," with the crime of inciting to "arson, outrage, and assassination," without bringing them to trial or giving them an opportunity to defend themselves, much less is it conducive to promote peace and amity betwixt our two respective countries, both subject to the Crown. Clonmel, Feb. 6.

J. ORR.

P.S.—Had this letter not been already too long I would have noticed Mr. Chamberlain's charges against Mr. Parnell for estimating "land at its value when the flood left it"—a charge which your correspondent has marked in italics. If he did so, however, it is no more than what the Right Hon. John Bright did when he said, Take away the tenant's improvements, and nine-tenths of the land in Ireland will be as destitute of all such as the prairies of America. And "Healy's clause" of the Land Act, as it is called, actually legalises the statement by making all such improvements where uncompensated for, the property of the tenant.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—"W.W." repeats the now rather shady phrase as to Mr. Chamberlain's "masterly defence" of the policy of arrest in Ireland, but he fails to produce anything to justify the epithet. Mr. Chamberlain implies that the Land League "sought to advance" its objects by means of "cruelty to animals, arson, outrage, even assassination," but the proof has never been given, and the evidence steadily flows the other way. I have lying before me a copy of "Instructions to Organisers and Officers of Branches," sent in 1880 from the central office of the Land League. In this document I find the most explicit and solemn directions to avoid all acts of violence, and especially condemning the injuring of cattle. Michael Davitt, a few days before his arrest, said in a private letter, "We must redouble our efforts in the work of educating public opinion to show how strenuously the League discountenances outrages of every kind." It harmonises with the temper of the English public just now to believe everything that is bad of Irish politicians and reformers; but justice will be done in time.

Mr. Chamberlain, in defending the Government policy, cites Mr. Parnell's grim reference to the "prairie value" of land in Ireland; but what had that to do with the policy of arrest, unless Mr. Chamberlain means to imply that a man's economical heresies, or that a man's wild estimate of the value of land forms a reason for clapping him into gaol without even a trial! Mr. Chamberlain also says that when the Land Act was passed continued agitation could only have had for its aim the "unavowed object" which he wishes us to believe was and is Home Rule or a repeal of the Union. But, even admitting that, does Mr. Chamberlain imply that agitation for Home Rule or for a repeal of the Union is to be met by lettres de cachet? That is all very well in Russia, but it will not do here. And yet this is all that "W.W." quotes from the "masterly defence." But he quoted all that was quotable. Will some one tell us plainly, not as an official, but as an Englishman and a Liberal, for what Michael Davitt, John Dillon, Stewart Parnell, Dr. Kelly, and hundreds of other "suspects" are in prison; and what principles of Liberalism justify their arbitrary arrest, and their detention without trial or explanation?

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—The statements in the letter of "Consistency," in the Inquirer of Jan. 28, are incorrect, inconsistent, and altogether misleading. From the absence of the term Unitarian on our signboard at Paradise-street Chapel, Maclesfield, he argues we ought to have no record in the Almanac of the Unitarian and Free Churches. But the signboard at Parsonage-street Chapel, with which "Consistency" is connected, is as bare of any recognition of Unitarianism as that at Paradise-street. How, then, can the editor of the Almanac exclude one place from the list and not exclude the other? Again, the Chapel at King Edward-street, with which the writer is also connected, has no signboard at all, nor any outward indication of what kind of place it is. If, therefore, the editor of the Almanac, for want of a satisfactory definition and use of the term Unitarian, should begin the process of exclusion, he would have to make a clean sweep and disfranchise all three chapels at once. The town is already disfranchised politically. It would then, so far as Unitarianism is concerned, be disfranchised theologically.

Again, says "Consistency," we have "Trance Speakers" at Paradise-street. Well, and at some chapels they match us with "Trance Sleepers," and if they should continue to increase at the present rate, it may shortly be said after each service, "They all slumbered and slept." But why complain about that? Each party gets, we suppose, what it best likes. Still, again, says the writer, we have "Inspiration Orators." Well, and some chapels have Platitude Mumbblers. But why seek to exclude each other from the Almanac for such trivial matters as these? Again, says the writer, "In no recognised sense are we Unitarians." Certainly there is no sense in that statement, nor any truth. It is well known that a number of our members at Paradise-street are also members of one or other of the two older congregations at the present time. A considerable number have altogether left the two older congregations and are quite as good Unitarians as any they have left behind. The truth of the whole matter is, that the congregation at Paradise-street is a perfectly free, nonsubscribing, and Unitarian, as well as Spiritualist, congregation, and quite as fully entitled to a place in the Unitarian Almanac as any congregation in the United Kingdom.

TRUTH.

[We have omitted a few personalities, which do not strengthen the argument.—Ed. of Inq.]

"THE AVERAGE PREACHER."

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—As you have given further publicity to the article from the Christian World headed "The Average Preacher," perhaps you will kindly insert a correction in regard to the number of persons present at the service in question. The congregation was counted during the singing of the last hymn, and it was found that there were about one hundred and twenty adults and some thirty young people present. The criticisms contained in such an anonymous contribution do not require any reply.

YORK.—On Wednesday, the 1st inst., the members and friends of the congregation of St. Saviourgate Chapel, to the number of two hundred, sat down to tea in the hall connected with the chapel, sixteen ladies presiding at the tables. After tea the company adjourned to the chapel, inspecting the alterations made about a year ago, and listening to the organ, until the room was cleared and the tables were removed. The meeting commenced soon after seven o'clock, the hall being then crowded in every part. The chair was taken by Joseph Lupton, Esq., J.P., of Leeds, and short interesting addresses were given by the Revs. C. H. Wellbeloved, Charles Hargrove, M.A., F. E. Millson, W. Blazeby, B.A., F. Haydn Williams, and F. Sydney Morris. During the ministry of Mr. Morris, which has now extended a little over twelve months, the evening congregation has largely increased, so that the chapel is well filled. The order of service has been improved, and is now chiefly liturgical and choral. Other promising signs of vitality were referred to, amongst them being the formation of a Literary and Debating Society. A musical programme was most efficiently gone through alternately by an accomplished string band and an equally good vocal quartet.

ROCHDALE.—On Sunday evening week the Rev. T. Carter repeated at Blackwater-street Chapel his lecture "Is There a God?" and though the weather was the worst this season, and the streets only passable with difficulty, the chapel was crowded in the body and aisles. About two hundred persons remained at the close of the service to discuss the subject of the lecture. Last Sunday Mr. Carter delivered, by desire, a lecture on "The Bible," and the church was filled in every part, including vestry, several persons standing outside the main entrance, the doors of which were kept open to enable them to listen. Most of the large congregation remained, by the invitation of Mr. Carter, after the regular service, to a conference on the subject of the lecture. For an hour and half a brisk interchange of questions by Secularists and Orthodox, and answers by the lecturer, ensued, and an unflagging and keen interest was shown in the discussion. These conferences after the service are much appreciated by the people, and are exciting considerable attention as to the true basis for a religious and Christian faith.

The Liberal Pulpit.

DR. H. W. BELLOW'S.—IN MEMORIAM.

In the Memorial Service on the death of Dr. Bellows, held in the Free-Christian Church, Kentish Town, on Sunday morning, 5th February, 1882, Mr. Clayden gave the following account of his life and labours.

"Their works do follow them."—Rev. xiv. 13.

All over the American continent to-day as the winter morning breaks and men remember that it is Sunday, the thoughts of many minds in many cities will turn to a bereaved congregation in New York. I should think that in every Unitarian place of worship, and in many of the other Churches, the ministers will make the useful life and the death of Dr. Bellows the theme of their discourses. We cannot actually join with them in the same thoughts at the same moment, for we must needs be some hours before them; but there is no time to the spirit, and it is fitting that we should be in sympathy with them to-day. They are suffering a great public loss, and one which may be felt severely in coming years. I hope we have already sent up a breath of intercession for his widow and children, that they may be strengthened and comforted from on high. To us his loss is a public one, and it is as a public man I shall speak of him this morning.

Dr. Bellows was chosen to deliver a discourse on Channing at Newport, in the State of Rhode Island, on the celebration of the centenary of Channing's birth in April, 1880, and I think many who had the privilege of listening to that noble eulogy of the great American preacher must have felt that Dr. Bellows was the man who more than any other had taken up and completed Channing's work. There are two stages in every successful movement, which may be described as the time of thought and the time of action. Adam Smith thinks out the principles of Free Trade; but Mr. Cobden embodies them in one national policy. The Arminian theology had long existed side by side with a fervid evangelicalism in the Church of England; but when they seized on the great organising mind of Wesley he gave the spirit a strong body in which to dwell. So it has been with American Unitarianism. The age which Channing moulded, which his spirit inspired; the age of which he is the chief and best known representative, created or evolved the more spiritual elements in Unitarian theology, and the age in which Dr. Bellows has lived, in which he has been the unofficial but well-recognised head of American Unitarianism, has given it a closer, firmer, and stronger organisation, and started it on a new career of growth and development. When his life is written it will give a vivid illustration of the immense usefulness of what I may describe as practical statesmanship in the affairs of the Church. Dr. Bellows was in the best sense a man of the world. He was as much at home in dealing with men as he was in his study chair. He had the ripeness in counsel, the promptitude in action and the versatility of resource, which are given by long familiarity with great affairs. He was a great preacher, who was also a good man of business. He would have made a great man in the political world if he had not chosen that his work should be done in the sphere of religion. The State would have claimed him for high service and distinction if the Church had not previously marked him for her own. Indeed, the State did claim him; and the service he rendered at a great crisis has indelibly associated his name with the history of his country. When President Lincoln, in June 1862, organised the United States Sanitary Commission he nominated Dr. Bellows as its President. No greater honour could have been done him, for no nobler service could be asked or given. Dr. Bellows had first aided in evoking, and then had taken the lead in organising the greatest work of Christian succour that had ever been undertaken on the earth. A quarter of a million of men were in arms in the sacred cause of freedom; and a whole nation was anxious to succour them. There were, at the time, seventy thousand in general hospitals, ten thousand in regimental hospitals, fifty thousand in convalescent camps, and the rest in the actual field. To send them nurses, chaplains, doctors, with all the comforts that the sick bed needs; to see that they were ministered to in health, tended in sickness, and consoled in death, was the desire of every man, woman, and child, who had stayed at home when their fathers, and brothers, and sons, had gone out to the wars. It was for Dr. Bellows to show them how this aid could be given, to organise their efforts, to give them unity and directness, so that all should work together for definite ends, and no zeal or charity be misdirected and lost. This was the function of the Sanitary Commission; and to this Dr. Bellows devoted several of the best years, and much of the best energy, of his life. The marvellous success of the organisation of which he was thus the official head and the inspiring spirit was probably due to his vast organising power, combined as it was with a kindling and fervid eloquence. The position of national respect and esteem which this great service deservedly gave him he ever afterwards used for the benefit of the Church of which he was one of the most prominent ministers.

I am not able to give many details of Dr. Bellows's life. He was born at Boston on June 10, 1814. His father or grandfather had probably gone thither from the State of Vermont or from that of New Hampshire, for I remember that he told me that Bellows Falls, a series of cataracts on the Connecticut River, were so called from an ancestor who owned the ground through which the river ran. He himself had a small estate near Walpole, New Hampshire, a few miles from the Falls, where he usually spent the long summer holiday. After taking his degree at Harvard he became minister of his late congregation in 1838. In 1848 he came to England, bringing a letter from Dr. Dewey to Mr. Madge, in which Dr. Dewey expressed the hope "that you will hear him preach in London, and know another of our good strong American souls." Dr. Dewey himself—still alive and in his eighty-eighth year—in his ripe old age has long known from personal experience how good and strong he was. That visit to England originated friendships which continued unbroken till his death. He was made D.D. in 1854, and in 1857 fought a battle for the actors of New York, against the Puritan prejudices against the drama, which made the whole profession look up to him as a friend. Then followed the Civil War, and the services of which I have already spoken. When the National Unitarian Conference held its first meeting in New York, in April, 1865, Dr. Bellows was Chairman of the Committee which drew up its constitution. At the Conference at Saratoga, which I attended in 1880—the last unhappily which will have the benefit of his presence—he was the reader of the Report of the Council, and it was evident that all looked up to him as chief. He had the ear of the public. What Dr. Bellows said everybody listened to; what he sanctioned everybody believed to be practicable; what he resolved on everybody knew would be done. He had the power of working with others because he knew how to yield to them sufficiently to be able to control them. There was no trace of the visionary about him. He did not live in an imaginary world, as so many students do. He took the world as it was, accepted the circumstances in which he found himself, and simply sought to do the best thing that could be done, and to take the wisest course that could be taken with due regard to those circumstances. In fact, he conducted the affairs of the Unitarian denomination, so far as his leadership put them into his hands, in that practical spirit in which a wise statesman deals with legislation, or a shrewd man of business deals with the conditions of trade, not refusing to do anything till he could do the best thing, but doing the best which at the moment circumstances rendered possible, doing it promptly, and whatsoever his hand thus found to do doing it with his might. Clearness of perception, directness of aim, and an unconquerable energy were the three great characteristics which gave him the leadership. He said to me in a letter dated on the 3rd Jan. last—"We aim not at the vague end of liberalising public sentiment, but at the concrete end of increasing the number of Unitarian churches, for when we have planted a new one firmly, we know that we have set up a tree that will bear the fruits of righteousness and liberty to succeeding generations." It is because our American brethren have gone to their work in this spirit that they have begun to see such large results of their labours, and that in these latter years Dr. Bellows has been called to dedicate so many fine buildings to the use of flourishing Unitarian churches in so many of the great cities of the American Union.

So far I have spoken of Dr. Bellows only in that larger and more public aspect in which he is most interesting to us who have looked at him from a distance across the sea. He was personally known to some of us, and his dearest friendship in England was with a valued member of this congregation. On his visit to England in 1868 he preached the sermon at the meeting of the Unitarian Association. On another visit—and I think his last—in 1872, he preached in this church on Sunday morning, the 7th of July; and probably there are many here who well remember his fine presence and dignified bearing. When I preached at the Saratoga Conference he, at my request, conducted the devotional service and I felt, most powerfully, how in his extempore prayer one's own devotional feelings moved with his. On other occasions the same effect was produced. His was a devout mind, and the expression of devotional feeling was easy and natural. In his sermons there was the same presence of a reverent spirit. They were full of the very essence of religion; a deep sense and vivid perception of the reality of unseen things. In his frequent travels over the country, to be the preacher at services on great and special occasions, he never forgot the religious object of all religious institutions, nor sacrificed the spiritual part of the work of a church to its controversial duty or its social success. He had been twice married, and his eldest son is settled as the successful and much esteemed minister of a Unitarian church in a suburb of New York. His second marriage filled his old age—if it could be called old age—with renewed happiness; and staying in his home, as I was privileged to do last October twelvemonth, it was most pleasant to witness the delight he had in his three little children. In a letter to Mrs. Madge on the 15th of October last he said, "I was never more occupied nor in less appearance of retirement. Still I try to be as moderate as my temperament allows; and I had much rather die in harness than live merely to stand up in the stall. So do not worry about me. I am happy, and I think useful, and content to live or to die when the summons comes, be it early or late. You English often make from seventy to eighty a very active period of life. I am past sixty-seven, and do not reckon on many years more; but as long as I live I must work." The next letter from him to Mrs. Madge is dated on the 24th of December last. "My wife and I," he said, "have just returned from a journey to St. Louis, a thousand miles west, where we went to dedicate a church my wife's brother had just built for Dr. Eliot's society. My excuse for so long a journey at such an inclement season was a strong desire to look again at Cleveland and Cincinnati as well as St. Louis where our cause has important churches that from time to time need encouragement and counsel. I am so much charged with our public interests that I have most of the duties of a bishop without any of his immunities, though I receive most of his honours. We had a very agreeable visit, passing four nights in the sleeping cars, and making our journey of over two thousand miles without any exhausting fatigue. . . . I have a fair measure of strength, as you may infer from my enterprising wanderings. On the whole, I am much better than a year ago, and hope to be allowed a few more years of work. On the 2nd of January I shall complete the forty-third year of my ministry—a long settlement in one post, for which I am profoundly grateful." A letter to me, dated on the 3rd of January last, ending "I wish we were nearer to each other. Come again soon, in spite of the stormy Atlantic," was the last his friends on this side heard of him. I read an extract from this letter in a speech at the Home Missionary Board at Manchester a fortnight ago, and on Tuesday morning a brief telegram in the papers announced his death at the age of sixty-eight. He has died in harness.

"God's finger touched him and he slept."

When Dr. Bellows settled at New York, in the beginning of 1838, Dr. Channing was still preaching in the Federal-street Church at Boston, where, as a young man and a Harvard student, Dr. Bellows often heard him. In an address on "The Unitarian Traditions of New York," delivered in 1879, Dr. Bellows said:—"Dr. Channing formed and shaped my own religious views by his preaching at the most critical period of my life, and it was his influence and advice, connected with Dr. Dewey's and Henry Ware's, that prevailed with me in the doubt I had about accepting the post I have now filled for more than forty years." What the religious views thus shaped were may be found in another part of the same address. Speaking of Channing, Dr. Bellows says:—"It is only because he taught Unitarianism as the very gospel—having in it more vital power and inspiration than the popular perversions ever have—that he gave it such power. Its doctrines were not intellectual abstractions with him, but spiritual facts and forces. In truth, it was Channing's piety that made him a Unitarian, and his Unitarianism sustained and expressed his piety. It was his jealousy of the Divine honour and glory, his thirst to know and love God, that compelled him to protest against all that confused or concealed or clouded his absolute loveliness and spirituality of nature, or narrowed the limits of his mercy and goodness. And it was the nearness, confidence, and stealliness of his piety that gave his personality and his eloquence such a special, penetrative and lasting power. In him we shall understand better the secret of Jesus's hold upon humanity—his perpetual originality and his increasing attraction—it will be found to lie in his intuitive and confident knowledge of God, his clear-eyed vision of the Father's loving and holy character, and the unexampled power it had over his affections and his life. This is the rarest and most precious thing in all history—an unaffected, thorough, disinterested piety, without superstition and without parade, but so patient and unmistakable that all men take knowledge of it, and know that it is the nearest thing to God." In the same address he expressed the whole spirit of his own forty years' ministry, and the secret of that spiritual and religious success which was more to him than even denominational aggrandisement. "Lay aside," he said, and the voice may now speak to us as though it came from within that threshold of the light his feet have so lately crossed—"Lay aside every weight of worldly ambition, and every cloak of mere appearances, and acknowledge and act as if you acknowledged the all important truth, that this Church is of no worth, except as it is a fountain of religious life, a spring of moral and spiritual truth and sanctification. We wish no Churches for their own sake, chapels of ease for Sunday loungers, places where vacant minds can be filled with spiced breath and world-tainted music; we need, we long for places where God's presence can be felt: where the human soul can be awakened to its true dignity and excited to a spiritual ambition; where Christ's life and death can be made instruments for arousing the nobler passions and aspirations that alone dignify humanity; where sinners shall feel the degradation of sin, and have their longings for repentance and conversion guided and blessed, and where the moral sense, the noblest faculty in man, shall have its gracious and awful crown reverently saluted and placed on the disciples' head over every other princely power of our nature."

"Being dead he yet speaketh." May these wise words, as they express the aim of our work and worship together here, describe also its result upon ourselves. I have asked you to join to-day with our brothers and fellow believers on the other side of the Atlantic in a brief glance at a most busy, useful, devoted, and successful life. I have tried to describe him, not to praise him. We may regret with our American friends that he was not spared a few years longer to give them his wise counsel and the benefit of his ripe experience, but our chief feeling ought to be one of gratitude that such men are raised up in unfailing succession to do the work for which the times are ripe. When leaders die upon the field we are often ready to ask in despair where are those who will fill their places and carry on their work. But Heaven is never at a loss for men, and when it has any work to do it will speedily designate the worker. The ranks of heaven's army are never thinned, for so long as God inspires men with courage and His Spirit breathes new hopes and thoughts into their hearts; so long as Christ's example wins the admiring homage of religious minds, so long will there be an unbroken chain of witnesses for the Fatherhood of God and the Divine Sonship of mankind. A perpetual succession of apostolic men, of fathers and leaders in the Church of Christ, is written as an enduring promise in the religious nature of our race. The cry of the generations for help and guidance, which is the undertone of earth's noisy history, brings down perennial and perpetual answer in men who can inspire and lead. I will not say that such a work is the noblest that man can be engaged in, for all good work is noble as a glorious trust, and will inspire it. But you and I cannot look back on such a life as that which we have reviewed to-day without a sense of the magnitude and value of the services it has rendered to the world. How many good resolutions must so long a ministry have strengthened; how many vows it must have inspired; how many prayers it must have led! Week by week, and year after year have men and women gathered together to feel their devotion touched, their faith enkindled, their best hopes inspired and quickened. They have come from worldly work and temptation and trial, with minds full of care or sorrow or wasting doubt, and sometimes, at least, the preacher's faith has charmed the care and doubt away, has given them glimpses of the joy which may be born from sorrow, and sent them home again to bear their trials with firmer patience, and meet temptations with unblenching front and do the humblest tasks

"As ever in the great Taskmaster's eye."
It is this humbler and less noticed portion of the preacher's work on which God bestows the most abundant honour, and which looked back on from the gloom of death or the light of the everlasting world, shines brightest in the retrospect. Its results are not recorded on earth, but they are written in heaven. It can never be rewarded here, but it must be its own reward hereafter. "Such harmony is in immortal souls," who surely never can forget the counsel and example which have helped them in their heavenward way. So with all the good we do; the light we shed; the help we give; we sow it here as seed of harmony in immortal souls, to see the harvest "behind the veil." So as we bid farewell to-day to our distinguished friend, and to a humble member of this Church who has just been taken from among us, it shall be with the ancient assurance in our hearts. "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord, from henceforth, yea, saith the Spirit, for they rest from their labours, and their works do follow them."

THE EAST CHESHIRE CHRISTIAN UNION.

The annual meeting of this society was held, as we briefly recorded in our last number, at Stalybridge, on Saturday, Jan. 28.

Reports were read from the different congregations in the district, which were, on the whole, satisfactory.

At the evening meeting the chair was taken by A. P. ASPLAND, J.P.

The CHAIRMAN, after a few preparatory remarks, said: Allow me to congratulate the members of this church on the growing importance and influence of the work they are engaged in, and to express the hope that the sure if not very rapid progress which has hitherto been made from a small and perhaps humble beginning may continue, and that this mission station may in a very few years become not only a free, but an independent church for the diffusion of enlightened opinions. I suppose we all know that this is a society established to assist any place where a few persons desire to found, I will not say a Unitarian, but a Free Church, and where there appears to be a reasonable prospect of ultimate success. Now although the movement is by no means new, there is no doubt it has been pressed forward with much greater vigour during the past ten years than had previously been the case. I must confess that I had been a spectator of the new energy with some feelings of doubt as to its wisdom. I think it is a question which may very fairly be asked, Is Unitarianism a suitable form of religion for the masses of the people? It may be said that it is cold and unable to rouse enthusiasm, that, lacking fire, it only unsettles men's minds, that the beginning and end of its doctrines is the denial of old and cherished forms of belief, giving nothing in their places; in fact, that it appeals to intellect and leaves the heart untouched. Well, there may be, to a certain extent, some truth in all these charges, but have creeds and the observance of ritual made the world virtuous and peaceful, sober and honest? With clergymen in prison in this free country, for the sake of conscience, can the Established Church be considered in a comfortable and happy state under the thralldom of ecclesiastical law and restraint? Looking at the state of Europe to-day, armed to the teeth, scarcely yet recovered from two great wars, in which perhaps hundreds of thousands of lives were sacrificed, and when we are again confronted with disquieting rumours of war, can any impartial person say that Christianity and orthodox churches have been a success? Why, except England, there is not a Christian nation in all Europe that would hesitate a single moment in seizing a strip of its neighbour's territory at the cost of any amount of human suffering and misery if only it felt strong enough to hold it. And yet Christianity has for nearly nineteen centuries been proclaiming peace on earth and good will among men. I am afraid the world will never be regenerated by forms of belief, by binding creeds or by observance of the forms and ceremonies which the ingenuity or perversity of men have substituted for the simple and beautiful religion which we Unitarians believe was taught by Christ. But if you are left free and unfettered in thought, if your religion is simple and intelligible, that, I take it, is not the beginning and the end of Unitarianism. It will never do, while being free to advance, for you to stand still, and while free you must also become independent and self-supporting. We claim no finality of opinion, but believe in progress in thought; but I do believe that if the Unitarianism of to-day were more generally accepted the world would be better for it. The funds at the disposal of the society are small, and are every year raised with difficulty, the field open for the operations of the society is wide, and new opportunities of doing good are constantly presenting themselves. I am told that you have here a large congregation, indeed, it would be strange if it were not so, because in my early years, when I attended the Old Chapel at Dukinfield, where my father was minister, many residents of Stalybridge worshipped there. Now, being numerous, we want you to show that you are earnest by becoming self-supporting, so that the funds you now have from the parent society can be directed to other channels where they are more urgently needed. Remember that these gentlemen who come from a distance will judge you by your works. I trust that in a very few years you will be in a position to invite the members of the East Cheshire Christian Union to a demonstration, and as a self-supporting church will continue your good work, encouraged by the respect which is due to a manly effort—(cheers).

The Rev. NOAH GREEN (Mottam) moved the first resolution, offering the best thanks of the meeting to the Rev. Joseph Freeston and the Rev. James Black, M.A., for conducting the afternoon service, and assuring Mr. Black of the deep regard, respect, and warm affection of his many friends in East Cheshire, and offering him a most earnest God-speed in the new work to which he had set his hands. The speaker then said he had worked for about eleven years with Mr. Black, and he never worked with one for whom he felt a higher admiration. There was a great difference between telling a person to go and do a certain work and telling him to come on and do it, and Mr. Black belonged to the latter order of persons, and in parting with him they felt they had lost a very earnest worker—(cheers).

Mr. J. O. KERFOOT (Stalybridge) seconded the motion. He believed that already Mr. Freeston had secured a large measure of influence in Stalybridge. There was nothing in which he did not take a leading part that had a good end, and he was one of the principal forces in the town in the direction of all that was noble and enlightened. He believed too much was left in the hands of the ministers who, fortunately, were always at their posts doing their work well, but there was a call upon the laymen to do more than had been done in the past. It was not enough for a person to give a subscription in money, and he would always rather have an earnest willing worker than a subscriber, but if they could have them combined, of course, it would be much the better—(cheers).

The Rev. JOSEPH FREESTON said the Chairman had expressed a hope that before long the church in Stalybridge would become independent. It was only fair to the strangers present they should know that the congregation was very grateful to the Union for the help received, and that it was their hope and determination to be independent. At the same time he hoped the grant from the Union to the church would be reduced gradually. He had taken part in as many missionary establishments as any one present, and during that experience he had seen the zealous help given to a struggling cause suddenly withdrawn, and it had had the same effect as the premature removal of a prop from a building. It was desirable that the increasing strength of the cause should be watched, and circumstances should be adapted to that increasing strength. If it were not so, the result was often the driving away of a zealous minister. He felt certain, however, that if the support from the church in Stalybridge was judiciously withdrawn there was sufficient spirit, strength, and determination among the congregation that before very long they would not only be able to support themselves, but do their fair share to help the other causes in the Union.

The Rev. H. E. DOWSON (Gee Cross) presented a handsomely bound address to the Rev. Jas. Black, M.A., from the clergy, lay-preachers and others of the Union, as a memorial to him on leaving the district, and setting forth the high regard in which he has been held in the Union, and the regret felt at his departure to East Lancashire, where his future ministrations will be carried on. After referring to the cordiality of his own relations with Mr. Black, Mr. Dowson said he remembered a period in Mr. Black's ministry from whence new energy developed in the cause of their mission, and ever since then it had continued. It had resulted in a grant from London of £50, which afterwards went up to £100, and subsequently to £150, but he was sorry to say that during the past few years the £150 had been reduced to £85, and the result of the change had been a deficit of £60. He did not believe in going on year after year receiving assistance, but he deprecated the sudden withdrawal of assistance, and in London their friends had deprived them of £65 at one fell swoop. He believed it was their duty if they loved their religion to work for it, and that they should pay for it to the utmost in their power, and let independence be the goal before them—(cheers).

The following is a copy of the address presented by Mr. Dowson:—

Farewell Address to the Rev. James Black, M.A., on the occasion of his removal from the district, presented at the annual meeting of the East Cheshire Christian Union for Missionary purposes, held at Stalybridge, January 28, 1882.

Stalybridge, Jan. 28, 1882.

Reverend and Dear Sir,

We, the undersigned, ministers, lay-preachers, and representatives of the congregations in the East Cheshire Christian Union, for Missionary purposes, have witnessed with deep regret your departure from amongst us. For nearly fifteen years you have been associated with some of us, with others for a less period, and a friendship has been formed between us and you, whose bonds time and distance cannot sever. For ten years you have occupied the most responsible post in our Union as its secretary; and the best evidence of the energy, wisdom, and zeal with which you have guided its counsels, and conducted its administration, is to be found in the progress which it has achieved under your auspices. The history of the enlarged operations of the Union in recent years is the history of your labours in its behalf. By your advice and instrumentality step after step has been taken alike to strengthen the older mission stations, and to break new ground.

It was in large measure owing to your courageous and enterprising spirit that many years ago a deficit was converted into a flourishing financial condition by the expedient of increased activity, calling forth a corresponding increase of support from within and from without the Union. One of the first achievements due to your initiative was the establishment of a minister at Stalybridge, in place of a joint missionary for that church and the one at Mottram; and as a means of carrying out this measure, on the one hand, you sought and obtained the first grant from the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and so opened up a connection which has proved invaluable to the Union, and for which it is deeply grateful; and on the other hand, you successfully appealed to the two congregations for increased contributions to meet the larger benefits which they received. You thus laid the basis of the policy by which the Union entered on a new lease of life from that day forward.

The opportunity afforded to the Union of spreading its principles by the delivery of courses of lectures has ever been seized by you with the happiest results. Such lectures led to the foundation of the two flourishing churches and schools at Glossop and at Denton, and to the building of the places of worship in which they meet, and to the settlement with them of their ministers; and only those who have had the pleasure of co-operating with you in the planting of these two congregations, and in the erection of their chapels, know how untiring were your labours, and how good an amateur architect you proved. Much as the Union is indebted to Mr. Potter, and to the generous donors to the Denton Building Fund, we can never forget the value of your services and advice during the completion of the structures at Glossop and at Denton, and in the subsequent conduct of the two Missions.

Another portion of our district in which you have always taken a deep interest is the Potteries; and it is every month owing to your efforts that the old chapel at Newcastle has been reopened for worship, and that regular minister is now officiating within its walls.

Even as you leave us, your hand is joined with ours in two undertakings from which, as from all else that engages us, we shall miss you, viz.:—in the project of building a new chapel at Congleton, and in the erection of Mrs. Scott's new schools at Denton.

In bidding you farewell we can offer you no better wish than that you may do as good and as fruitful a work in the new field as you have done in the old one, and that you may win for yourself affections as strong as those which now fill our hearts as they lament your departure! That you may live long and happily, and that God may prosper you and yours, is the earnest prayer of your fellow-workers, and your constant friends.

The Rev. JAMES BLACK, in acknowledging the address, and very heartily thanking them for it, said he would regard the memorial as an encouragement to him to go to his new work and try to carry out the almost ideal picture they had drawn of the services he had done for them. In referring to the system which had been pursued in relation to the Union by the other officers and himself, he thought it was only right the meeting should know that they had been very cautious in everything they had done.

At their meetings in committee they had been addressed again and again by enthusiastic and earnest people urging them to set up fresh causes here and there, and he could assure them that a portion of their work had necessarily been of a repressive character; the credit, therefore, they claimed was not only for work done, but for work they had left undone—(laughter). The society had his best wishes for the future, but he could not help repeating that in many instances their own efforts had failed because they had become too soon content. They should raise their average, and not look upon their present members as congregations, but only the nuclei of congregations. Mr. Kerfoot's advice to them was good, and they should go to people with no Church connection and draw them into communion with the Unitarian body. The Bishop of Manchester, whose words they always received with respect, had told them that they must not think the only religious people were within the churches, but those people who were without ought to be brought within for their own sakes. In Stalybridge Mr. Freeston could not carry forward his work with success unless the congregation did their part, and helped to secure men and women in the town who would like to become Unitarians if they knew all about it.

The Rev. WILLIAM HARRISON (Glossop) moved a resolution recording the obligation of the East Cheshire Christian Union to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association for grants from the Association generally, and deeply rejoicing at the cordial relations subsisting between the two associations. The resolution also offered a hearty welcome to the Rev. Henry Ierson and Mr. Lindsey Aspland, LL.D., the representatives of the society. In the course of a few remarks the speaker said if it was desired that churches should be independent they should be built large enough, because unless they could fill a small church with millionaires it could do no good. In Glossop they had a portion of the funds necessary to build a new church, and they wanted more school accommodation. A gentleman had promised £500 towards the former object, £281 had been promised by the congregation, and £50 by a gentleman in Liverpool, and he believed this was a case for the Union to take up, because he felt convinced their opportunity in Glossop was slipping away unless the matter was taken up at once.

Mr. JACKSON (Stalybridge) seconded the motion. It was to the Rev. Brook Aspland he owed his first awakening, and any little he had done was the result of what he then learned. The work to be done in the district was only to be measured by the means at their disposal, and they had a large borough within a mile simply waiting for someone to go and start the cause there, and he believed when it was started the seed sown would spread and bring forward abundant fruit—(cheers).

Dr. LINDSEY ASPLAND, who was received with applause, said the Rev. Stopford Brooke was able to do more for Unitarianism as a convert from the Church of England than he would have done if he had been a Unitarian all his life. Dean Stanley remained in the Church because he believed he could do more service there for God than anywhere else. The whole work of his life was the promotion of the same principles the Unitarians had been contending for for generations, and it was to be observed that one section of the Church was approaching very near to them, and among the Congregationalists ministers as they became more cultivated approached nearer to Unitarians. Their faith appealed to the plain common sense of the people, and it was for that reason they had such a strong hold upon them. It was by trying to do all the good they could in this world and by showing they could lead a practical religious life that they would make converts. It was possible to have a good deal of friendly intercourse, and if they would be content to hold their own opinions and not obtrude them at unseasonable times they would be able to do as well as if they adopted a more aggressive policy. If they found people leading good lives with the spirit of religion in them he did not think there was much advantage gained by attempting to disturb them. Men who had belonged to one Church during their lives doubtless often said to themselves, "I don't agree with all the views of my Church, but I will remain in it because I see good in it, and I will try to make it a greater and a better church than it is." There is a field of labour among those who belonged to no Church. They saw a vastly increased population in Stalybridge and a great accumulation of wealth, but it was accompanied by its disadvantages; the face of the country was not as beautiful, the streams were not as clear or the air as bright and pure. They hoped science would ameliorate some of these disadvantages, but if it was desired to make people happy it would be found that it was not the material condition happiness depended upon but the cultivation of the mind. They were engaged in a noble effort, and though they might sometimes feel discouraged, yet if they pursued their efforts they could not finally fail—(cheers).

The Rev. HENRY IERSON said that he was reminded by Dr. Aspland's allusion to his early years spent in the immediate neighbourhood of Staley-bridge of his own first visit there in company with the Rev. Robert Brook Aspland, and of the hearty welcome with which he was received on that occasion, one of the first opportunities which he had had of addressing a Unitarian audience after his final settlement amongst them. The history of the Body since that period had been to him a subject of deep interest, and he would ask how far they had been true to the great ideal of religion in liberty which they had always professed to cherish. Whether they were aggressive or not this grand profession would always bring over into their ranks ministers from other bodies, since it was they who specially felt the need of it, and it was not a thing to be surprised at if they sometimes at first overstrained the assertion of liberty. In these days, moreover, of general unsettlement of theological positions there would be converts who scarcely knew yet their own minds, and some he had known had been very shifting. There would be others, again, who come over with a sort of desperate rush as if they would carry those whom they were joining to the opposite extreme of Agnosticism. In such cases he had counselled waiting for more experience. He had always found it good such men should have some work to do, which would prove if they had something genuine in them, and in doing which they would themselves discover the proper limits of liberty. Referring to Mr. Harrison's statement with reference to Glossop he said that the progress of Unitarianism there had always been an interesting subject to the Association, which had helped them in the past and was helping still. He knew a great deal about the work in Glossop, and all he knew was in its favour. But there were many places needing money to build new churches, and how best to raise money for such purposes was a problem he had not been able to solve to his own satisfaction. Money came sometimes in extraordinary ways, and sometimes did not come in the ways in which it might be reasonably expected; even legacies were not an unfailing resource. It had been lately discovered, however, that money could be got by personal application, and hence the storm of circulars with which people were nowadays troubled. But many did not like this, and gave in perhaps a grumbling spirit. How long it would last he did not know, and could only hope that they would not altogether give up giving. He could say this for the Committee in Norfolk-street, that he did not believe that they had ever refused help to a good cause, and especially where people were earnestly trying to help themselves. If they had reduced the grants to the East Cheshire Union amongst other societies it was no secret that they had only done so because they were obliged. The Association had given freely while it could, and only stopped when on the verge of insolvency. He had hoped, therefore, that he should not have had to explain over again on this occasion, as he had often done before, the real facts of the case. He might say that the committee would be glad to find themselves in a position to resume their former grants, should it appear desirable. But the claims on their increased means were already considerable. It was not for him to promise Glossop anything, but he would carry with him the accounts he had heard, and when he conveyed the intelligence that as their treasurer had said they were very grateful in East Cheshire to the Association he would try to look as if he believed it—(laughter). But it was not desirable that grants should be continued the same from year to year without special reasons for such continuance. They ought rather to serve as a stimulus to local effort, instead of being relied upon as a permanent resource. But whenever any change was proposed, it was too commonly found that there was some reason that particular year why the grant should not be altered—times were so bad, or some subscriber had died—and it had been only in the case of one Church where a stipulation to that effect had been made that a reduction could be made without some protest. How was it, then, he would ask, that with all the advantage they possessed for appealing to the popular intelligence their Churches did not prosper as they ought? They had been imitating other people and publishing a Unitarian census, and as the result they were scornfully told that all the Unitarians of the metropolis who attended their chapels could be easily accommodated in Mr. Spurgeon's Tabernacle. One reason he thought was that their services were not always made so interesting as they might be. He had had of late years, more than formerly, opportunities as a listener to form an opinion on this matter. It did not depend altogether on the ministers, but the manner of conducting the services often struck him as intolerably dull, and he believed the congregations felt it. There was a stiffness and formality sometimes about the prayers; something which gave the impression of unreality. The speaker was not pouring out what the fulness of the heart compelled him to utter, but seemed to be going through a form, and it was often very much the same whether the prayer was written or printed. Then, as to the Bible reading, it seemed as though it might have been anything that happened to come first, and without any pause to explain, and the people were expected to sit and listen as if they believed in the old notion that there was some God's spell to come to them without any question of intelligent profit from within the covers of the book. The Bible was to him very precious, and he thought that Unitarians would have to re-study it if they would fulfil their duty to the coming time. It was their special advantage, which he feared they had much lost sight of, to deal with this matter on its true principles. So it was not of much value to take texts from the Bible with which their sermons had nothing to do. But the passages read were the matter of importance, and they ought to be carefully selected, and in the New Testament certainly from the Revised Version. It was, by no means, a perfect version, but in point of accuracy the trouble it had cost had not been wasted. It was immensely better than the Old Version, and they ought to make the best use of it they could. As to the preaching, he had learned much since he had ceased to hold a regular charge, and he thought it would be a good thing for ministers to be enabled from occasional experience to look at the question of sermons from the layman's point of view.

The Rev. J. K. SMITH (Flowery Field) moved a vote of thanks to the Stalybridge congregation for their hospitality to the visitors. Mr. E. B. BROADERICK seconded the resolution, and after the Rev. J. FREESTON had responded, a vote of thanks to the Chairman was moved by the Rev. E. TURLAND, seconded by Mr. JOHN HOWARD, to which the CHAIRMAN responded. The meeting then broke up.

Obituary.

DR. SHEPHERD FLETCHER.

The medical profession has lost one of its most distinguished local members by the death of Dr. J. Shepherd Fletcher, of Manchester, which took place on Saturday last, at his residence, Hope House, Higher Broughton, after a long and painful illness. His health began to fail a little more than a year ago, but it was not until July last that, notwithstanding his indefatigable energy, he was compelled to leave the discharge of his professional duties entirely to his partner, Dr. John Hewitt. In the succeeding month he underwent a most critical operation, which was successfully performed by Professor Lund, assisted by Dr. Hewitt, who has attended him throughout his illness. For a time Dr. Fletcher experienced considerable relief, but his permanent recovery was scarcely expected.

John Shepherd Fletcher was born at Kirkham House, Prestwich, in August, 1822, and like his late brother, Dr. James Ogden Fletcher, early displayed a preference for the profession in which both attained to distinguished positions. He was placed first with his uncle, Dr. Ogden, of Rochdale, and subsequently became a diligent and successful student in the Manchester School of Medicine, then held in Pine-street (the first provincial school of medicine and surgery in England), where he earned an unusual number of prizes and certificates of honour. Among his fellow-students was Mr. Mitchell Henry, M.P. for Galway, with whom he maintained to the last the friendly relations begun in the class-room and the laboratory. Shortly after the completion of his preparatory course Dr. Fletcher acquired an excellent and lucrative practice. One of the first of his public appointments was that of a medical inspector of factories in the Ancoats district. He afterwards took an active and prominent part in meeting an extensive outbreak of fever which occurred in Manchester, and which was, perhaps, the most serious and alarming epidemic of its kind which ever visited the city. The number of cases rapidly increased so as far to exceed the amplest accommodation of existing medical institutions, and several temporary hospitals were hastily prepared in large vacant buildings in different districts. With the devotion which is so honourable a characteristic of the profession, the local surgeons and physicians rendered prompt and invaluable services, several of them unfortunately sacrificing their lives in their heroic efforts to save those of their patients. As they were struck down the labours of their surviving colleagues were rendered proportionally more arduous, and at one time Dr. Fletcher had the chief responsibility of three hospitals on his hands—those in Tib-street, Canal-street, and Minshull-street. To him also is largely due the merit and honour of suggesting the foundation of the Hospital for Consumption and Diseases of the Throat in St. John's-street. In this important effort he was most efficiently aided by his friend Dr. Hodgkinson, who is one of the present honorary medical officers, and by the personal co-operation and pecuniary support of Mr. Leppoe, Mr. W. H. Houldsworth, Mr. Alderman Grundy, and other active and benevolent citizens. Now a flourishing institution, necessitating frequent additions to its medical staff, it was the first and only hospital in this district which from its establishment adopted, on Dr. Fletcher's earnest advocacy, the principle of requiring every applicant for its advantages to contribute according to his means towards its maintenance. He was strongly impressed with the importance of avoiding any pauperising of the patients, whether indoor or out. Dr. Fletcher was one of the honorary physicians to this hospital from its foundation to his lamented decease. He was also honorary medical adviser to the students of the Unitarian Home Missionary Board, of which he was one of the vice-presidents. He occasionally wrote valuable letters in the local papers on matters pertaining to the public health, and gratuitously gave popular lectures in different parts of the city. He contributed articles on "Cerebral circulation" to the Medical Times, prepared the Medical Times prize report, and was the author of a pamphlet on "Consumption; its Causes, Prevention, and Cure." He was lecturer on anatomy and secretary of the School of Medicine at one time established in Chatham-street, but which was subsequently united to the older medical institution of the town. His professional acquirements are indicated by the fact that he was M.R.C.S., Eng., 1846; L.S.A., 1847; and M.D. of St. Andrew's University, 1862.

The remains of the deceased were interred in the burial ground of the Unitarian Church, Monton, on Wednesday morning. A number of friends assembled, including Mr. Harry Rawson, and Mr. J. Dendy, B.A., representing the Unitarian Home Missionary Board. The Rev. James Harwood, B.A., of Monton, was assisted in the service by the Rev. S. A. Steintal, who also read the prayers and pronounced the benediction at the grave. The coffin, which was of polished oak with brass fittings, bore on the plate the simple inscription—"John Shepherd Fletcher, M.D., died February 4, 1882. Aged 59 years."

WILLIAM DENNIS, OF NORTHAMPTON.

Death has removed from us another old and respected friend, W. Dennis, Esq., of Northampton. The news of his departure on Jan. 29 was received with much surprise. For some time past he had been in a somewhat precarious state of health, but no one, not even those who knew him intimately, supposed that his end was so near. He had been subject to a painful and wasting disease for the last two or three years, which did not, however, altogether incapacitate him from the active duties of life. He was at chapel the Sunday previous to his death, and was able to transact business on the Friday. A severe attack of bronchitis, against which his enfeebled constitution seemed unable to struggle, quickly proved fatal. He was a native of Northampton, being born in the year 1816. He was placed on the roll of solicitors in 1838, and for many years was Registrar of the County Court, and District Registrar of the High Court of Justice. To write at length of his public life it would be necessary to write a history of the borough for the last forty years. He filled all the offices his town had to offer, and did signal service to his party in various ways. He was elected to the Civic chair in 1854, and again in 1878. For many years he was the leader of the Liberal party, and though he could not always sympathise with the demands of a younger generation, he never forsook the old flag. He was the foremost figure in many exciting scenes—a man who, though not eager in the political fray, yet knew well how to hold his own—one who could be terribly caustic if occasion required, and yet who never joined in the bitter aspersions which were sometimes indulged in by violent partisans—one of the few remaining men of the old school of political thought. In religion the late Mr. Dennis was a Unitarian, and attended the chapel in King-street all his life. Whatever kith or kin he had lie buried there. He was never married, and we are not aware that he has a single surviving relative. It would be a mistake to infer from this that his was a lonely existence. He had a circle of warm and fast friends, and by them, as well as by all with whom he was brought in daily contact, his loss will be deeply deplored.

The funeral took place on Thursday at noon at the General Cemetery, in the presence of a large number of spectators. Shortly after one o'clock the funeral cortege left the residence of deceased in Sheep-street, most of the tradesmen and residents in the neighbourhood putting up shutters or lowering blinds as a token of respect. Wreaths of choice flowers were placed on the coffin, which was of oak, with ebonised panels and brass furniture. Though it was not a public funeral, the large attendance showed the general estimation in which the deceased was held. Among those present in the Cemetery were the Rev. G. Nicholson, B.A., Mr. P. P. Perry, J.P., Mr. W. Adkins, J.P., Mr. H. Mobbs, J.P., the ex-Mayor (Mr. R. Derby), Alderman T. Tebbutt, Mr. M. P. Manfield, Councillors F. Covington, C. Tebbutt, and G. Gibbs. The funeral service was conducted by the Rev. E. R. Grant, who, after reading several passages of Scripture having reference to the solemn event, delivered a brief eulogy over the departed.

In the "Liberal Pulpit" next week we shall give Mr. Grant's sermon In Memoriam, delivered last Sunday.

BARNARD CASTLE.—The Rev. F. Haydn Williams preached his farewell sermons on Sunday last. At the close of the morning service a handsome present of valuable books was handed to Mr. Williams by a deputation from Darlington, consisting of Mr. Councillor Wharton (a native of Barnard Castle), and Mr. R. P. Jackson. The whole of the congregation, except a few visitors, remained to witness the interesting ceremony. Mr. Wharton, in an appropriate speech, expressed the deep regret of the Darlington congregation, almost without exception, at the resignation of Mr. Williams. It was cheering and encouraging to see the large audiences which attended the Darlington Chapel on Mr. Williams's Sundays, but very different on the intervening Sundays. He believed that had Mr. Williams been resident in Darlington, and constantly working there, a very excellent permanent congregation would have been established, and there would be no necessity for him to remove. He concluded by expressing on behalf of the subscribers the heartiest good wishes for Mr. Williams's future prosperity, of which there could be no doubt, if his health continued good. Mr. Baker then, on behalf of the Barnard Castle congregation, made a similar presentation. Both were gratefully and feelingly acknowledged by Mr. Williams, who said he should always retain the happiest recollections of his sojourn in Barnard Castle, and his fortnightly visits to Darlington. At the evening service the nave of the church was crowded, and the screen before the transept had to be removed to accommodate the large congregation.

BADPORT.—The Rev. J. Davis, M.A., commenced, on Jan. 15, the following course of Sunday evening lectures, on Some Texts and Margins of the Revised Version of the New Testament:—The Inspiration of the Scriptures (2 Tim. iii. 16). The Trinity (1 John v. 7). Christ (1 Tim. iii. 16). Only Begotten God (John i. 18). Holy Ghost—Holy Spirit (Matt. i. 18). The Atonement (Rom. v. 11). The Evil One (Matt. vi. 13). Hell (Matt. v. 22). Doctrinal Results of the Revision.

THROAT IRRITATION.—Soreness and dryness, tickling and irritation, inducing cough and affecting the voice. For these symptoms use Epps's Glycerine Jujubes. Glycerine, in these agreeable confections, being in proximity to the glands at the moment they are excited by the act of sucking, becomes actively healing. Sold only in boxes, 7d. and 1s. 1d., labelled, "JAMES EPPS and Co., Homoeopathic Chemists, London." A letter received:—"Gentlemen,—It may, perhaps, interest you to know that, after an extended trial, I have found your Glycerine Jujubes of considerable benefit (with or without medical treatment) in almost all forms of throat disease. They soften and clear the voice.—Yours faithfully, GORDON HOLMES, L.R.C.P.E., Senior Physician to the Municipal Throat and Ear Infirmary."

SPECIAL AND URGENT APPEAL.

In March, 1880, an order from the Metropolitan Board to remove the Temporary Iron Chapel within twelve months forced upon the Committee the alternative of abandoning the cause, or building a permanent Church. But the prospects of success were too encouraging to allow of any hesitation; the only question was, as to the erection of a Schoolroom in addition. This was quickly decided for them by the handsome present made by the late Mr. Samuel Sharpe, of a Plot of Freehold Land, on which was erected the Schoolroom, completed in 1881, one of the best structures of the kind in London, though built at a very moderate cost. The Congregation has worshipped in this building since the removal of the Iron Chapel, and the attendance so much improved that the Committee felt it their duty to lose no time in proceeding with the building of the New Chapel, the Foundation-stone of which was accordingly laid by Sir James Clarke Lawrence, Bart., M.P., in June, 1881. But the works had to be suspended on account of insufficient funds, and the Committee feel that such a prejudicial influence will be exerted on the Unitarian cause in the neighbourhood should the work remain longer in abeyance that they are impelled to make an urgent appeal for a sufficient sum to enable them to proceed with the building.

The neighbourhood is rapidly enlarging, the influx of inhabitants is great, the spirit of inquiry is rife, and, to quote from the report in the leading local paper, of the laying of the foundation-stone, "the district in which Mr. Carter administers so ably is one which has grown with marvellous strides of late years, and it is quite probable that before long it will form an important centre of Unitarianism."

Under these circumstances, and the Congregation not numbering amongst them persons of affluence, the Committee must depend on the generous aid of the Unitarian body generally to enable them to complete a building really required in the locality, and for which a promising future may be anticipated.

Subscriptions may be paid into the London and South Western Bank (Peckham Branch), or will be received by the undersigned, and acknowledged in the Unitarian papers.

FREE THOUGHT AS THE BASIS OF MORALITY.—I.

THE current number of the Contemporary Review, as we briefly intimated last week, contains two papers bearing on this subject. One is on “Free Thought—French and English,” by Mr. W. S. LILLY, and in the other Mr. GOLDWIN SMITH deals with the question “Has Science yet found a new Basis for Morality?” It need hardly be said that those who would substitute Materialism for Theism and Free Thought, in the usual sense of that term, for religion believe that science has found a new and adequate foundation for morality, so far as this is needed in social life. The most rabid Freethinker would surely stand aghast at his iconoclastic opinions if he could be brought to believe that society would crumble to pieces in consequence of their adoption. His contention is that philosophy is the “source of all morality;” he believes, however foolishly, that if religion can only be got rid of “a system at once philosophic, moral, and rational may be substituted for it.” Not content to say in his heart “there is no God,” as the fool referred to by the Hebrew Psalmist, he cries on the housetops as far as possible with GUSTAVE FLOURENS, “Our enemy is God.” And parodying the author of the Book of Proverbs he continues with the same apostle of Free Thought, “Hatred of God is the beginning of wisdom. If man would make true progress it must be on the basis of Atheism.” Such being the claim put forth by the advocates of Secularism and Free Thought we propose to examine it with the earlier of the writers just named, and then to consider with the latter how far science is provided with an adequate system to supply the place of that which has been so long associated with religion.

Mr. LILLY, if not a Catholic, is manifestly in close sympathy with Catholicism. He quotes with enthusiasm Mr. J. S. MILL'S appreciative reference to GUIZOT'S famous and almost paradoxical words that the Catholic Church is “the parent of liberty of conscience.” We are quite willing to admit with Mr. MILL that in making a separation between a temporal and spiritual authority, and in the bold assertion that material force has no right, no hold, over the mind, over conviction, over truth, the Catholic Church did much to establish human freedom. But if such freedom be her child she has for ages past done her best to strangle it. Nay, more. If, as Mr. LILLY seeks to show, Free Thought is so much more dangerous, so much more rabid, and so much more extended in France than it is in this country, we cannot help believing that the fact is to be ascribed to the irreconcilable attitude which the Church maintains towards reverent freedom of thought, such as that to be met with in these columns. But to turn from our author himself to his argument, one of the most striking of contemporary facts in France, is, he says, the sharp division of the people into two camps. The one is known as Liberal, Radical, Progressist or Freethinking, the other as Conservative, Catholic, Clerical, or Ultramontane. English sympathies, he tells us, are almost wholly with the former, because the people of this country do not understand the doctrines and aims of Continental Liberals. They are misled by the term “liberal;” they forget that such words as “freedom, progress, and reform may mean very different things in the mouths of different people, in different races, and in different political and social conditions.” And while this is so, as we are told, with regard to the prejudice in favour of those who are looked upon as patriots, but are in reality iconoclastic Freethinkers, there is also a prejudice among us against those who belong to the opposite camp. A general impression prevails on this side the Channel, says our author, that Conservatives and Catholics all belong to “the arrogant and fanatic school which has placed the Duke of ALVA among its heroes,” and that they are hostile to every form of constitutional government. As an instance of our insular prejudices against Catholicism he refers to a sermon he heard some years ago in Westminster Abbey, in which the present Bishop of LINCOLN “laboured with much learning and eloquence” to prove that the late Pontiff was “the Man of Sin” spoken of by ST. PAUL. The outcome of this misunderstanding on the one hand and this prejudice on the other is that the bulk of Englishmen, irrespective of their political allegiance, wish well to the party in France, which advocates la libre pensée, and “which aims at converting the Catholic populations, or such portions of the populations as remain Catholic, into Libres-Penseurs. This may be to a large extent true, but the partisan spirit in which Mr. LILLY writes is sufficient to prevent his readers from placing an absolute reliance upon his extreme view of the case. It would be a mistake to suppose, therefore, that every Liberal in the present Parliament of France is a Libre-Penseur in the sense he would have the phrase understood.

What, then, is La Libre Pensée in France? Mr. LILLY tells us that it is “a religion.” When, however, it is a question of determining its doctrines, “one is at once confronted with the difficulty arising from the number of the Scriptures received by it as canonical and from the discrepancies of the positive teaching found in them.” No given set of practical maxims, nor of speculation, can be attributed to the apostles of the new religion. It will be found, we are told, that the points in which the Libres-Penseurs agree are almost entirely negative, and that “here their agreement is wonderful.” They are alive to the fact, however, that the age of catechisms is not past. They have rightly discerned, it would seem, “that the catechetical form is unique in its adoption to the wants of the masses.” Hence three works have been published of late years in this form for rearing the youth of the nation in the tenets which it is desired to substitute for the old doctrines of religion and morality. These are :—“Le Petit Catéchisme du Libre-Penseur;” the “Catéchisme Populaire Republicain;” and Mr. EDGAR MONTEIL'S “Catéchisme du Libre-Penseur.” The last is the chief of the three, and its author “seems to be a pillar in the Libre-Pensée Church.” A journalist by profession, he is a great friend of M. PAUL BERT and M. GAMBETTA. By verse, by romantic fiction, by pamphlets, by newspaper articles, he has approved himself, it appears, as the zealous minister of the new Church; “and although he has not attained the crown of martyrdom, still he is radiant with a kind of halo of confessorship.”

It is to his work, therefore, that the attention of the readers of the Contemporary is directed; it is this which Mr. LILLY analyses, in order to make Englishmen acquainted with the doctrines of the Libres-Penseurs of France. We can only briefly summarise this analysis. M. MONTEIL begins, it seems, with “God” as the philosophical basis of religion; then he proceeds to Religion itself, and afterwards to Morals. His work, which consists of three hundred pages, opens as follows :—“Q. What is God?—A. God is an expression. Q. What is the exact value of this expression?—A. The exact value of the word Nature. Q. What is Nature?—A. The totality of all we know to exist in the infinite Universe. Q. What other definition can you give of Nature?—A. It is the material world, and All is matter.” This is certainly a pretty good specimen of La Libre Pensée; it is outdone, however, by the answer to the question—“The learned, then, have not found out God?” “No; they are all agreed in denying his existence.” The “Petit Catéchisme” is not a whit behind its more influential rival; it simply adds an element of the grotesque to its negative philosophy. “Do you believe in a Supreme Being?” it asks of the neophyte. The reply it puts into his mouth is:—"I only believe what my reason permits me to believe, and my reason refuses to admit the principle of the 'Government of Nature' by any being whatsoever. I am persuaded that Nature always has been, is, and always will be republican, and consequently fitted to govern herself." To return, however, to M. MONTEIL, the quality of his thought may be judged from the following question and answer. "There is no First Cause, then?" he asks. To this query he makes the astounding reply, "No; for all that we cannot prove scientifically has no existence, and denies itself until proof of the contrary." He forgets that, apart altogether from the vexed metaphysical question of how the transition is effected between subject and object, the very material Universe would vanish under the force of such reasoning as this. Who can prove scientifically the existence of atoms? We certainly infer their existence; and on precisely the same principles we infer the existence of the soul and God.

Having dealt thus unceremoniously with GOD as the spirit of the universe it is not to be supposed that M. MONTEIL hesitates to boldly deny the existence of the soul in man. The following colloquy between the neophyte and his teacher will put this in the clearest light: "What is the soul?—Nothing. It is not a thing then existent in Nature?—No. What is the distinction between soul and body? The distinction between soul and body is a simple analytical process. What is generally understood by the word soul?—Thought, independent of matter, is what is generally understood by it. Can such independence exist?—No; since everything belongs to the material order. The soul then does not return to GOD, who is all?—No; for GOD is formed of that which exists, and the soul does not exist." We are thus left with a GOD who is the world and a soul that is nothing. Why the lump of matter forming man should think, feel, and love, while the bigger lump forming the Universe has no such attributes, we are not told. GOD and the soul being thus disposed of, religion naturally comes in for nothing but scorn and hate. "According to M. MONTEIL," says our author, "Christianity, like other religions, has proceeded from the foolish Deistic hypothesis. . . . Considered as a fiction it is but a pantheistic theory. Considered as a social religion its results have been disastrous, indeed, for it has retarded civilisation by fifteen hundred years; meanwhile, conducting men to a brutality, to a prostrate degradation of the most revolting immorality. Nor let any one, says our teacher, protest that this is the work of its ministers; that it is a good religion in itself, but that it has been spoilt by priestcraft. It is the religion itself which is baneful, deadly; in JEHOVAH as in JESUS, in the Pentateuch as in the Gospels." Thus, according to this rabid teacher of La Libre Pensée, religion, instead of being a source of moral strength, has been the most fruitful cause of weakness and degradation. The Christian religion "does not contain a single trait of morality which is peculiar to it." The early Christians whom even such writers as M. RENAN would have us regard as inspired with the highest morality as well as the loftiest faith, "turned everything into ridicule, broke the laws, and despised all that attaches one to life." Nor must it be supposed that the teachers of the Christian religion, Protestant ministers or pastors as well as priests, are at all superior in their life and aims to the system they expound. If they have not made it the intrinsically bad thing that it is they have not sought to make it better. "All kinds of violence, hatred, vengeance, murder, and incest, joined to avarice, are the special endowments of the clerical body." "Pleasures, fortune, rule—such are their morality." We are, therefore, called upon to abandon religion completely, and "take refuge in Philosophy, the product of all reason and the source of all morality."

We must reserve for a second article a consideration of Mr. GOLDWIN SMITH's paper as to how far this vaunted philosophy or science, as he calls it, really suffices to form a solid foundation for morality. We may remark here, however, that many of the foregoing anti-Theistic statements are positively below the plane of serious argument. They refute themselves. They may affect the ignorant; but no educated man, with a grain of philosophical power in his mental composition, can be influenced by them. With regard to the comparison which Mr. LILLY draws between Freethought in France and the same product here in England, to our advantage, he is no doubt right so far as writers like CARLYLE, J. S. MILL, and GEORGE ELIOT, whom he quotes, are concerned. Not one of them was a Freethinker at all in the coarser, iconoclastic sense of the word. The late Professor CLIFFORD approached nearest to the French school of any English writer of reputation. There is less in our Protestant Churches, as we have said, to engender violent partisan hate as a rebound. Still, the philosophical pabulum to be found in the columns of the Freethinker, to say nothing of occasional articles in the National Reformer, is hardly less offensive than anything to be found among our neighbours.

THE ORTHODOX CHANGE OF FRONT.

THE effect of criticism, science, and modern thought on the popular Orthodoxy is seen in various ways; among others, in the attempts which are being made by liberal Orthodox theologians to modify and adjust the so-called "Evangelical" faith, so as to make it accord with the new knowledge and enlightened thoughts of our time. Mr. CONDER, in his work on the "Basis of Faith"; Mr. R. W. DALE, in his various publications; Mr. J. G. ROGERS, in his "Church Systems in the Nineteenth Century," and other orthodox writers of less note, show considerable ability and ingenuity in their attempts to commend a modified Orthodoxy to the acceptance of thoughtful readers.

An effort of this kind, which is still in progress, is being made by the Rev. JOHN HUNTER, of York, who belongs to the liberal school of thinkers, and seeks to liberalise the popular theology without surrendering any of its vital principles. He is delivering a series of sermons on the leading doctrines of the Evangelical faith, his aim being, as he himself puts it, "to restate and affirm in the light of modern religious and scientific knowledge the radical, essential, vital truth of the Evangelical doctrines." Condensed reports of the earlier sermons of the course are now before us, and enable us to see how Mr. HUNTER would modify and readjust the popular Orthodoxy—how, to use his own words, he would "translate the ancient faith into the living language of the present age, and thus contribute to the peacefulness of inevitable transitions."

The present, he tells us, is a time of "crisis," and the ministry it demands is "the ministry of reconciliation"—the reconciliation, that is, of the ancient faith with modern thought and knowledge. He distinctly admits that some modification is called for. "Already," he says, "there is a great gulf between the old statements of belief and the educated religious mind of the country, and our churches are full of people who crave for a fresh and larger interpretation of Evangelical truths." His observations on this point are both just and forcible:—

It had been remarked by a great historian that there was nothing so revolutionary, because so unnatural and convulsive to society, as the strain to keep things fixed, when all the world was, by the very law of its creation, in eternal progress. There was no sphere of human thought where this was so clearly seen as in theology. An unprogressive conservatism meant war and revolution, and was unconsciously destructive in its influence. We cannot possibly conserve the old truths in the old forms, the Divine treasure in the earthen vessels of the past: we must keep changing the imperfect till we have found the perfect; seek a theology which, while reverencing the past, shall be open to the influence of progress.

With all this we heartily agree, but it seems to us inconsistent with the fundamental, essential principle of Evangelical Orthodoxy? What is that principle? We understand it to be this. In the Bible GOD has made a revelation of his truth once for all—a revelation perfect, all sufficient, final. GOD's revelation of himself begins and ends there; all true theology is in the Bible, and all true religion. This is the corner-stone of Orthodox conservatism. The principle is essentially conservative. It is incompatible with advancing knowledge, with real progress in theology. According to this theory all we have to do is to accept the teaching of the Bible. We must take nothing therefrom and add nothing thereto. Whatever else is wrong or false the Bible is perfect truth. All knowledge and thought must accord with it, or stand condemned as mistaken. Criticism must be confined entirely to the interpretation of Scripture, but must not call in question any of its statements. It is precisely this extravagant assumption which constitutes the difficulty in the way of rational theology. The Evangelical theory rests upon this assumption, and cannot be maintained apart from it. They are consistent, therefore, who reject all progress in theology as incompatible with GOD's perfect and final revelation of his truth contained in the Bible. They, too, are consistent who reject the Orthodox assumption, criticise the Bible in the free spirit of unpledged inquiry, and accept its several statements and representations only so far as they bear the evidence of truth. With this latter party progress in theology stands for something real. Their allegiance is given not to an infallible book or an infallible Church, but to the spirit of Truth itself. And as the truth is unfolded to them more and more with the growing knowledge of mankind, they can follow its teaching in all loyalty and singleness of heart, and so make not a pretended but a real progress in theological knowledge.

The essential doctrines of the Evangelical creed, according to Mr. HUNTER, are the Trinity, the Incarnation, the Atonement, the Sonship of Man to GOD, Conversion by Grace, Justification by Faith, Regeneration by the Holy Spirit, Judgment by Works. This enumeration is as significant for what it omits as for what it includes. The darker side of the Evangelical creed is ignored. The doctrines of Total Depravity, a Personal Devil, Hell-fire, Eternal Punishment are conspicuous by their absence. It is a great step in advance to have a scheme of Liberal Christianity expounded without these horrible superstitions. It is also much for rational thought and criticism to have done that it has been the means of discrediting these dark and cruel fancies of the old Orthodox creed. Our author's restatement consists, then, first, in quietly dropping what have been hitherto some of the most prominent doctrines of the popular theology. With regard to the other doctrines he endeavours to give them a sense which shall make them acceptable to thoughtful and intelligent minds. No doubt a sense can be put into them by an ingenious writer which will commend them in this way; but this will not one whit the more prove them to be true. All the doctrines above named are doubtless susceptible of interpretations more or less on the side of reason or unreason. The dogmas of the Trinity, the Incarnation, the Atonement, Justification by Faith, &c., may be explained in a sense that brings them in direct conflict with our understanding and moral feeling, or in a sense that appears to give them some show of reasonableness and veracity. It is an important concession on the part of modern Orthodoxy that it has abandoned the old, uncompromising, thorough-going statement of its several articles of belief, and endeavours to put them in a less objectionable and more reasonable light. It is a distinct admission that the old ground is no longer tenable—that the sense in which those doctrines were understood only fifty years ago is no longer acceptable to cultivated minds. If the last half century has wrought this change, what may the next do? It cannot be supposed that this modifying rationalising process has reached its limit yet. More probably it has only begun, or little more than begun, its pruning, whittling work. The prospect which it holds out to us of Orthodox doctrines is that of a series of dissolving views. When once free speculation in regard to the Orthodox creed is allowed, and one pares away here, and another there, A prunes off this excrescence, as he deems it, and B that, while C cuts away in some other direction, who shall say how much of the old faith will remain at last? Mr. HUNTER goes to work cautiously; he is anxious not to damage the tree while he lops off the outer branches. But another orthodox reformer is less conservative, he strips off certain portions which his fellow-worker had left, and still, according to some others, the desirable limit of pruning has not been reached. Alas, for the poor old orthodox creed while it is undergoing this treatment! "Save me from my friends," it may cry, and with good reason too. A poor mutilated, emasculated thing is the prospect which remains for it when one experiment and another, and yet another, have been tried, by omitting, modifying and toning down, to reconcile the old creed with the knowledge and culture of to-day.

"WHAT SHALL I DO TO BE SAVED?"

SUCH was the heading of a small tract put into our hands a few days ago by a respectable-looking and, doubtless, very excellent, well meaning person. We did not read it, for we have at various periods of our life received scores of such tracts, and we know by heart the evangelical answer to this momentous question. Moreover, we have never much cared about being saved at all in the manner and with the results described by our Evangelical friends. Their Heaven has never charmed our fancy. "Milk and Honey," "Golden Streets," "Gates of Pearl," harps, trumpets, and everlasting psalms kindle within us neither appetite nor desire. We have thought all these things a little wanting in variety and satisfying power, and have not been particularly anxious to acquire them, vicariously or otherwise. Nevertheless, we, in common with all that yearn and aspire, have often asked ourselves with deep solicitude, What shall we do to be saved? We have often asked, in those oft-recurring hours when the passions of the flesh were strong and the power of the spirit weak, what could be done to reverse this order of things, and to be saved from the folly of preferring the low to the high? We have often asked, when politics were surging in the bosoms of men, when they were vilifying and misrepresenting each other, what could be done to save them from folly, from malignity, from confusion and darkness of mind? When Theology lays down partial statements for complete and universal truths; when it mistakes the misty gropings of thought for full and distinct revelations; when it puts forward guesses as certainties and incorporates fables into history; when it identifies the vox Episcopi, or vox Presbyteri, or vox Concilii with the vox Dei, and hurls about its pains and penalties, its mimic thunders and lightnings on all that disown its authority or deviate from its line, we ask with sorrow and alarm what shall be done to save us from this presumptuous knowingness, this learned ignorance, this tyrannical selfishness? When, in the laborious pursuits of study, difficulties and disgusts arise one after another solely from pedantic methods of teaching; when the skies of intelligence become thick with the dust and smoke of scholasticism, we ask with giddy, weary brains, what shall we do to obtain help for slow natural capacity? how find a way into a purer atmosphere of mind and be saved from the nerve-distressing jargon of the schools? When the body is old or weak or ill; when all its bells are jangled, all its nerve-strings "out of tune and harsh," who has not asked "What shall I do to be saved from this down-dragging of the flesh, this leaden weight upon the wings of the soul? When the society of our times and country offers us artificial conventions and ceremonies instead of sweet, genial, natural habits; when it builds up barriers between class and class, checks generous impulse, and stops the flow of natural sympathy between mind and mind, we ask, what shall we do to be saved from wearing this painted mask of fashion; from being blighted and withered by constant insincerities, from being frozen to death by pride? When we look at the skies of night, at the horizon in early dawn, at the glory of noonday, at mountains and seas and clouds and stars and flowers, the humbled and subdued heart exclaims, "What shall I do to be saved from apathy and insensibility, from narrowness of mind, from torpidity of imagination, from dull silence in the heart when it ought to be voiceful with praise? From vice, from folly, from ignorance, from brutish instincts, from vanity, from fear, what shall we do to be saved? Considering that salvation of the kind we are thinking about is a long, slow, gradual, often imperceptible process, accompanied with pain and difficulty, we think it natural that the humble, the earnest, and the devout should now and then seek an inner chamber, and having shut the door, ask for a little help from on high to second the poor weak efforts that duty demands of us amidst the difficulties of things below. In the end we doubt not there will be salvation for all the patient and the striving, but considering the enormous amount of evil and folly from which we have to be saved and into which we are in daily danger of falling, we prefer much the mental habits of humility and diffidence to those of assurance and self-complacency. We have more sympathy with the man who says, "Lord be merciful to me a sinner!" than with him who supposes that he has no sin and therefore need not ask for aid.

What we can do in order to be saved must, of course, vary according to the nature of the perils to which we are exposed. Each particular case may have its special remedy or series of remedies, and these are to be discovered by thought, observation, experience and discipline, aided by those quiet, unseen influences which fall now and then into contrite hearts like dew from heaven. The ordinary evangelical idea of the means of salvation might not be unacceptable if it were expanded and modified a little. If we were told,—instead of passively relying on the vicarious agency of JESUS, to endeavour to be like him in character and conduct, in aim and purpose,—to draw the "water of life" from the same Heavenly Fountain to which he resorted,—to pray to the same Heavenly Father to whom he prayed,—to strive after purity as he strove,—to be thoughtful as he was thoughtful, to be sympathising, tender, true, brave, generous, and free, like unto him—there would not be many dissentients from the doctrine of Salvation. But when we are presented with a theory of substitution and vicariousness concocted out of the wild, unhealthy fancies of mere theologians, and told that salvation depends upon that, we cannot help turning aside to seek some more reasonable cure for our moral diseases, some more likely means of escape from the thralldom of our imperfections and faults.

After all, a time must come when, so far as relates to our improvement and progress in this world, we cannot be saved at all. At that crisis salvation consists in passing away, or, as we call it, death, the most merciful of all Heaven's merciful decrees. Wherever it may be that we go, whether to one of the higher or one of the lower mansions of the Father's house, it will, we think, be a melioration of state. It will not be a sudden supply of all wants and deficiencies of character,—not a sudden rectification of all errors and obliteration of all sins,—not a sudden cessation of all sorrow or discontinuance of efforts, but a change of discipline, influence and environment, a gradual dawning of brighter light and warmer love, a benignant teaching and training of the soul in order that it may learn and realise the means of attaining to its highest beauty and power. Salvation short of a complete harmony and symmetry of life would be unsatisfying. Imaginative and poetic minds have amused themselves with picturing the scenery and environments of the future abode of the spirit, and some have eagerly questioned the spirits to tell them particulars of their home, "Animula vagula, blandula; quæ nunc abibis in loca?" Most wisely, the spirits have never returned to tell. Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, nor imagination adequately conceived, all that God has prepared for us, whether saints or sinners, as soon as we have completed the discipline of salvation. "The soul," says a Hindu thinker, "may find shelter in the body, but not a home." For emancipation and release what we call death must intervene. When the flesh and its lusts are lost the spirit shall be saved.

A POET FROM THE MINES.

Few stories are more interesting than those which record the triumph of men and women, by the force of their will, over the untoward conditions of their lives. "Biography," said Thomas Carlyle, "is by nature the most universally profitable, universally pleasant, of all things." The history of a successful life is an inspiration. If another has thus triumphed, why not I also? It spurs to action and endeavour.

Some eighteen months ago the newspapers announced that Mr. Gladstone had granted a pension of £10 per annum to Joseph Skipsey, of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, in consideration of certain political works of his. An annuity of £10 must be regarded rather as a mark of kindly recognition than as a recompense. Ten pounds are good as far as they go, but, even with the frugal, they do not go very far toward the support of a wife and family. However, this grant may be taken to indicate that the recipient had done something to deserve it—the more so that Mr. Skipsey had no political services to show for it.

This view is confirmed by the hearty welcome which literary men gave to a little volume of "Lyrics" which appeared from Mr. Skipsey's pen several years ago. Another work,* containing some old favourites and much new matter, has just been issued. Its appearance offers an opportunity for a brief survey of a remarkable life.

Joseph Skipsey was born in 1832. He is a miner, the son and grandson of miners. He is now employed as a storekeeper at the Backworth Colliery, Newcastle-upon-Tyne. Humble as is the present condition of the Skipseys it is on record that their forerunners were among the aristocratic upholders of the unhappy Stuarts, and that their downfall was due to their loyalty in that cause. Misfortunes they have certainly had. For several generations the fathers of the family have met their end by violence. Cuthbert—father of Joseph—was killed in 1832, being shot in an attempt to make peace between a constable and some unruly pitmen.

Mr. Skipsey's self-reliance must have been inherited, in part at least, from his mother. Left in direst poverty, with a young family to support, instead of succumbing or seeking parish aid, she bravely set out to make the best of her lot. Some education she was able to give her children, but, of course, not much. When Joseph was sent to the mines he was seven years old, and his stock of learning was a knowledge of the alphabet. This good mother, we believe, still lives, supported by the son whom she loved and served so nobly.

At seven years old—a worker in the pits! Pathetic enough, yet not so uncommon in those days, was our poet's lot. No playthings for him, no swings and footballs, no joyous companions, bright faces, happy laughter. His day commenced when other little children are asleep in bed—at three o'clock in the morning, and it ended at seven o'clock at night. In the winter season he saw the daylight once a week, on Sundays. His duty in the mine was to open and shut a ventilating door at stated intervals—a poor little bit of humanity doing the monotonous work of a machine. He proved himself, however, somewhat better than a machine. The back of that door of his served him as a slate; he procured a piece of chalk, and taught himself to write. Grammar and arithmetic were his pastime on Sundays and holidays. So the child earned his bread and fed his mind, heroically struggling with what seemed like cruel destiny.

Mr. Skipsey's natural bent was towards literature, and his records took the poetic form. His experiences were striking enough to a mind as open as his to grasp their significance. More than once he himself had been in peril from explosions in the mine. His married life was embittered by the loss, through fever, of three out of his four young children. To be made perfect through suffering was decreed for him. Out of such experiences came his poems.

By-and-bye some of Mr. Skipsey's verses crept into the local journals. They attracted attention, and in 1863 he was appointed sub-librarian to the Newcastle Literary and Philosophical Society. But the remuneration was so small that, in order to make ends meet, he had to return, sorrowfully enough, to the mines. There he still is, honestly fulfilling his uncongenial task, and cheered, doubtless, by some ray of hope that as a poet rather than as a miner he may one day be known.

As a writer Mr. Skipsey is graceful as well as earnest. Some of his pieces vividly depict the life he has himself experienced. Here is one:—

"Get up," the caller calls, "get up,"
And in the dead of night,
To win the bairns their bite and sup,
I rise, a weary wight.

* "A Book of Lyrics, including Songs, Ballads, and Chants." By Joseph Skipsey. London: David Bogue.

My flannel dudden donned thrice o'er,
My birds are kissed, and then,
I, with a whistle, shut the door,
I may ne'er ope again.

Mr. Skipsey's verses are bright enough sometimes. It seems as though "the silver lining" to even the blackest cloud is ever present to his imagination. We could wish to see some of his songs set to music. There is no space here for lengthy quotations, so we will content ourselves with two verses from the poem entitled "Thistle and Nettle." They have reference to the hour when two young souls, who have loved silently, first tell their love to one another:—

Dream on, blest maid! an hour like this
Annuls an age of care and strife,
And turns into a drop of bliss
The bitter cup of human life.

The tear is by a halo gilt,
The thorns of life are changed to flowers,
The dinge into a merry lilt,
When love, returned for love, is ours.

We have sketched the life of Mr. Skipsey for the sake of its biographical interest, but we venture to think the poetry may stand apart, and that, on its own merits, without reference to the conditions under which it was produced, it will be pronounced by competent critics excellent. Success, as popularly understood, has not hitherto attended Mr. Skipsey's endeavours, but success does not always consist in altering one's condition, and the life of a man who proves himself its master, though the recognition of the world be wanting, is not a life of failure.

WALTER LEWIN.

DR. WILLIAMS'S TRUST.—XXIII.

[CONTRIBUTED BY W. D. JEREMY, ESQ.]

133. REV. NICHOLAS THOMAS HEINEKEN (1806-10).—Minister of the Old Presbyterian Congregation at Brentford (1798-1810), whence he removed to Gainsborough. He died at Bradford in 1840, in his seventy-eighth year. He was the father of the late Rev. Nicholas Samuel Heineken, of Sidmouth.

134. REV. JOSEPH BARRETT (1806-50).—A pupil of Dr. Enfield at Warrington, and of Dr. Barnes at Manchester College (1786-90), where he completed his education. Having been some years at Ormskirk, Lancashire, he removed to London in 1804, to be assistant to the Rev. Thos. Tayler, of Carter-lane, where he was afterwards the sole minister for about twenty years. A member of the Presbyterian Board (1806-23). He died July 22, 1850, at a great age. In a Memoir of him in the Christian Reformer, his friend the Rev. David Davison described him as the last of the school of which Kippis, Worthington, Rees, and Tayler were types and ornaments.

135. MOSES LAPORTE MERAC, Esq. (1807).—Treasurer of the Presbyterian Board (1804-7).

136. REV. JAMES PICKBOURNE (1807-14).—A pupil of Dr. Jennings and minister at Harleston and Brentwood successively for short periods, Librarian at Red Cross-street from 1770 to 1773, and again after an interval of two years, during which Dr. Calder acted as a substitute, from 1775 to 1777. It was probably during the interval referred to he attended some young gentlemen in foreign travel, as stated in an obituary of the poet Rogers in the Christian Reformer. Having resigned the librarianship he kept a school at Hackney for more than twenty-seven years. Rogers was one of his pupils. Mr. Pickbourne was the author of "A Dissertation on the English Verb," 1789, and "A Dissertation on Metrical Pauses," 1808. He bequeathed to the Presbyterian Board a sum of £1,000 Three per Cent. Annuities, the income of which has ever since been applied in assisting ministers and in educating students at Carmarthen College. His name deserves to be remembered. He died May 25, 1814, in his seventy-ninth year.

137. JAMES ESDAILE, Esq. (1807-12).—Brother and co-trustee of William Esdaile, Esq. (No. 120), and father of the late Mr. James Esdaile, who succeeded him in the trust. He was also the Treasurer of the Presbyterian Board from 1807 until his death, which occurred in 1812.

138. REV. THOMAS REES, LL.D., F.S.A. (1809-53).—One of the sons of the Rev. Josiah Rees, of Gelligron, Glamorganshire. Educated for the Ministry at the Presbyterian College, Carmarthen (1799-1801). Minister at Newington

Green (1808-13), and afterwards at St. Thomas's, Southwark; Secretary to the Presbyterian Board (1825-53), and to the "United Body of the Three Denominations" during the last seven years of the Union; author of "The Beauties of South Wales," 1815; "The Racovian Catechism . . . translated from the Latin, to which is prefixed a Sketch of the History of Unitarianism in Poland and the Adjacent Countries," 1818; "A Sketch of the History of the Regium Donum and Parliamentary Grant" . . . 1834. He also prepared for the press and published Lord Chancellor King's Diary, which he transcribed from his Lordship's shorthand, being Notes of Domestic and Foreign Affairs during the last years of the reign of George I., and the early part of the reign of George II. Dr. Rees also left in manuscript, in six quarto volumes (which are preserved at Dr. Williams's Library), a work entitled "The Anti-papal Reformers of Italy in the Sixteenth Century, with a glance at their Forerunners, the Sectaries of the Middle Ages." He took a prominent part in the public affairs of the Unitarians, and also of "The Three Denominations" so long as they continued united. His services were generously acknowledged by his co-temporaries, both orthodox and heterodox, and are referred to in high terms by the late Rev. R. Brook Aspland in the Memoir of the Rev. Robert Aspland, 1851. Dr. Rees left London 1853, and died a few years after at a great age.

139. REV. ELIEZER COGAN (1809-49).—For some years (1801-16) Minister of the Old Presbyterian Chapel at Walthamstow, but chiefly known as an eminent scholar and schoolmaster. He was a brother of Thomas Cogan, M.D., author of "A Treatise on the Passions and Affections of the Mind," and one of the founders of the Royal Humane Society. Educated at Daventry, under Mr. Timothy Kenrick, Mr. Robins, and Mr. Belsham, and for some time Assistant Tutor there; settled at Cirencester in 1787, and attracted notice by "An Address to the Dis-senters on Classical Literature," 8vo., Cirencester, 1789. From the time of his marriage, in 1790, he taught a school with great and increasing reputation, residing chiefly at Cheshunt and Walthamstow. At one time he had about seventy scholars. He had the reputation of having read more Greek than any man living; "the eminence he had attained as a scholar was second only to that possessed by those of the highest order." In 1817, on retiring from the pulpit, he published "Sermons Chiefly on Practical Subjects," two vols., 8vo. In 1821 the celebrated Dr. Samuel Parr wrote thanking him "again and again and again" for the "two precious volumes," and after assuring him that he should read some of the Discourses from his own pulpit; he added, "Mr. Cogan, your moral and intellectual excellences have taken firm hold on my regard and my respect; and I have this morning charged my executors to give you a ring when I am no more." Sometime after, in a letter to Dr. Abraham Rees, Dr. Parr reported that he had preached one of Mr. Cogan's sermons to the astonishment and indignation of two ecclesiastical dignitaries, who had come from Leamington to hear him preach, and who heard him preface the sermon of a Socinian to this effect:—"The discourse I am going to deliver to you came from the pen of a writer who does not belong to the Established Church, but I have the honour to call him my friend, and I am sure that his intellectual powers, his literary attainments, his candour, his moderation, and his other exemplary virtues would make him an ornament to any religious community." On giving up his school in 1828, a number of his former pupils presented him with his portrait, a fine oil painting, by Mr. Phillips, R.A., of which there is an engraving by Cousins; a photograph of which has been contributed by the Misses Cogan to the writer's collection of portraits. He died in 1855, in his ninety-third year. His various contributions to periodicals were soon after collected and published by his son, the late Mr. Richard Cogan, many years Librarian at Red-cross-street, forming an 8vo. volume, at the end of which is given a list of his separate publications. The late Mr. Madge, in a funeral sermon to Mr. Cogan, said:—"It was hardly possible for anyone to see him even for a brief space without recognising certain characteristics of his nature which commended him at once to our esteem and regard . . . There was about him an openness and simplicity like that of a child. So retiring was he and unobtrusive, that nothing but a commanding sense of duty could prevail on him to bring himself publicly before his fellowmen."

140. JOHN BENTLEY, Esq. (1810-35).—For half a century a prominent member of the Old Jewry congregation, Jewin-street, and for many years their treasurer and one of their representatives at the Presbyterian Board. A man of great vigour of mind and warmth of zeal. A persistent advocate of reform, and friend of civil and religious liberty. He sympathised strongly with the Americans in their struggle for independence, and thereby attracted the hostile notice of the Government of the day. He was the author of several articles in Dr. Rees's Cyclopædia, and wrote a pamphlet in defence of "Christian Ordinances and Public Worship." He died at his residence, Highbury-grange, in 1835, in his eighty-third year.

141. RICHARD HOLT, Esq. (1810-25).—Died suddenly at a meeting of the Trustees at the Library, 28th Dec., 1825, aged seventy-four years. He was a son of the Rev. Richard Holt, Presbyterian minister at Dover (see Monthly Repository, 1826, p. 56, where a high tribute is paid to his memory).

Occasional Notes.

It seems that even the bishops, who were the chief authors of the Public Worship Regulation Act, are beginning to feel ashamed of the scandal occasioned by the prolonged imprisonment of a clergyman for conscience sake. In the Upper House of Convocation this week a discussion took place upon the imprisonment of the Rev. S. F. Green, vicar of Miles Platting, Manchester. A resolution was carried expressive of the pain and disapproval with which this clergyman's long incarceration is regarded, regretting that his release is not legally possible unless with the consent of the promoters of the suit, and conveying to them an opinion that in resorting to such a severe process they had taken a step in excess of the requirements of the case and injurious to the peace of the Church. There were only two Episcopal dissentients from this very reasonable motion. The Bishop of London in supporting it remarked that it had been said that the bishops had done all this mischief, but none of them had thought that the Act would lead to the imprisonment of any clergyman. O sancta simplicitas! The bishops had evidently not weighed the logical consequences of their own action!

WE learn from the Christian World that the battle for and against instrumental music in the Free Church is being fought with great keenness in various Presbyteries. Parties are very evenly balanced, and as yet it is difficult to say which will have the ascendancy. The advocates of the innovation can claim that the Glasgow Presbytery—the largest by far in the church—has declared in their favour, while the opponents of change can boast of victories in the Presbyteries of Dundee, Dalkeith, and St. Andrew's, though in each case they triumphed only by a majority of one. The Dundee debate was brought to a close on Wednesday last, after no fewer than three meetings devoted to the subject. Much interest was excited by the discussion, and the agitation was not confined to the Presbytery. Meetings of office-bearers were held by both sides to elicit the opinion of laymen on the question, with the result that 263 names were subscribed to a memorial in favour of instrumental music, and 186 to another memorial against it. These documents were duly presented to the Presbytery, but the division showed that while there was a clear majority of the ministers in favour of liberty, the votes of the elders were sufficient to turn the scale the other way.

WE are glad to notice that in the fine old picturesque town of Chester the good and well-meaning people who style themselves the "Salvation Army" have had a cordial reception, contrasting most favourably with the persecution and gross insults they have encountered at Reading, Sheffield, Exeter, and other places. On Saturday last "General" Booth visited the place. A procession, headed by a brass band and the General, with other officers, paraded the streets, which were crowded to witness the novel spectacle. It is stated that the Salvationists are doing good work in Chester in promoting temperance principles. Sir Thomas Frost, the Mayor—who is a Unitarian, by-the-way—has frequently spoken publicly in approving terms of the evangelistic and temperance crusade of these men amongst the lower orders of the labouring classes in Chester. We strongly sympathise with the views expressed by the Mayor, and regard the treatment which the Salvation Army have so often experienced while carrying out—in however eccentric ways—a really praiseworthy work, as a disgrace to our modern civilisation. "The receipts at the public-houses have been seriously affected." This will partly account for the violence of opposition, and the most discreditable feature in the case is that the local magistrates, who often have large interests in breweries, distilleries, and public-houses, are not above the suspicion of having winked at, if they have not actually encouraged, the proceedings of disorderly mobs.

WE read with interest the following note from Rome respecting Dr. W. C. Perry, late of Bonn, and formerly well-known to many of our readers as junior minister of George's Meeting, Exeter:—Mr. Walter Copland Perry, commissioned by the British Government to collect casts from the antique for the formation of a small museum at South Kensington, has been for some time pursuing his task in Rome. It will be remembered that the importance of his scheme for the formation in London of a scientifically arranged museum of casts, illustrating the historic development of Greek plastic art, which might rival the kindred institution in Berlin, was publicly recognised both by the late Government and by several members of the present Cabinet. As yet, however, the fund placed at his disposal, chiefly through the interest of Earl Spencer and Mr. Mundella, is very small, and Mr. Perry is at present limiting his selection to the archaic period, trusting each succeeding year to add as many casts from the following period as the means afforded him will allow. Among the casts he will take from Rome are the Leucothea relief in the Villa Albani; Penelope, in the Vatican Museum; and Hestia Giustiniani, in the Torlonia Museum. The chief difficulty Mr. Perry meets with in this country is the deteriorated condition of the moulds, whilst new ones, besides being expensive, would become the property of the Italian authorities.

THE Oxford University Calendar, corrected up to the close of 1881, has just been issued. The summary given at the end of the calendar, when compared with that of last year, shows that the number of matriculations increased in 1881 from 758 to 776. Balliol maintains the leading number of undergraduates, having 247; Christ Church, the next on the list, 223; New College follows with 181, Exeter with 172, and Keble with 161. There has been a marked increase of numbers at Christ Church, Hertford, Merton, Pembroke, New, and Queen's, while the unattached students show a slight falling off in numbers. Of members of Convocation Christ Church has 705—by far the largest number—while Exeter takes the next place with 452 members.

A CORRESPONDENT sends us the following extract, from a letter from a friend in New Zealand, to whom he has been forwarding the Inquirer:—"I hope you will continue to send the Inquirer, although since it has been known that I have it in the house I have not had a pastoral visit from any of our orthodox parsons. But that does not trouble me. It has furnished me with arguments which have sadly puzzled the brains of some of my friends who once or twice have undertaken to put me right in theological matters. Of course, I am put down as a Unitarian. I should be proud to fight under that flag; but I am a free lance in such matters, and decline to connect myself to any dogma or creed. . . . New Zealand society is so very free from many of the trammels which exist in England, that minds advance more rapidly here; but the population is so scattered that there is little scope for organisation. The orthodox societies seem to flourish, but get more lax in their articles of belief. Some of the younger ministers occasionally take a running jump ahead, but they get brought up again pretty smartly, and find that they must confine themselves to the old ruts; in fact, they have, like other tradesmen, to supply the kind of goods ordered."

WE are glad to see that the Senatus Academicus of the University of St. Andrews have conferred the honorary degree of Doctors of Law upon the following gentlemen:—Richard Holt Hutton, M.A., editor of the Spectator; Augustus Wilkins, M.A., Professor of Latin in Owens College, Manchester; Thomas Davidson, F.R.S., F.G.S., Vice-President of the Palæontographical Society; John Hutton Balfour, M.A., M.D., F.R.C.S.; and E. Emeritus, Professor of Botany in the University of Edinburgh. The Senatus has also conferred the honorary degree of Doctor of Divinity upon the Rev. Samuel Cox, of Nottingham, who richly deserves the honour on account of his scholarly work upon "Job," and his admirable articles in the Expositor, of which he is editor.

WE hear with pleasure that the well-known hygienic reformer, Dr. B. W. Richardson, has consented to give his lecture on Dr. Priestley, recently delivered before the Sunday Society, in Little Portland-street Chapel, on the last Sunday in this month. The lecture will take the place of the sermon in the ordinary evening service. For our own part, while we prefer that the religious service should always be conducted by the recognised minister of the place, we are quite in favour of more frequently inviting cultivated laymen to appear in our pulpits, and to lecture occasionally on subjects not distinctively theological.

MR. RICHARD has introduced a Cemeteries Bill. Its object is to apply to cemetery arrangements generally the principle on which the Burial Laws Amendment Act, 1880, is based—viz., that the consecration, or non-consecration, of burial grounds shall in no way affect burial services, whether conducted by the clergy of the Church of England or by Nonconformists. While the Bill does not prohibit the consecration of cemeteries, or chapels, where bishops think fit to consecrate them, it relieves burial authorities—whether burial boards, sanitary authorities, or companies—from the existing obligation to divide burial grounds into consecrated and unconsecrated parts, and to apply for consecration, and also to provide consecrated chapels. It also enacts that, in future, parochial ministers, clerks, and sextons shall not be entitled to receive, in the consecrated parts of cemeteries, the same fees as they have been accustomed to receive in churchyards; but the existing rights of present incumbents, &c., are reserved. There is besides a measure relative to burial fees introduced by Mr. Brinton, the Liberal M.P. for Kidderminster.

THE churches and ministers at Chicago, in the United States, appear to be exercised, much as we are on this side of the Atlantic, with respect to the "drifting away of the masses from the churches." The subject was recently discussed at the "Ministers' Meeting." The general opinion supported the view that they are thus drifting. "While a Church is new," it was claimed by the first speaker, "it is apt to be all activity, sympathy, and aggressiveness—fishing for whatever it can catch. But once it gets established and well-to-do, it does not do so well as it did before; it begins to feel self-satisfied and grow seclusive." One speaker, admitting and deploring the facts in the case, found some satisfaction in the fact that some church organisations, as for instance the Primitive Methodists, seem to get at a class of people other churches only remotely touched. Another said that "the caste spirits of the wealthier, the more stylish, perhaps better educated, froze out many whom the pastor, with all his heart-burn of loving sympathy, might be unable to get back and keep. As to the remedy, it was felt that that would appear just so soon, and just so far, as the real constraint of Christ's love got into their hearts, so that the adventitious social distinction would go for nothing, in presence of the infinite interests that concern all alike. But that is just the problem which the Christian Churches have been trying to solve for the last eight centuries, and not altogether in vain, we hope, notwithstanding deplorable signs to the contrary.

MR. SYDNEY COLVIN, of Trinity College, has been re-elected Slade Professor of Fine Arts at Cambridge for a fourth term of three years.

A Son of Belial. Biographical Sketches. By Nitram Tradleg. London: Trübner and Co. 1882.

The authorship of this book is an "open secret," and with a very little ingenuity "Nitram Tradleg" will reveal itself as the name of a well-known minister of a Free Christian Church "not a hundred miles from the metropolis," as the phrase goes. The said minister is a former scholar of Balliol; and as he has abjured the faith of his fathers and of his own early life in the conscientious search after the highest truth, and has found, we trust, a lasting spiritual home among those who are regarded as heretics, if not something worse, by nearly the whole Christian world, he has thought fit, by a questionable play on a word, to dub himself "A Son of Belial." But if such a one as he, so thoroughly honest, straightforward, and strictly conscientious as he stands forth in these autobiographical sketches, can have anything whatever to do with the fallen angels of whom Milton sang, we prefer to regard him, as in the strict etymological sense of the term, "Lucifer," the light-bringer, since he has not only found his way to higher light, but has devoted himself to the noble task of bearing it to help others on their way.

The life of every genuine man, however humble it is, if only it be faithfully recorded, contains materials of interest to his fellow-beings; in the most prosaic nature there is often an unsuspected vein of poetry, and in the most commonplace character hidden materials of romance. But the author of this book is by no means of a prosaic nature, and his career so far has been one of considerable variety and no ordinary interest. Yet at the same time we must honestly say that the book is not so good, especially in the earlier chapters, as it ought to have been as the work of an accomplished and a scholarly man. The humour is often forced; the style is sometimes very slipshod; incidents are detailed that are much too trivial to have gone beyond the pages of a private diary; there are personalities under the thinnest possible disguise which should have been avoided, and there is a pervading levity of tone which often transgresses the borders of good taste. But at the same time we are ready to pardon these and other obvious imperfections for the sake of the manifest honesty and perfect sincerity of the writer; the almost simple-minded ingenuousness of character he reveals, and the glimpse it gives into a life and training happily far different from the purer atmosphere in which those who are "free born" have been enabled to develop their nature and character without the repressing and often hideously perverting influences of a false and tyrannical theology. Taking these autobiographical sketches as in the main genuine, as they evidently are, it may be useful to dwell upon them at some length and to bring out the lessons they convey to the advocates of a liberal faith.

"Nitram Tradleg," the subsequent Balliol scholar and Anglican clergyman, we learn with some surprise, was born of Dissenting parentage in one of the strictest of orthodox sects, the Particular Baptists. His father was secretary of one of the religious societies; his mother was an accomplished lady, the authoress, we believe, of some excellent books for children, who died much too early to exercise a permanent influence upon the minds of her children. "Nitram" was brought up in accordance with the strictest principles of his sect, undergoing a kind of training which we regard with horror as killing the free healthy life out of a child, and tending to make existence absolutely joyless, were not Calvinistic parents often happily better than their creeds, and were there not also other counteracting influences in the healthy robust nature of childhood. He was early initiated, not only into the secret of death, but also into the concomitant mysteries of hell. The tortures of the lost had a strange fascination for his fancy, and in very early years he would gloat over the hymn beginning as most congenially adapted to his frequent frame of mind. He early displayed some symptoms of infant piety, and could not remember the period when he was not, as the tracts phrase it, "concerned for the salvation of his soul."

"My thoughts on dreadful subjects roll, Damnation and the dead,"

How thankful we Liberals ought to be that whatever our faults are, "infant piety" among us is something quite abnormal, and that a child concerned about its soul would be regarded as almost a monstrosity! The older he grew the more intense did his religious apprehensions or his "conviction of sin" become. He calls to mind more than once lying awake until the terrors of wrath to come became so vivid that he shrieked aloud, and was found sitting up in bed and roaring lustily, simply from fear of hell! No wonder that those who have escaped from the dogmatic system which sanctions such a training into the perfect liberty of the children of our heavenly Father look back with abhorrence on the theology of their early life, and are often led by a not unnatural reaction into extremes of negation! We need not dwell upon the somewhat trivial details which are given of early life, including two child sermons which are inimitable parodies on the sort of weak tautological nonsense that used to be heard from the pulpits of Dissenting chapels in country towns.

It is manifest that one main object of the book is to illustrate the melancholy effect of Evangelical training upon the mind of a sensitive child. What the author tells us of those early years does not represent, he tells us, one tithe of the anguish he endured and never spoke of. He comes to the deliberate conclusion that his habitual frame of mind at this period, and his strictly logical interpretation of the Evangelical theology in which he was indoctrinated were most detrimental to his young morality, most enervating to all efforts at self-improvement and self-culture.

When our auto-biographical hero was about twelve years old his father gave up the post of Secretary of a religious society in London, and accepted a similar one in Manchester. The family removed to Altrincham, and "Nitram," and his brothers were placed at a private school at Timperley, kept by "the Rev. W. J. Bell, M.A.," an Irish clergyman, who soon afterwards became bankrupt. In a chapter with the very unsavoury title "The Bug-hunters," an amusing account is given of the "Entomological Society of Bowden and Altrincham," formed by the boys and their scientific friends; as also of their varied experiences in editing and publishing "The Hebdomadad Bug-hunter." On one occasion they held an annual meeting, and got the Unitarian minister of the neighbourhood to take the chair. Our young hero was not quite easy at such unorthodox patronage, but they knew "Mr. Whitelock" simply as a "collection" not as a minister of religion. Our friend Mr. Whitehead, minister at Hackney, but at that time of Altrincham, will probably recall with an amused smile the history of this youthful Entomological Society. After a short interval with a private tutor near Oxford, "Nitram" is placed at the "Miller's Institute in Manchester, then under the guidance of the Rev. Stanislaus Jermyn," or, in other words, the famous grammar-school of that city, of which the Rev. Nicholas German was then the head-master. Of Mr. Jermyn and his successor, Mr. Strider, who will be easily identified by our Manchester readers, an amusing sketch is given. Under their effective teaching "Nitram" rapidly makes progress in his classics, and after severe competition with the flower of English public schools, he gains the prize of a scholarship at "Belial College, Bosphorus."

The two chapters on Oxford life are among the best in the book; but we must hasten rapidly on, and confine the rest of our notice chiefly to extracting some of the best passages for the amusement and edification of our readers. Our hero entered with zest into the social and intellectual life of the great University, and was a caustic critic also of its shortcomings, especially in theological matters. He describes the charms of the scholars' table at "Belial" in the following pleasant passage:—

Though I say it that should not, the scholars' table at Belial—

"Cujus pars parva fui,"—

was a feast of reason and a flow of soul. Never in all my life before or since was I among a company of men so young and ardent, yet so utterly devoted to plain living and high thinking. Never was I in an intellectual atmosphere so fearless and so free. I never knew what true tolerance without indifference was till I came to Bosphorus. It was a new experience to me altogether—to me, who had been brought up to regard Ritualism and Rationalism as the two right arms of the devil, to find myself suddenly launched among a lot of men who were some of them Ritualists of the deepest dye, some of them Rationalists, some of them Positivists, some of them Materialists, all eager in advancing their respective views, and yet all ready to listen with courtesy to their opponents. Nobody was shocked or offended by anything; every one was open to argument—and here was I, the almost solitary Evangelical of the crew, who had been taught to regard any deviation from the doctrine of justification by faith in the "all-sufficient sacrifice" as something wicked and monstrous; who had never before, or scarcely ever before, seen a heretic or High Churchmen in the flesh, quite taken aback to find how earnest, how serious, nay, how good, how much better than myself (to say nothing of how much cleverer—for that I was prepared), these High Churchmen, and above all, these heretics were. What was more, they were quite as ready to listen to me as I to them. I found none of that pride of intellect among them against which I had been warned; but, on the contrary, a candid, straightforward way of looking at things, which, ignore it as I would, I could not but feel I had too often missed among my former associates.

The debates of the Union are also graphically described, and a verbatim report is given of the exquisitely absurd speech in which our young scholar proposed and carried the motion "That John Bright is a disgrace to his country"—a speech which was parodied at the time in Lunch, and created quite a scandal!

The two following anecdotes of University life are well worth quoting:—

A certain candidate for orders at the hands of an Evangelical Bishop was warned he had better get up the article on justification by faith, as this was a favourite point with the said Evangelical Bishop. When his turn came for viva voce, the Bishop put him through his paces on this identical subject, and was pleased with his ready answers.

"And now, sir," he continued, "I should be glad to be favoured with your views on justification by works."

"Works!" muttered the unfortunate candidate, who was no theologian and somewhat fast to boot; "Works! works! I never thought about works. Damn works! Damn works!"

The Bishop overheard him.

"Well," observed his lordship blandly, "right in substance though rather strongly expressed."

Se non è vero, è ben trovato, for the son of an Evangelical Bishop.

Another bore reference to the failing faculties of the celebrated Dr. Rule, President of Maudlin College. The University had just been thrown open, so far as the B.A. was concerned, to persons extra Ecclesiam Anglicanam, but some colleges, Maudlin among them, retained their own restrictions in the matter of admission. One of these was the requirement of a certificate of baptism. The son of a Baptist minister had about three months previously undergone the rite with a view to matriculation. The rev. doctor was sorely puzzled by the date of the certificate. At last a light seemed to dawn upon his somewhat bewildered brain, and he exclaimed, "Dear me! Parents married rather late in life, I suppose, sir—eh?"

We have glimpses of Jowett, Liddon, Pusey, Scott of the Greek Lexicon, and other celebrities, but we must limit ourselves to one extract respecting Professor Jowett:—

I never remember any other distinctly theological conversation with Professor Jewell, but his influence upon me was subtle and subduing. His lightest word seemed to have about it a weight of wisdom and breadth of bearing which constantly took me by surprise, and opened up entirely new aspects of every subject that we touched. I was once very virtuous in an essay denouncing John Stuart Mill and the utilitarian philosophy. I thought I should here have the sympathy even of Professor Jewell, but he simply remarked, "I often think that however low theological standards of morality may be, the average practice of mankind is lower. Don't you think if every one lived up to the utilitarian standard the world would be much better than it is?" Now, like almost everything that Professor Jewell said, there was something almost absurdly obvious in the truth of this remark when once it was made. But how few think of making it! He followed it up by another: "You know it's no use pretending to think that any system of morals has an immoral tendency. A man would be mobbed if he preached immorality." This too was clear enough, but it had never struck me before. Another time he said, quite incidentally, in a lecture, I think, on political economy: "It is quite impossible for the educated and the uneducated to hold the same form of religion." This was a deadly thrust at the very core of my Evangelical convictions, but there was no gainsaying it. Another time, speaking of objections to the study of metaphysics, he observed, in the calmest way, as if he were stating the most palpable commonplace: "Some people say metaphysics are a dangerous study, they make people doubt the truths of religion. I am far from denying that there is danger in studying metaphysics; but then, upon the other hand, we must remember there is no safety in shutting one's eyes." At last I determined to read with fear and trembling the "Essay on the Interpretation of Scripture." I did so, and everywhere it was the same. At the end of every paragraph I responded involuntarily "Amen." I had no choice but to do so; each sentence and proposition appeared so simple and self-evident. I had always, it seemed, held the same, only without knowing. But at the end of the essay there was my orthodox faith? Overturned in irretrievable ruin, never to be rebuilt upon the old foundations.

Mr. "Tradleg," in due time, as soon as the terrors of the schools were over, resolved to study theology with the view of taking orders. In this decision, he says, he was quite an exceptional phenomenon at Belial, Professor "Jewell" being credited with regarding it as the final cause of his existence to dissuade young men from taking orders. In the present instance he allowed that subscription was a serious obstacle, but, on the other hand, he thought that a clergyman had exceptional opportunities of "liberalising the Church," and of aiding the cause of education. With this carte blanche for heresy our friend decided that it should be his mission in life to help in liberalising the Church of England, and to this end he began to make acquaintance with the Theological Professors of Bosphorus. A caustic account follows of the lectures of these eminent divines, who, to a man, ignored Renan, Strauss, Ewald, and taught on the old lines just enough to enable their classes to obtain a testamur for holy orders and prepare them for a bishop's examination—in other hands, for subscribing to the Thirty-nine Articles. Before our hero left college, however, Professor "Jewell" had begun to lecture on the Gospels, and from him his students obtained their first definite notions as to the formation of the New Testament Canon. But with this exception, he tells us, they picked up theological information when and how they might, from miscellaneous reading, especially the Westminster and the Theological Reviews, from German periodicals, from sly hits by the Professor of Modern History, from elegant inuendoes by the Savilian Professor of Geometry—of whom it is recorded that when ousted from his lodgings to make room for a collection of stuffed birds, he asked, "Am I not of more value than many sparrows?"—from rays of light and sweetness distilled from the lips of the Professor of Poetry (Matthew Arnold), and last, not least, from delicately veiled parallels between Christ and Socrates, and general remarks on the principles of the "Höhere Kritik," as applied to the "Platonic Dialogues," or the narratives of Thucydides, by the Regius Professor of Greek (Jowett).

On leaving "Bosphorus" Mr. "Tradleg" accepted a Mastership at his old school in Manchester. Here he soon broke down in health, and was shipped off on a journey to the Isles of Greece and to Athens, in which classical city he took pupils in English and German; had a distant prospect of a University Professorship, and acquired that accurate knowledge of modern Greek which enabled him on his return home to prepare a standard grammar of the language. The chapters on the Isles of Greece, Corfu, and Athens are among the most interesting in the book, and are written with considerable literary ability, abounding in felicitous description and apt illustration.

On returning home, in 1868, he first married—and happily was not done for—and then, after an abortive attempt to get a living as tutor of "unattached" students at Bosphorus, he found himself in the position of a would-be curate in search of a title. His experiences would probably furnish materials enough for another very amusing book. Once he says he had a bite near Banbury:—

I saw the incumbent, the Rev. Mr. Density, a much more intelligent man than his name would seem to imply. He was a High Churchman of the safe and moderate type. I told him I was Broad, as broad as ever he liked, and hoped it was as broad as it was long. I pointed out to him that the Broad Churchmen and the High had this in common; they both appealed to Christians as already the children of God, the Broad Churchman regarding them as such by nature, the High by baptism, whereas the Evangelical treats them as children of the devil previous to conscious conversion. I hoped there might here be found a modus vivendi and operandi for both of us.

Then said Mr. Density, "But do you believe in Baptismal Regeneration?"

"Why, of course not," I replied.

"But can you preach it?"

"How can I preach what I don't believe?" was my not unnatural rejoinder.

Mr. Density thought it might be done salvâ conscientiâ, on the principle that I might preach it not as my individual opinion, but as the doctrine of the Church! Proh tempora, proh mores! Had it really come to this? I was not prepared to find so very low a standard of personal morality among the English clergy, but this was only a first lesson.

Then he accepted again a mastership at the Manchester school, and in that mill ground for more than two years, eager to get away. His experiences of the Manchester clergy of that date were not fortunate. Bankruptcy seemed a chronic condition of most of them, while their Bishop, the late Dr. Prince Lee, was as overbearing and unpopular as his successor, Dr. Fraser, is just the reverse. However, in due time he obtained a curacy with the Rev. Dr. Bantham, rector of All Souls, Chorley-with-Fetlock" (Dr. Burton, of All Saints, Chorlton-upon-Medlock), of whom the following veracious stories are recorded:—

Shortly after my engagement with Dr. Bantham he preached an eloquent sermon on Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego. I may here remark by the way that he is not the celebrated divine who, on reading the account of their martyrdom, or would-be martyrdom, to avoid tautology said—instead of repeating their names—"the afore-mentioned gentlemen," and when he came to the recapitulation of the musical instruments, "cornet, flute, harp, sackbut, psaltery, dulcimer," &c., shortened it to "the band as before." In the present instance, he insisted on the credibility of the narrative, and of miracles generally. "Believe in God, and all is easy," was his answer to every cavil.

"Well, doctor!" I said, when we reached the vestry, "you had a tough job to-night to establish the credibility of miracles; perhaps you made the best of a bad case."

"Ah!" was his reply, "queer story, isn't it? Now I wonder after all whether it's true, or whether it's all a fable!"

"You did not seem to have any doubt at all on the subject in the pulpit," I remarked.

"No, no," he said, "I always preach positive doctrine in the pulpit. Come and smoke a pipe."

So much for clerical conscientiousness. And yet he was not a bad fellow. As for the Trinity, he thus disposed of it—in the smoke-room—not in the pulpit.

"You know it's all nonsense to say that three are one, and one are three; only a lunatic can believe that. But then look here. Here am I, there are you, and there's Mr. Paul," another curate. "Well, we are three persons, but all clergy."

"Yes," I said, "but not one clergyman. Your doctrine lands us in Tritheism."

So he tried a new tack.

"I don't see why there should not be a hundred persons in the Godhead, I daresay there are. Its only a mode of manifestation."

This I told him was Sabellianism, and then he shut up; but my High Church (as yet lay) brother who had come to see me, and whom the churchwardens with difficulty dissuaded from reading the lessons in a cowl, was very much shocked at the off-hand manner in which my incumbent treated the deepest mysteries of religion.

His next engagement was at Liverpool, as curate of St. Lawrence's (St. George's), Everton. He called himself at this time an Evangelical Liberal, but was really in full sympathy with Colenso and Jowett. About this time a proposal was made to him, through the late Thomas Scott, of Ramsgate, to go out to Natal as Dean to Bishop Colenso; but nothing came of it, and he feels now that it would have been a false step. The crisis came at last, and is described as follows:—

Meanwhile the dénouement came. There was a little Unitarian chapel in our parish, whose minister I knew. A new chapel was being built, and was to be opened by James Martineau of London. I had read his "Endeavours after a Christian Life," and was so far in sympathy with them that I only wished they had gone a little further in the direction of Pantheism and anti-supernaturalism than they seemed to go. I was asked to attend the meeting in Liverpool to welcome Mr. (now Dr.) Martineau on this occasion, and my desire to see him and hear him made me eagerly close with the offer. Those who have heard and seen that remarkable man, perhaps next to Emerson and Carlyle, one of the most towering intellects, certainly one of the finest souls in this or any age (and this I say notwithstanding a profound divergence of sentiment on many most vital points, little suspected then), can well imagine the impression he made on me when I saw and heard him for the first time. No once since Professor Jewell had ever struck me with such unmixed admiration. His speech on that occasion, one of his last and most memorable utterances, is in print, and I need not repeat it. After several speakers had followed him, some gentlemen asked me whether I would object to come on to the platform and say a few words. As this was just what I wanted to do, I, of course, did not object. I said a few words, a very few. Liberavi animam meam. I said in effect that I regarded the Unitarians in my parish and myself as doing the same work, though in different ways. They were trying to destroy dreary dogmas from without, and I from within. For the rest I rather apologised for, than justified, my position as an officiating minister of the Established Church, on the ground that the prayer-book was such a mass of self-contradiction that any man might console himself for the evils of subscription and conformity by the reflection that whatever objectionable things it said in one place it unsaid by implication in another.

A few days after this little escapade my incumbent called upon me and asked me whether I did not think, now that I had openly "cast in my lot with the Deists," I ought to resign my curacy. I told him, considering the said Deists were among his most liberal helpers in his parish work, he having himself employed me to collect subscriptions among them, his way of putting it was hard and unfair to them as to myself; that as long as I thought I had a locus standi at all in the ministry of the Church of England, I should not resign one curacy until I had either found another, or made up my mind no longer to officiate as a clergyman; if I was good for any curacy, I was good for his; or if he had a complaint against me, let him write to the Bishop and get leave from him to enforce my resignation. This in the end he did; but I had gained four months' delay, a little breathing time to reflect on my future course. The Bishop, to save himself trouble—it is Chester I am now speaking of—simply gave his consent, and I received six months' notice.

After a brief experience as Master at the High Church College of St. Vincent de Paul, Stoke-on-Stafford (Stoney Stratford) Mr. "Tradleg" found himself drawn closer to his natural affinities the Unitarians, and received invitations to preach among them, which decided his future career. But we must quote one more passage describing his new friends as he then found them, and defining, as far as he could define it, his religious position:—

To say that I have enjoyed among these excellent persons a fuller liberty of speech than would have been possible elsewhere, to say that they have treated me everywhere and always with a generosity, a tolerance, a forbearance, far beyond my expectations and deserts, is only to say what every one who has ever had the happiness to cast in his lot amongst them will know without being told. To add that here at length my wanderings are at an end would be to go beyond the humanly possible to predict.

But, for the purposes of this narrative, I may here lay down my pen. Should I attempt to describe the subsequent changes of thought which my mind has undergone amongst them: how the early joy and exultation which once inspired me when I first cast aside the last remaining shackles of a dogmatic creed, have given place sometimes to a feeling of sadness and dismay at the seemingly hopeless task of thinking out anything like a positive faith, such as could take the place of a discarded tradition: were I to tell how the doubt, whose invasion was so welcome so long as it only seemed to threaten the hideous phantoms of my childhood with assault, grew to me, as it has grown to thousands, terrible and stern, when it seemed to steal upon the sanctities of trust in a Heavenly Father, and hope in a future life: were I to follow in detail the line of reflection which has brought me to where I stand, a firm persuasion that as spiritual things are spiritually discerned, so it is idle and fruitless to search for an objective ground whether in authority or in metaphysics, for that religious sentiment, whose whole value is that it is subjective, an inward experience, not an outward fact; I should be writing, not a religious romance, but a theological treatise.

Our hero's subsequent career is familiar to most of our readers if they have solved the mystery of the title page. Had space permitted we should like to have added some comments on the general drift of the book and the lessons it conveys, but they can be drawn for themselves by all intelligent readers. We have paid the book the unusual compliment of a second perusal. It grows upon us with further acquaintance. At first we were strongly impressed with its faults: now we see more clearly its real value as a record of an honest mind struggling amid all kinds of doubts and difficulties out of the thick cloud of Calvinistic Orthodoxy, and groping its way with but little help from without to clearer light and larger liberty. With all its faults of style and manner, with all its trivialities and defects of taste, it is the work of a thoroughly genuine, honest, and straightforward man, and deserves to be read with the sympathy and respect of all liberal thinkers.

An Introduction to the Study of the New Testament, Critical, Exegetical, and Theological. By Samuel Davidson, D.D. Second Edition. Two Volumes. Longman and Co. 1882.

The Second Edition of this standard work, this magnum opus crowning the useful and laborious life of an accomplished theological scholar, has been revised throughout, and is in many important respects so greatly improved as to have become practically a new work. In his new Preface Dr. Davidson reminds his readers that since the first edition was published in 1868 Hilgenfeld's "Einleitung" has appeared, the outcome of many books and essays published by that indefatigable scholar. Other publications on the New Testament, especially the valuable "Paulinismus" of Pfleiderer, have made important additions to the science of Biblical criticism and interpretation. It is somewhat humiliating to have to confess that the most important additions to Biblical literature in recent years have been made in Germany and Holland; although there are three works of extensive if not very profound scholarship and varied merits lately published in England to which Dr. Davidson makes special reference. Of these "Supernatural Religion" was published anonymously, and excited much interest by its free criticism of the advanced Rationalistic kind. This learned work, as our author justly remarks, furnishes efficient aid to rational inquiry, and deserves to be studied by all lovers of free investigation. The assaults which were made—by the present Bishop Lightfoot and others—upon minor details leave its main positions unimpaired, although it is still, we observe, the fashion of Orthodox writers to affect to regard this work as unworthy of serious criticism.

Of the Lives of Christ and St. Paul, by Canon Farrar, Dr. Davidson remarks that "they do little to advance the knowledge or criticism of the New Testament, but are rather retrograde, by wrapping traditional views in rhetorical verbiage. It is matter of regret that the preacher's fine talents should be used in gilding opinions which scholars have abandoned, or in dismissing the results of sound criticism with an easily-pronounced condemnation."

Of a third and a still more pretentious work our learned author writes:—"The 'Speaker's Commentary' takes its stand upon ideas that have passed out of the sphere of established criticism, and furnishes small help to an intelligent study of the Christian records. If orthodoxy be not still enthroned in high ecclesiastical quarters it looks as if it were, and receives official homage accordingly." Imperfect as are these and similar works it is allowed that their appearance shows an increasing attention to the Scriptures; and they may do good, not only by various correct expositions which they cannot avoid giving, but by references to other views and valuable sources.

The learned author states with great care and completeness the best ascertained results of the highest criticisms as well as the conclusions of his own elaborate and patient investigations. If his views are not always approved, they are expressed with perfect freedom and manifest extensive learning, and the result must be to stimulate patient investigation and independent thought. The work in its present form is the result of long years of unwearied labour, and the author is amply entitled to indulge in the modest hope that the changes both in substance and form have made it worthier of acceptance. Some of the general principles on which this elaborate work is founded are clearly stated in the following interesting passage from the preface:—

The writer has tried to investigate again and again the New Testament records as impartially as he can; and trusts he has not knowingly neglected any part of the evidence on which they rest, or underrated their true value. Christianity is an essential factor in the education of the human race, and deserves the most serious attention. Bound up with the eternal welfare of man, it supplies the purest incentives to that higher life which is begun on earth and perfected in heaven. As the first three centuries witnessed its passage through various phases till it assumed a different aspect from the original one, or even from that in which Paul moulded it, the historian must study these shifting views and bring them out into day. The amalgamation of Petrine and Pauline tenets, followed by Johannine ideas, led up to a theological system which has dominated succeeding times, with a current of Alexandrian philosophy running through it, leaving the forensic logic and Judaic atonement of Paulinism unchanged. Instead of the church being fitted by a long education to be "the expositor of the true apostolic doctrine," it seceded from that doctrine and corrupted its simplicity, so that the fathers of the third and fourth centuries, far from being genuine successors of the apostles in respect of theology, set forth a system inconsistent with theirs. The conflict of more than two centuries made the orthodox church a bad interpreter of apostolic doctrine, so that it is impossible to transfer the immediately ante-Nicene, or the Nicene Creed itself in its main features, to the time of Paul, without misreading his own statements. In dealing with the theological diversities of the first two centuries the author has felt the difficulty of the task.

The need of the age is that rational interpretation of the New Testament which traces the spirit without slavery to the letter; the essence as well as the form; the characteristics of the human instruments through which the divine is revealed; and shows them to the reader in their manifold aspect. But there seems little prospect of this amid the commentaries large and small that issue from orthodox workshops with an ecclesiastical imprimatur on their front, ruffling the surface of traditional opinion slightly, without satisfying the thoughtful or allaying their doubts. Too often do they and dogmatic systems gloss over the contrarieties and imperfections which are the unavoidable outcome of finite minds in various stages of man's history. Looking only at one of the factors which a divine revelation consists of—the finite and external—they neglect the subjective one which has every difference of degree belonging to the individual soul. And even this procedure is not usually followed; the prudence of silence being a ready antidote to the arguments and conclusions of a liberal theology; since it is easier to take no notice of opinions that disturb inherited belief than to let in fresh light which may bewilder by its suddenness or frighten by its novelty. If the author has helped in any degree to forward a thorough exposition of the canonical Scriptures, he will not have laboured in vain.

It is impossible for us within the brief space at our command to give anything approaching to an exhaustive account of an elaborate work, every chapter of which opens up controversies on which whole libraries of ponderous tomes have been written. Briefly, we can only say that Dr. Davidson arranges the books comprising the New Testament in what he regards as the true chronological order. His "Introduction" commences with the First Epistle to the Thessalonians, which he still treats as a genuine work of St. Paul, though he no longer defends the authenticity of the Second Epistle which he refers to a post-Pauline period. The Pastoral Epistles, the Acts of the Apostles, the Epistles to the Colossians and Ephesians, those of John and Jude, the Gospel of John, and the Second Epistle of Peter, were none of them, according to our author, written in the first century, or by the persons to whom they are usually attributed. The Gospel of Matthew is Jewish in its character; was meant for the use of Jewish Christians, and to promote Jewish Christianity, and contains several traditional incidents and representations. In regard to the Fourth Gospel, the general conclusion is that it is a kind of Gnostic Gospel in which Alexandrian philosophy and Hellenic culture combine to set forth Christ in his mysterious relations to the Father and to believers, as well as the influence of his teaching in raising humanity to its highest ideal. In discussing the question of authenticity Dr. Davidson criticises at much length the views of Matthew Arnold, Andrews Norton, Dr. Ezra Abbot, and other recent writers. The approximate date of the Gospel is assigned to the year A.D. 150, or the time of Justin, "whose view of the Logos comes nearest the Johannine."

In his valuable dissertation on the Apocalypse Dr. Davidson interprets this enigmatical book, on which so much nonsense has been written, in accordance with the principle which recognises in the history of the period when it was written (A.D. 68-9) the key to the solution of its mysterious riddles. The whole of this chapter is an example of sober and learned criticism.

Of this work generally it may be said that it condenses the results of the best and latest criticism of the New Testament, presents the materials which enable the student to weigh conflicting theories, and is a model of clear exposition, full learning, lucid arrangement, and candid criticism.

Chapters from the Autobiography of an Independent Minister. London: Williams and Norgate. 1882.

We have read this book very patiently, with the hope of discovering a good purpose in it, but we have found none. Nor have we found any particular beauty in it, to be marred by its many defects. It is abrupt and brusque in style, and the narrative has little to interest us. The author, if the story he tells be really his own, seems to have possessed an abundant store of self-confidence, and he never affects to conceal his consciousness of the fact. Once, indeed, he appears little like himself. This was on the last occasion on which he met one of his congregation at the Lord's table. He tells us:—

"It proved an ordeal of the severest description. I looked forward to it with some apprehension, but I thought and hoped that I had nerved myself sufficiently to get through. I had yet to learn how much of the woman there was in me. After singing the first hymn I commenced the usual address, but the first word was the last, indeed, the whole of it was never uttered, repeated efforts only provoking intenser, and at last overwhelming, emotion. There immediately followed a quick half-stifled sob throughout the whole chapel. Before five minutes were passed away I was leaning on the table, my hands covering my face and crying like a child. As the trial was the sorest through which I had passed for many a year, so the grief was the greatest. It was long since I had shed a tear, but now I was thoroughly unmanned and helpless. When I could speak I asked one of the deacons to give out a hymn, but he replied, 'It's no use, Sir, no one can sing.' As I was still unable to speak, the bread and wine were carried round without even the reading of the passages of Scripture so appropriate to the occasion. The service then ended. No hymn was sung, and no Benediction pronounced. My retirement from the chair was the signal that the end had come, and that scene in my life's history has yet to be repeated. It cannot be described. It was suppressed heart-rending sorrow."

Another passage will indicate more nearly what the reader may expect in the book than does the above. Soon after his settlement in one pastorate a Mr. Littleton read a paper at a "district meeting," and

"Amongst other things the essayist thought that there was a lack of distinct Gospel utterance, and that to this might be traced the deadness, coldness, and worldliness of the Church. There was also a want, he contended, of faithful Scriptural exposition and enforcement of its detail. 'For instance,' he said, 'I have never heard a sermon against the eating of blood, and yet our ministers must know that although in the fifteenth chapter of Acts it is forbidden, the practice of eating black puddings is quite common.' After pointing out that the usual method of killing fowls left blood in them, and ought to be protested against, he passed on to notice, at great length, the uncertain sound which was often given about 'the second coming of our Lord,' which he proved was nigh at hand and not afar off."

The chief incidents in the volume are connected with the protracted opposition offered to the subject of the autobiography by two exceedingly ignorant and vulgar-minded men, deacons of the Church, and a few others, friends of these, who must have made matters extremely uncomfortable for him—unless, indeed, he was possessed of no finer feeling than we find displayed in this relation of his experiences. If the author was publishing this narrative by way of "rounding upon" his old enemies, he could not have given this incident greater prominence. We are only too painfully aware of the self seekings and bickerings and dissensions that go on continually in not a few of the "causes" of which those Mr. Wilkinson (for that is the name the writer of these chapters is known by in the book) was called to be pastor over are the types; but we do not think they make pictures good to look upon. We suppose the author, however, knows for whom he writes.

Short Notices.

A Good Soldier of Jesus Christ is the appropriate title of a discourse in memory of the Rev. John Wilson, minister of the Church of the Messiah Ministry to the Poor, Lawrence-street, delivered in the Church of the Messiah, Birmingham, on Jan. 15 last, by the Rev. Henry W. Crosskey, and published by request. Mr. Crosskey gives a very interesting sketch of Mr. Wilson's devoted labours, of which an outline has already appeared in these columns, and adds the following tribute to his character and work:—"I never knew a man with a more unbounded faith in the possible goodness of his fellow creatures. He confesses to having met with a few so selfish and brutal as to appear almost deaf to all entreaties, and upon whom long and patient labour must be bestowed before they can be won to a high and pure life; but he adds, 'I have during ten years' experience as a domestic missionary met with but one man in whom I have failed to trace a redeeming feature.' The cynics who ask whether life is worth living and sneer at the world because of its follies and iniquities as a rule are those who sit at home in luxurious ease and scarcely know what want and sorrow are. Those who go out into the streets and lanes of the city, among the poor and the maimed, and the halt and the blind, are those who believe the most nobly of life and cherish the grandest hopes for the poorest and most afflicted souls. A noble lifework has been nobly done by the friend whose loss we mourn to-day. The duties of his office have been discharged with a strong persistency of purpose singularly contrasting with his physical weakness; with unaffected, unobtrusive piety; with patient pity; with unconquerable confidence that every child of God may arise from the death of sin to the life of righteousness; with abounding sympathy for those in any way afflicted in mind, body, or estate: with unsparing toil. The results of such lifework can be summed up in no reports; can be gauged by no statistics; can be reckoned up by no visible and outward signs. An influence goes out from a good man, beyond his own knowledge or the knowledge of his comrades, or the knowledge of any one save the Almighty Father of us all."

The Origin of Evil, and other Sermons. By the Rev. A. W. Momerie, M.A., D.Sc. (Blackwood.)—This is the second edition of a handsomely-printed volume of sermons, to which we gave a high and deserved tribute of praise when they were first published a year or two ago without the name of the author. They are remarkable for their large sympathies and their breadth of tone, and we are glad to know the name of the preacher to whom we have felt a more than ordinary debt of gratitude. Dr. Momerie, who is the distinguished professor of logic and metaphysics in King's College, London, is one of the rising preachers of the day; and we learn now also for the first time that he is the author of the philosophical treatise on "Personality," which was published at the same time as the first edition of these sermons, and was also received with marked favour in these columns and elsewhere.

A Synopsis of Butler's Analogy of Religion. By the Rev. R. O. Thomas. (London: Thomas Murby.)—This is a digest, set out in sections and paragraphs, with the main thread of the argument underlined or put into blacker type, of a work which has held an important place in the study for over 150 years. Whatever may be the present value of the "Analogy," there is no doubt this synopsis will prove a help towards acquiring an intelligent estimate of its scope.

House and Home. A Popular Journal of Social Progress.—The first number of the new series of

House and Home contains a variety of interesting articles and good portrait of Mrs. Gladstone, accompanied by an interesting biographical sketch. Dr. Richardson writes a valuable paper on "The Care of Children," a subject he is well qualified to discuss; Mr. Thomas Beggs contributes a suggestive paper on "The Legislation of the Future;" Mr. S. C. Hall writes on "Temperance Children;" Mr. F. Wagstaff on "The Home;" and Mr. E. J. Baillie commences a series of articles on "Mr. J. Ruskin and his Teaching." A number of miscellaneous topics are also treated, and a serial story by Mrs. E. J. Lyssaght is commenced. Official information of the Club and Institute Union, and club news is given, House and Home being now the organ of that important movement. The writer of the biographical sketch of Mrs. Gladstone in House and Home, speaking of her solicitude for the people, says:—"It is for the rural population of Hawarden she is concerned? Then their attention is directed to their culture, to their moral and physical elevation, and to their spiritual progress. She encourages floriculture and horticulture among them, and stimulates in the cottages a spirit of rivalry regarding the neatness, order, and cleanliness of their homes. It is thus that she exerts her influence in improving the houses and homes of Hawarden; and in all these beneficent and benevolent works she is heartily supported by her family, while her distinguished husband delights to take part in local efforts for the common good. Her kindly sympathies are also evoked in aid of the dwellers in large centres of population and industry, who have none of the natural advantages of air and sunshine, trees and flowers, which are the common property of villagers. In London Mrs. Gladstone's name is associated with such benevolent movements as homes for working girls, convalescent homes, hospitals, and other institutions for the relief of the suffering, or the amelioration of the condition of the people. Mrs. Gladstone is in sympathy with all the more prominent movements for increasing the well-being of the people. But her philanthropies exemplify the adage—'If you want anything well done, do it yourself;' and probably her best work for humanity has been done under her own personal supervision."

Anthropology. By Charles Bradlaugh. (London: Freethought Publishing Company, 1882.)—This pamphlet gives the substance of four "Hall of Science Thursday Lectures," and is a fair presentation of the new study of man. Lord Derby said at Liverpool a week or two ago that "democracy appreciates education, and especially appreciates science." We do not know whether he took his cue from the National Secular Society, of which Mr. Bradlaugh is the president, but it is certain that scientific study is being extensively encouraged at the Hall of Science, in Old-street. Sir Henry W. Tyler drew public attention to this fact during the last Session of Parliament, and may renew his attack in the next. Since that time both the number of teachers and students has considerably increased at classes held there in connection with the Science and Art Department of South Kensington, and these "Thursday Lectures" have been inaugurated. Amongst the rest we notice there have been series of lectures on "The Physiology of Home," by Mrs. Besant; and on "The Chemistry of Home," by Miss Hypatia Bradlaugh.

Literary Notes.

MESSRS. CHATTO and WINDUS have in the press "Ireland under the Land Act," being a reprint of the letters contributed recently to the Standard by the Special Commissioner of that paper in Ireland. There will be an appendix, giving the leading cases under the Act, with the evidence in full, and a collection of judicial dicta, &c.

MR. LEUIS STEVENSON, the well-known essayist, is at work on a critical biography of William Hazlitt. It is time that due honour should be paid to one of the first of critics and most delightful of writers.

PROFESSOR GEORGE STEPHENS will shortly begin courses of lectures on Old English and Shakespeare at the University of Copenhagen.

A FRESH edition of 2,000 copies of the early "Poetical Works" of Mr. Browning, in six volumes, has been printed.

A NEW edition may shortly be expected of Mr. G. W. Vyse's book on Egypt, which only appeared about a fortnight ago. It will recognise with more explicitness the extent of the obligation which the author owes to Mr. Stanley Lane Poole's "Egypt," published last year by Messrs. Sampson Low.

THE Academy hears that Mr. Tuer's handsome book on "Bartolozzi and his Works," published less than two months ago, is almost out of print. The large-paper copies can no longer be obtained, and the price of the quarto edition will be raised immediately.

MESSRS. CHAPMAN and HALL will shortly publish a "Charles Dickens's Birthday Book." Miss Dickens has compiled the volume, and her sister, Mrs. C. E. Perugini, supplies five illustrations.

THE members of the Royal Commission on Technical Instruction have been visiting the chief schools and adult classes in the Manchester district, as well as those of Liverpool, Oldham, and the other centres of textile manufacture.

THE Marquis of Lorne is reported to have taken the initiatory steps for the establishment of an Academy of Sciences in Canada on the principle of the Académie of Paris.

DR. A. C. BURNELL, the eminent Sanskrit scholar, has finally decided to retire from the Madras Civil Service. His health will not permit him to return to India, even for the three years that would qualify him for a full pension.

THE demand for dainty little waistcoat-pocket volumes seems to be daily increasing, and the supply keeps pace with it. Messrs. Griffith and Farran, who have just issued "The Churchman's Daily Text-Book" in that form, will publish immediately "Queen Mab; or, Gems from Shakespeare," arranged and edited by C.W.

A CORRESPONDENT writes to the Academy from Melbourne:—"Mr. Francis Ormond, the gentleman who founded the college bearing his name, has offered to give £5,000 towards the establishment of a working-man's college in Melbourne, provided a similar sum be subscribed by the public."

HERMANN SCHLAGINTWERT, the Oriental traveller, is dead. He will be remembered in conjunction with his brother Emil, as an explorer of the Himalayas, he being especially associated with the natural history of those mountains.

THE French Government, adopting a proposal made by the Académie des Inscriptions, has given an official mission to M. Aymonier to study the languages and inscriptions of Cochinchina.

THE proprietors of the Cologne Gazette intend starting a branch paper in Strasburg on April 1. The new paper is to be Liberal in principle and independent of the Government, but its main object is to promote the interests of Germany in Alsace and Lorraine.

MR. B. W. NICHOLSON, B.A., of Trinity College, has been elected to succeed the late Rev. H. M. Cox as Bodleian Librarian. There were twenty-seven candidates. The election is made subject to the approval of Convocation. Mr. Nicholson has been librarian to the Union, and organised the Conference of Librarians held at Oxford a few years ago. He is at the present time librarian of the London Institute, Finsbury.

THE health of Mr. J. R. Green, the historian, who has been wintering at Mentone, is so poor that "The Making of England," which is just out, will be his last serious contribution to historical literature, though he may still write fugitive essays. He has at all events and for the time abandoned any hope of fulfilling a long-cherished design of writing a history of England to the Norman Conquest, which would have served as an adequate introduction to Mr. Freeman's great work.

OF 980 women who are this year pursuing the higher courses of education in St. Petersburg, 521 study physics and mathematics, and only 417 literature; 610 are of noble origin, and 744 profess the Orthodox faith.

SUFFICIENT progress has been made with the new building of the City of London School on the Thames Embankment to justify the committee in the anticipation of its completion by next October.

SUBSCRIPTIONS have been opened in the leading cities of the United States for the American memorial window to Dean Stanley to be erected in Westminster Abbey.

It is stated that Musurus Pasha, the Turkish Ambassador, has just completed a translation of Dante into Greek, a copy of which he has presented to Mr. Gladstone.

MR. E. B. NICHOLSON, of the London Institution, has been selected by the curators for the office of Bodley's librarian, vacant by the death of Mr. Cox. We understand that the curators were influenced by the desire to get a man of strong practical tendencies, and used to plenty of hard work. The Academy says: That Mr. Nicholson has it in him to justify their choice in other respects also will be least doubted by those who have known him best and longest.

Our Contemporaries.

DR. H. W. BELLOWES.

The New York Independent writes:—The Rev. Henry Whitney Bellows, D.D., after a serious illness of a few days, expired, at his residence in this city, on Monday morning, in the sixty-eighth year of his age. Dr. Bellows was graduated at Harvard College, when but eighteen years old. He travelled in the South, preached awhile in Mobile, and in his twenty-fourth year was settled over the church in whose service he died, having ministered to it first in Chambers-street, then in Broadway, under the new name of the Church of the Divine Unity, and finally, after the removal to the present position, as All Souls' Church. He was also in the editorship of the Christian Inquirer, the Christian Examiner, and the Liberal Christian. The most important service of his life was, probably, his work as president of the S. nary Commission, in which it was said that he directed the administration of 15,000,000 dollars in supplies and comforts and of 5,000,000 dollars in money. He was active in the literary and art enterprises of the city, and was to be relied on as happy and effective in his extemporaneous efforts. As a preacher and lecturer he was successful, without reaching the highest line of eloquence in either department. His sonorous voice and melodious sentences, his good sense, literary culture, and rhetorical power made him a favourite, especially with strangers visiting the city. He was a man of great kindness, of much religious feeling, and preached with dignity and unction. In the theological questions before his denomination he was with some justice charged with inconsistency, sometimes acting with the more conservative men and sometimes with the radicals. This came in part from the conflict between his deep religious faith and his passion for liberty; but still more from the overflowing kindness of his heart. On all public occasions the favourite clergyman of the city, his loss will be deeply felt.

"ENTHUSIASM AND THE MOB."

The Pall Mall Gazette, in the course of an article under this heading, says:—

It is an undoubted fact that there is something in what used to be called Enthusiasm that most mobs have always found intolerably provoking to them. The common multitude have seldom had much fancy, save for a few moments at a time, for those exhibitions of unhealthy religious excitement in which heat of pious imagination gets the better of the judgment, and extravagance of fancy overrides reason. The soul-rescuer and the saint-errant, as some one has called the violent proselytiser, has never been a popular character in the streets. Feelings of nationality and politics entered into the satisfaction with which a Roman crowd beheld a Christian given to the lions or consumed by fire in the pitched shirt. Delight in such a spectacle sprang from something quite different from mere aversion for a new religion. Such an incident as the destruction of the meeting-houses by the London mob in Dr. Sacheverell's time was not religious, but political. The shameful brawling which went on a few years ago in the church of St. George's-in-the-East was mainly due, not to a dislike of the "Enthusiasm" of the High Church clergy and their ceremonies, but to the old national antipathy to anything that looked like Romanising. The same may be said of the Lord George Gordon riots, which people who are ignorant of history have at least read about in "Barnaby Rudge." But we need not go very far for a really parallel exhibition of the popular hatred of Enthusiasm. It is only a hundred and thirty years since Wesley encountered exactly the same spirit as is now shown towards the Salvationists. At Bristol the streets were filled with the rabble, defying the magistrates, shouting, cursing and swearing, and ready to swallow the ground with fierceness and rage—though we may remind the worthy mayors of Reading, Basingstoke, and other places, that wherever the authorities put a bold face on it, and insisted on the law being respected, the Methodists were left alone. At Wednesbury mobs were collected by the sound of horn, windows were demolished, houses broken open, goods destroyed or stolen, men, women, and children beaten, pelted, and dragged in the kennels, and even women outraged. At Walsall Wesley had a narrow escape with his life; men struck at him with bludgeons, his clothes were torn off his back, and he was dragged about by the hair of his head. The same senseless fury showed itself in various parts of England, not without some grotesque incidents—as when the mob of St. Ives pulled down the preaching-house to show their joy that Admiral Matthews had beaten the Spaniards. In truth, this is the secret of half of the disorders of this kind; they spring from animal spirits and a sort of sporting instinct, and are not associated with any clear ideas, or even well-defined antipathies. One sentiment of a very intelligible sort is no doubt present on these occasions. The actors and sympathising onlookers know that the Enthusiasts would, if they could, put a stop to all cakes and ale. In the violence done to the Methodists the alehouse-keepers were always supposed to be the moving force, just as their representatives are in the violence of to-day.

THE "ENCYCLOPÆDIA BRITANNICA."

The Athenæum, reviewing the thirteenth volume of the new edition of this great work, writes:—

If it would be unjust to compare Professor Baynes to Diderot, and his coadjutors to the Encyclopedists of the most influential "Encyclopédie" the world has yet seen, it must be granted that the new edition shows as great a revolution in thought. The old analysis first systematically expounded in the "Encyclopédie" has given way to the new historical school, which has conquered all down the line. It is curious to reflect how few are the names to which can be traced back the influences which have made these volumes what they are. Mr. Darwin, Sir W. Thomson, Professor Stubbs, Sir H. S. Maine, Mr. Hutchinson Stirling, Mr. Spencer, Professor M. Müller, and Mr. Matthew Arnold almost sum up the "seminal" influences at work in England during the past quarter of a century in science, history, law, philosophy, philology, and literary criticism. Except in physics, the whole movement may be summed up in one word—development. We now seek to know not so much what a thing is as how it came to be. This tone of thought is predominant in the "Encyclopædia," and at times leads to a neglect of the facts in the search after their history.

The most interesting articles are theological, or rather Biblical. Nowhere is the change of tone more perceptible than in the treatment such topics have received here. Historical criticism has taken the place of homiletics, with results peculiarly embarrassing to dogmatic theology. The change in English thought about such subjects can be easily measured by a comparison of the mild rationalism of the "Essays and Reviews" and the thorough-going historical criticism of the principal article in this volume, devoted to the rubric "Israel," and entrusted to the leader of the new school, Professor Wellhausen. This is the first time that construction has been attempted on the new theory of Israel's development, viz., that the Pentateuch is the finale and not the overture of the Old Testament. The history of the patriarchs is, of course, entirely ignored, the opening scene being placed at the Exodus. From that time onwards, however, the outline of the history is not so divergent from older views as one would expect. The chief point is the new departure made by the prophets in recognising the universalistic tendencies of the great empire.

A POSITIVIST HALL.

The Christian World writes:—Mr. Frederick Harrison, the well known writer, and a leader among the Positivists, is at present delivering, on Sunday evenings, a course of nine lectures on "The Principles and Critics of Positivism," in Newton Hall, Fleur-de-lis-court, Fetter-lane. Newton Hall is one of those buildings, hidden away in a network of dingy and curious lanes and alleys, which are to be found in many of the older parts of London, but of which the passers-by in the adjoining great thoroughfares generally know nothing. It is a room capable of seating perhaps two hundred persons, and is approached by two short flights of stairs, and seen from outside might be mistaken for a small chapel. The interior is newly painted and brightly lighted, with a large open fire-place at each end, in which cheerful fires were blazing on Sunday night. There is a dais and a small reading desk for the lecturer, and the audience are accommodated with chairs. At intervals around the walls are busts of some of the principal sages and heroes of the Comtist Calendar. On Sunday evening the room was crowded, among the audience being a good sprinkling of ladies, to hear the second lecture, on "Comte and Carlyle." The lecture was one of those brilliant and incisive pieces of criticism of which, any month almost, we may see examples in one or other of the leading magazines. Mr. Harrison placed in strong contrast the Deism of Carlyle, with its strange, wild cynicism, and "Biblical wrath," and its disastrous effects upon a great and noble nature, with the loftier and more elevating creed of Positivism. He also discussed the position of Dr. Martineau, whom he regarded as perhaps the most eloquent, gifted, and high-minded representative of modern theistic belief. Mr. Harrison's lectures, striking and felicitous as they are in thought and impression, lose a good deal from want of freedom and readiness in delivery. The speaker's voice lacks clearness and compass, and his enunciation is stumbling and hurried.

THE BRADLAUGH CASE.

The Spectator writes:—What astonishes and distresses us most in this matter is the lukewarmness of Liberal Members on a point of such paramount importance. It is, of course, quite true that the constituencies do not understand the question, that they vaguely think of it as a 'question between Atheism and Religion, and that in very many Liberal constituencies it does a man great harm to be—most falsely—regarded as an ally of Mr. Bradlaugh, because he demands common justice to the electors of Northampton. But though this is undoubtedly the case, though it is perfectly true that the Liberal cause has been more prejudiced by its supposed alliance with Mr. Bradlaugh than by any other event which has happened for the last two years, this is not a matter on which Liberals who know what Liberalism means can afford to skulk. It would be better, infinitely better, to pass at once a new theological test, and to demand from every Member a written subscription to the belief in God, than to justify this discreditable assertion by the House of Commons of its right so to interpret for itself the obligations of an oath, as to exclude Atheists by a side wind. If the course of English history had not, unfortunately, brought the House of Commons into such a position that its privileges have inspired an almost idolatrous reverence in the Courts of Law, a Member refused the power to assert his legal rights as a representative might have applied to the Courts for a mandamus to the House of Commons, to permit him to take the oath which the law imposes on him as the condition of fulfilling his obligations as a representative. We all know that this is practically impossible. The Courts of Law have burned their fingers in former times by engaging in struggles with the House of Commons, when it was very desirable that they should have been worsted. And the consequence is that they will never again assert an authority over the House of Commons, even in matters on which such an authority would be quite legitimate. None the less, the House of Commons would, if it were wise, remit to the Courts of Law every strictly legal question affecting its own privileges. And there can be no doubt that a question so remitted would be properly considered and determined by the Courts of Law, if they found that they had any jurisdiction in the matter at all. And if they had none, it could be only because no doubtful point of law was at issue. Of this we are sure, that Liberals who think that the Democracy has a right to erect its own feelings into a final disqualification for the fulfilment of his Parliamentary functions by a duly-elected member are inventing a scourge for Liberalism of thought and action which they will one day bitterly repent.

THE SPEAKER'S COMMENTARY.

The Literary World writes:—The fate of the "Speaker's Commentary" has never been doubtful to those who know how soon literary partnerships are dissolved by agreement. When various writers of unequal merit are held together by such a feeble link as the name of the Speaker, it is impossible to secure the same equal treatment throughout. In some parts the Commentary is made up of mere padding—it is crude, superficial, and commonplace; while, turning over a few pages, as if to impress us with the sense of contrast, we have another epistle of the same apostle, analysed with acumen and research. It is not in the nature of things that such unequal alliances can last. Augustus and Lepidus, Pompey and Crassus cannot long continue together; the weaker lags behind; the public begin to ask for a separate reprint of some one Commentary, as that of Westcott on St. John, and in the long run the publishers yield to the demand, and in this way seals the fate of the work as a whole.

It is no fault of its able editor, Canon Cook, that this reply to the proposal of the late Speaker is not all that we could wish. In some respects it comes up to, and even surpasses, the modest standard of excellence marked out in the Speaker's original proposal. It is a Commentary which any educated man who is not a theologian may consult with profit. Its aim is to give the results of modern criticism and research without those laborious details which force us to apply to the German school of critics their own proverb, that we cannot see the trees for the wood. There is a neatness, a simplicity, and an absence of the two faults of scholars, dogmatism and pedantry, which are its chief charms. It would be mere prejudice not to admit this. The level is, on the whole, sustained throughout with consistency, which is that of moderate Anglican orthodoxy, which does not blink at difficulties, nor, on the other hand, exhaust our patience by an interminable list of solutions. These merits, of a golden mediocrity, between ignoring difficulties and peremptorily solving them, are more conspicuous in the later volumes than the earlier. As we might expect, the Old Testament portion is more disappointing than the New, since the difficulties there are more formidable, and less open to solution from the point of view of a compromise. The Pentateuch, for instance, is handled by no less than five writers, all divines of repute, and one, Mr. Thrupp, no mean Hebraist, but we rise from its perusal, as a whole, dissatisfied. Not one of them meets point blank the difficulties which to Ewald are insuperable, and with which Mr. Robertson Smith has shaken the pillars of the temple of orthodoxy in Scotland. The same superficial treatment attends us all through the books of the Old Testament.

While the list of contributors to the "Speaker's Commentary" is fairly representative of the state of scholarship in the English Church, it would have attained a higher level if the selection had been more freely made out of a wider circle. We see no reason why laymen or divines of other denominations should not have been invited to co-operate. Instead of overworked bishops like Dr. Jackson and Dr. Jacobson, we should have been glad to see writers such as Mr. Cox, of Nottingham, has gathered around him. Dis aliter visum. We must take it as we have it, and the result is, in the Horatian line,—much which is good, more which is indifferent, and more still which is little, if at all, above mediocrity.

THE REVISED VERSION.

The Times of Tuesday, in an article on Convocation, writes:—

A pitched battle is certain to be fought very speedily over the Revised Version of the New Testament. Already a respectable organ of Conservative opinion has sounded the war-cry against its new readings with as much feeling as if it thought Mr. Gladstone had been among the revisers. The volume is in some sort the acknowledged child of Convocation. Not the less bitterly on that account will its title to acceptance by the Church be canvassed and assailed. A body like Convocation, with the spirit in which it commonly considers disputable themes, cannot appease the discord aroused by some doubtful changes in the authorised translation. Vituperation and taunts will not arbitrate finally between contending scholars. The use of the debates, which are certain to proceed on the controverted passages, will be that the country may hope to be told what they are, their number, and their comparative importance. If at the end of the wordy warfare the public be able to perceive what is the actual amount of questionable matter, something will have been gained. The high probability is that a majority of persons who speak the English language will be content to regard the uncertainties as still uncertain, provided they may keep so much as remains behind admitted. A more positive result might have been anticipated from the inquiries of Convocation into the process by which the Revised Version is to become the Authorised Version, if Convocation were not what it is, and what it has shown itself to be. Convocation could not by its own decree legalise the employment of the new version in the services of the Established Church. Were Convocation, however, to pronounce a clear view that the version should be thus introduced, the sanction of other authorities, whether the Queen in Council or the Legislature, would probably not be withheld. As it is, the Government and Parliament can scarcely expect to receive much assistance in their meditations on the rank to be assigned to the work from the Assembly which might be imagined to be peculiarly fitted to advise them. It is not so much that the prevailing temper of Convocation is opposed to that of the country at large as that Convocation is not organised to speak with a voice the country can recognise as representative.

MAX MULLER ON HIS HIBBERT LECTURES.

The Indian Theistic Review in its last number has the following interesting letter addressed to its editor, Babu P. C. Mozoomdar, by Professor Max Müller, in reference to a review of his Hibbert Lectures:—

I wanted to discuss with you chiefly with reference to that excellent article of yours published in the Theistic Quarterly Review, October 1879. Of all the reviews which my Hibbert Lectures have elicited I liked yours the best, because it went to the very core of the subject which I undertook to treat. You have seen better than any body else that the problem which I wished to discuss in my "Hibbert Lectures," and to illustrate through the history of religion in India was the possibility of religion in the light of modern science. I might define my object even more accurately by saying that it was a reconsideration of the problem left by Kant in his "Critique of Pure Reason," after a full analysis of the powers of our knowledge and the limits of their application, viz., "Can we have any knowledge of the Supernatural?" In Europe all true philosophy must reckon with Kant. Though his greatest work, "the Critique of Pure Reason," was published just one hundred years ago, no step in advance has been made since with regard to determining the limits, i.e., the true powers of human knowledge. Other fields of philosophy have been cultivated with great success by other observers and thinkers, but the problem of all problems, How do we know? stands to-day exactly as Kant left it. No one has been able to show that Kant was wrong when he showed that what we call knowledge has for its material nothing but what is supplied by the senses. It is we who digest that material, it is we who change impressions into percepts, percepts into concepts, and concepts into ideals; but even in our most abstract concepts the material is always sensuous, just as our very life blood is made up of the food which comes to us from without.

Why should we shrink from that? Why should we despise sensuous knowledge? Is it not the most wonderful thing we know that we should be able to see and hear and feel? We may understand, i.e., be able to account for our concepts, because they are more or less our own work; but our precepts pass all understanding. They are the true miracle, the truest revelation. But men are not satisfied with the true miracles of nature and the true revelation of God, they must have little miracles of their own, and they place these miracles of men far above the miracles of God. So it is with our knowledge. Instead of seeing the light of God in every ray of light, hearing His voice in every note of music, and feeling His presence in the touch of every loving hand—our wise philosophers turn round and say that what they want is what cannot be seen, cannot be heard, cannot be touched, and that until they have that, their knowledge is not worth having.

Now on this point Kant, too, seems to me to be under the influence of the old philosophical prejudices. He thinks that the knowledge supplied to us by the senses is finite only, and that there is no sensuous foundation for our ideas of the Infinite or the unconditioned. He does not indeed surrender these ideas, but he tries to justify them on practical and moral grounds, not on the grounds on which he justifies all other knowledge, namely, perception.

My chief object in my Hibbert Lectures was to show that we have a perfect right to make one step beyond Kant, namely, to show that our senses bring us into actual contact with the Infinite, and that in that sensation of the Infinite lies the living germ of all religion. Of course I do not mean that this perception gives us a knowledge of the Infinite as it is in itself. This can be said of our perception of the Infinite as little as of our perception of the Finite. Kant shows again and again that our perception can never give us a knowledge of things in themselves, but that all our knowledge applies to the pressure or impressions on our senses only. But though we cannot know things finite, as they are in themselves, we know at all events that they are; and this is what applies to our perception of the Infinite also. We do not know through our senses what it is, but we know through our very senses that it is. We feel the pressure of the Infinite in the Finite, and unless we had that feeling, we should have no true and safe foundation for whatever we may afterwards believe of the Infinite.

Some critics of mine have urged that what I here call the Infinite is not the Infinite, but the indefinite only. Of course, it is in relation to us. We only know it as the Indefinite, as the partially defined,

We try to define it and to know it more and more, but we never finish it. The whole history of religion represents in fact the continuous progress of the human definition of the Infinite, but however far that definition may advance, it will never exhaust the Infinite. Could we define it all, it would cease to be the Infinite, it would cease to be the Unknown, it would cease to be Inconceivable and the Divine.

But how, I have been asked again, are we able to define the Infinite even in this indefinite way? My answer is, look at the history of mankind. From the very beginning of history to the present day man has been engaged in defining the Infinite. He has ascribed to it whatever was the best known to him from time to time, and has named it accordingly. And as he advanced in his knowledge of what is good and best, he has rejected the old names and invented new ones. That process of naming the Infinite was the process of defining it at first affirmatively, then negatively, saying at least what the Infinite is not, when human reason discovered more and more her inability of saying what the Infinite is. If these names, from first to last, are not names of the Infinite, of what are they the names? Of the Indefinite? There is no Indefinite per se, but only in relation to us. Of the finite? Certainly not, for even the lowest names of the lowest religions exclude the idea of the Finite.

You ask me (p. 50) how with this view of the Infinite I can say that "the outward eye, the mere organ, apprehends the Infinite, because the Infinite has neither form nor dimension." When I used the expression "to apprehend the Infinite," I surely explained what I meant by it. Yes, I maintain and I do so, as going beyond Kant's philosophy, that the eye is brought in actual contact with the Infinite, and that we feel the presence of the Infinite through its pressure on all our senses. Our senses, if I may say so, feel the Infinite, and out of that plenitude they apprehend the Finite. To apprehend the Finite is the same as to define the Infinite, whether in space or time or in all other sensuous perceptions. You speak of the outward eye, the mere organ. Is there an outward eye? Is there a mere organ? Is not the simplest perception of a ray of light the most wonderful act of knowledge, which the "mere organ" is as little able to explain as the whole apparatus of all our so-called faculties of knowledge? Yes, to me the first ray of light perceived is the perception of the Infinite, a revelation more wonderful than any that followed afterwards. We may afterwards define the light, we may count the vibrations that produce different forms or colours of light, we may analyse the nerves that convey the vibrations to the nerve centre in the brain, and yet with all that we want to-day as much as the ancient prophets thousands of years ago, some voice, some will, some Infinite Being saying and willing, let there be light.

You say you agree with me so far as to think that sensuous perceptions suggest the Infinite (p. 53). I do not quarrel about words, and am quite willing to accept that mode of expression. But if the senses can suggest the Infinite, why, then, do we want, as you say, another special faculty in the soul to apprehend the Infinite? If the senses can suggest the Infinite, then let what we call the understanding, or reason, or faith, develop that suggestion; but the important step is the first suggestion. I do not object to a division of the faculties of the soul for the purpose of scientific treatment. But as the five senses are only five modifications of perception, so, in its truest essence, all the so-called faculties of the soul are but different modifications or degrees of cognition. Sensuous knowledge is the first knowledge, and therefore often considered as the lowest. But as without it no knowledge whatever is possible to human being surely we are wrong in degrading it, or in not recognising that, as the beautiful flower is impossible without the ugly root, so the highest flights of speculations would be impossible without what you call "the mere material organ of the eye."

Then, you ask, why, if faith is but a development of that faculty of knowledge the first manifestations of which appear in sensuous knowledge, have not the animals arrived at the same development? Why has no animal faith in the Infinite? My answer is, every being is not what it is, but what it becomes. There are stages in the growth of the animal and of the man where both seem alike, there are stages where the animal seems even more perfect than the man. But, as a matter of fact, the animal stops at a certain stage and cannot get beyond, while man grows on to reach his full development. When we see a baby and a young monkey, we have no reason to suppose that the one will develop into a speaking animal the other not. But so it is, and we must simply accept the facts. It is language that marks the line which no animal can cross, it is language that enables man to develop his percepts into concepts, and his concepts into ideals. The highest of these ideals in the Infinite in its various aspects, physical, metaphysical and religious, and I have always held and I still hold even against the greatest of all modern philosophers, that the material out of which this ideal is constructed is in the first instance supplied by the senses, that it is not a mere postulate of reason or aspiration of faith, but shares with all our knowledge the same firm foundation the evidence of the senses.

So you see my letter has grown into a long epistle, and if you like, you may print it in the same journal in which your review of my "Hibbert Lectures" appeared. Your friends will then see, as I hope you may see yourself, that though we may differ in the wording of our thoughts, our thoughts spring from the same source, and tend, in their various ways, towards the same infinite ocean.

ROTHERHAM.—On Friday, 10th inst., Mr. A. W. Chadburn, of Sheffield, kindly exhibited a beautiful series of dissolving views to the children of the Sunday-school of the Church of Our Father, Rotherham. On the motion of Mr. Councillor Walker, seconded by Mr. Houseley, superintendents of the School, a vote of thanks was passed to Mr. Chadburn.

HASTINGS.—A memorial window has just been placed in the Unitarian Christian Church at Hastings by Mrs. Francis, in memory of her husband, the late Mr. Samuel Francis, a much loved and honoured member of the congregation, who died Feb. 16, 1881. On Sunday morning last the Rev. J. Ruddle preached a sermon on the "Memory of the Good," the object of which was to show how the memory of faithful friends who have departed strengthens our hope of immortality, lessens our dread of death, and deepens our trust in Providence. He concluded thus: "I am led to make these remarks to-day because the new window, which now for the first time adds beauty and attractiveness to this house, is to many of our friends a good deal more than an additional adornment. It is the memorial of a good man, who, until about a year ago, worshipped here with them. I regret that I had not the privilege of knowing Mr. Francis. Yet it has been with much pleasure that I have heard from several friends who knew him well accounts which so beautifully blend to form a character of a type towards which so many of us strive and so few attain. A man of great activity and yet a man of modesty, a man without pretentiousness. When something was to be done he was to the front with his aid; and when disputes, and those small jealousies which torment even very good people caused trouble, he was emphatically the man of peace. It is, therefore, with much confidence in its sanctifying and saving power that I command our friends to cultivate the memory of such a man. We are but a small and struggling church, a church composed of mortal men and women imperfect like other mortals. There is none among us who does not mean to do well; there is not one among us who does not find that evil is present with us even when we would do good. Something more is needed in such a case than the best efforts of a minister yet young in years and in experience. Let what is lacking be supplied in the memory of the faithful dead. To our bereaved sister who has given us this memorial thanks are due from all, and from none so much as from the minister who feels that his hands are strengthened by this appropriate and kindly gift. Thereby the responsibility of every soul is increased. We have one more motive for perseverance in working out our own salvation."

BIRMINGHAM OLD MEETING HOUSE.—The removal of this interesting memorial of Nonconformity in Birmingham by the forthcoming extension of the New-street station will be marked by the issue of a very interesting memorial. Mrs. Catherine Hutton Beale, a member of the congregation, has carefully collected all the inscriptions on the gravestones in the chapel yard, and has made drawings of the mural tablets in the chapel also, and these are to be printed in a royal quarto volume for a limited number of subscribers. Nearly two hundred inscriptions will thus be preserved, and as some account will be given of the history of the chapel and the schools and of the ministers and members of the congregation, the volume will not only be welcomed by those more immediately interested, but will be an acceptable addition to the history of our town during two hundred years.

Correspondence.

"THE IRISH QUESTION."

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—It is rather hard to satisfy Mr. J. Orr. In his reply to my first letter he very slightly and superciliously disposes of "W. W." as "versed only in Cork politics." When "W. W." amiably attempts to soothe him with Mr. J. Chamberlain's "Defence" he accuses "W. W." of sheltering himself beneath the shield of that Achilles. What politics or what politician would Mr. Orr summon from the vasty deep to allay his unquenchable aspirations? Yet in one part of his letter he expresses his high esteem for Mr. Chamberlain; but, alas, in another he thinks it hardly fair for the President of the Board of Trade to take advantage of his high position to brand men hitherto deemed honourable with the crime of inciting to arson, outrage and assassination without bringing them to trial, &c. Again, he says, "Mr. Chamberlain is quite capable of discriminating, and much too just, I believe, to attribute such action (as the Cork instance of intimidation) to the regular organisation." In this estimate I perfectly concur, extending the capability of discrimination and justice to the Government as a whole. But, unfortunately, there is such a thing as irregular action of a regular organisation, and such action necessitates the intervention of a higher regulator. "By their fruits shall ye know them." Mr. Orr thinks the League was not responsible for the actions of its individual members or even local branches "such as that of the Cork branches." It is very evident that the Government thinks differently. So do most peaceable and law-abiding people. The head is responsible for the land, ay, and for the tongue, too.

Both your correspondents, "Mr. Orr" and "An English Liberal," seem to expect that the Government should take them into their full confidence and specify precisely the grounds on which they judged it expedient to imprison the "suspects"—an expectation as unreasonable as impracticable in the exceptionally dangerous state of this "land of Ire."

If Parliament thinks that the Executive has exceeded its prerogative, a vote of want of confidence will speedily issue in an appeal to the source of all political power. In that case let Liberals duly weigh the speculative merits of the Conservative and Progressive Parties. Mr. Parrell facetiously baptised the Chief Secretary for Ireland "Buck-shot" Forster. Perhaps your correspondents would prefer as his successor "Grape-shot" Blank. To such complexion must it come if the mild, merciful, patient, peace-seeking Gladstone, Bright and Forster are cashiered.

THE PEABODY DONATION FUND.—The annual report of the trustees of this fund has been issued. The net gain of the year, from rents and interest, has been £29,751 1s. 9d., as shown by the annexed accounts. The sum given and bequeathed by Mr. Peabody was, in 1862, £150,000; in 1866, £100,000; in 1868, £100,000; and in 1873, £150,000; making a total of £500,000; to which has been added money received as rent and interest £280,448 4s. 9d., making the total fund on the 31st December last £780,448 4s. 9d. The trustees have borrowed and are owing the Public Works Loan Commissioners £62,833, 6s. 8d. The expenditure to the end of the year has been £781,040 9s. 7d. Up to the end of the year the trustees had provided for the artisan and labouring poor of London 6,160 rooms, exclusive of bath-rooms, laundries, and washhouses. These rooms comprised 2,787 separate dwellings, which were occupied by 11,459 persons, 432 new dwellings have been opened by the trustees during the past year, and for these there have been upwards of three thousand applicants. The death-rate in the Peabody Buildings for the year was 17·22 per 1,000, which is about 3·98 in a thousand below the average of all London for the same period.

We learn from the Scotsman that the old burial ground at Ecclefechan, in which Carlyle was interred, has recently been put in order by persons having rights of sepulture there. The boundary wall has been repaired, and walks have been laid out. But Carlyle's grave is marked only by the remains of a few wreaths. Not even his initials are carved on the insignificant head-stone, though the stones on each side bear the initials of his mother and his brother.

The Liberal Pulpit.

IN MEMORIAM.—WILLIAM DENNIS OF NORTHAMPTON.

BY THE REV. E. R. GRANT.

Amos v. 8:—"He turneth the shadow of death into the brightness of morning."

As the bells last Sunday were ringing their call to morning worship another call came to that dear friend who is in all our thoughts to-day, and he obeyed the call without any shrinking or hesitation knowing that it came from One who "turneth the shadow of death into the brightness of morning." And I cannot let this opportunity pass without uttering just a few words in memory of a life so honourable, and a death so peaceful.

It was impossible to know Mr. Dennis long without being convinced of the fact that he was no ordinary man. And when a superior nature lives and works, takes a prominent place in a town for a number of years, it is well to study the spirit and ask the meaning of such a life, for it is a matter of great importance what kind of people come across our path. They look upon us. We see them in the streets. They come to our houses. They utter words long remembered. They shine into the very depths of our nature, and then they pass on and are seen no more. Mr. Dennis, as you know, was a man of refined tastes, of strong individuality, of firm purpose, of wide and varied culture, of ripe and rare judgment, and of singular uprightness and devoutness of character. You all remember his physical aspect, his tall, erect, and stately frame, not massive or muscular, but marked by a nervous lightness and keen grace which indicated the predominant nature of the man. You could not study his fine-cut features or his face when lit up with some subject of interest, without feeling that you were in the presence of a powerful mind—in the presence of one who could hold his own, and not be easily imposed upon by any sophistry or metaphysical subtlety, however clever. Yet this astuteness was often blended with a delicacy and sweetness that was wonderfully winning; but he always retained what I may call a kingly self-respect. And he was a king, for no one could venture to take liberties with him, or presume that he would share in any work, scheme, or plan which would not bear the clearest light of day. One of the first things that would strike you was that he was a very grave man, often even to seriousness. This was no affectation on his part, but was natural to him. By simple weight of character he gained his high place in men's esteem, and by the same weight of character kept it to the last; and yet this gravity to the favoured few was often toned down, and he could be gay as the sunlight, and his conversation sweet and refreshing as a summer's breeze. He looked upon all worthy things with a deep interest; but if they were not worthy he made no effort to discuss them, and dismissed them with a marvellous though not undignified facility.

One great quality for which he stood pre-eminent was his wonderful truthfulness. From the most trivial work to the highest duty—from the simplest act of worship up to the greatest intellectual problem—his words, thoughts, and judgments were determined by one unswerving truthfulness. His thoughts might grow wider—his nature might unfold, and lead to larger conclusions, as it did; but he never wavered as to this quality of sterling truthfulness. He knew little or nothing of mere sentiment or unstable emotion, but was from head to foot one solid piece of unmixed reality. This, of course, was somewhat chilling to some, and sometimes crushing to those who are predominantly sentimental and emotional; but, on the other hand, it was a great help, guide, and safeguard to others. Amid all the tinsel, varnish, veneer, and sham of many, it was, when you understood him, very bracing and helpful to come into contact with his intense reality. Not a few young men, when they have looked upon his unmixed truthfulness, as they saw it permeate every fibre of the man, and heard its strong beating in every beat of his strong heart—when they saw that it constituted the entire atmosphere in which he breathed, and that it was one of the mainsprings of all his better life—they then bowed, as in the presence of a superior nature, saw their own shortcomings, and longed to be strong and real, mainly and natural, as he was.

Though he was not over-active, or always rushing to the front, there was a large amount of intensity in his nature—intensity of a quiet, but very powerful kind. This intensity led him to take a deep interest, not only in parochial and imperial, but also in European and trans-atlantic politics; also in those wider questions connected with the intellectual problems of the nineteenth century. When he was a young man there was a notable band of men in this country who belonged to a distinct phase of English history, and who have left a mark upon its page which will not be easily obliterated. They formed a distinct type of character—cultured, philosophical, and with decided radical tendencies in science, theology, and politics. They were in sympathy with all human advancement in every form. They fought in all those battles, and achieved all those victories, which have been the pride and glory of the last forty or fifty years. To this band of men Mr. Dennis belonged, and it was his happy fortune to belong to it from the first. He did not saunter in at the eleventh hour, and share the glory he did not help to win—he did not wait to see how the fight would go before he took his side; but he entered the field in the early morning of life—he put his hand to the plough when the weeds were thick and rank, and he never deserted the old flag which was carried in front of all those great movements which have done so much to secure the greatness, freedom, and glory of these times. With all this, however, he was never among the shallow rangers or dreamy fanatics. He was always cautious, and never in a hurry. What he knew in politics or religion he mastered and avowed, and, however unpopular, he stood by his conclusions to the end. Such men help not only to consecrate, but dignify those struggles which seem at the time, to so many, to be outrageous and unnecessary, but which are nevertheless afterwards found to be of all things the most productive of good. Many in their later years grow dissatisfied, and somewhat conservative. This is, perhaps, natural. They hold with a looser hand and lesser love things which before were very dear to them. This was not so, however, with our departed friend. His mental hunger never left him—his sympathy with all true and progressive things never failed him. He watched each new rising in the tide of thought, and tried, though he confessed sometimes that he did not always succeed in understanding them; but, however puzzled at times by the new demands of a younger generation, he was sympathetic, hopeful, and liberal to the last.

As you know, he filled a large place in the life of this town for many years, and it is acknowledged by all that he filled in with dignity, thoroughness, and fidelity. He had a private life as well as a public one, and some of us were often charmed with his antiquarian lore—with his delightful stories, told in his own peculiar way, and with his large stores of information on a vast variety of subjects, all of which told of much and careful reading—a retentive memory, and a deep love of knowledge for its own sake. To his private friends he is an irreplaceable loss, and they find it hard indeed to think that they will never hear his voice or look upon his venerable form again.

In many ways he was very generous, though always careful and thrifty. He was charitable, but always in his own way, and not in other people's, and never because others tried to induce him to do so. Not a few in this town, to my knowledge, have reason to be grateful for his generosity just when that generosity was specially useful to them. He knew the value of material things; he knew how to accumulate them, and no doubt took pleasure in their accumulation. But his thriftiness was like the thriftiness of nature—who never wastes the paring of a finger nail, and yet is never mean in her bounty. There are some people who have done many things, and who have done them well, but somehow one gets to know all that they have ever accomplished, but there are others who do things about which they never speak. There are lives set in motion, influences brought to bear, and results achieved which are often not a little wonderful. But when we find that some generous hand gave the first impulse, and said no word about it, we then begin to see how great a thing a wise and timely charity is; and I have been glad to learn of several instances where such real help has been given by our departed friend.

You have all heard something about his suffering for many long months. I should like to say just a word about the way in which he endured it. You have seen him literally waste away under your eyes, but you never heard him murmur or complain of the misery of life, as is the custom with some. I have often wondered at his patience, and admired it. If he ever got into a gulf of gloom—and there were lonely hours in which he did—he soon emerged, and became again contented, if not radiant. There was no rebellion in him, and no hardness, but often a deep thankfulness which was a great pleasure to see. In such patience there is a true lesson for us. In a world like this we must, most of us, suffer more or less; may we learn from him "to suffer and be strong."

I must now say a few words about his religion. I cannot forget here that his theological position was that of a Unitarian Christian. He was this from conviction and sympathy, and he made no secret of it. He thought the matter out for himself, and though he was slow in admitting any new factor into the realm of theology, he was on the progressive side, and, notably in the last few years, he moved on in the spirit of modern methods—but always in a somewhat cautious and judicious way. He was steadily led, however, towards those results which are fast becoming prominent features in the brighter faith of these modern times. His ideas of God were full of beauty, full of reverence, and full of trust. His views of man were generally bright and hopeful, even though he was not over lenient to the blunderings and stupidity he often witnessed, and he looked to the future with such a quiet confidence that "new smiles of mercy" always took the place of the old "frowns of terror." He was strong on the intellectual side of his faith, and was always ready to give a reason for holding it; and he often did this with a clearness and force that made his antagonists very careful as to what assertions they made in his presence. But he was also strong on the spiritual and moral side of his faith. This raised him to the highest point of veneration for God, as he saw him in the teachings of Jesus Christ, and led him away from all theological entanglement to a bright, pure, and happy life. And he has proved for us again, if proof were necessary, that a Unitarian, if he will only live like one who is proud and not ashamed of his faith, may win the admiration and regard of his fellows. At any rate, he conquered custom, prejudice, and bigotry, by the sheer weight of a courageous and faithful life, and has proved that ability and industry will command not only a field of labour, but a harvest to reap, whatever a man's creed may be. We shall miss him here very much—how much I will not venture to say, but in departing he has shown us this—that we must conquer in the future as he conquered in the past, by intelligence, by patient perseverance, by perfect sincerity, by courage, and by crowning every day with some useful deed. If we do this, then our end, like his, will be an end of peace. Fortunately, his mind was perfectly clear to the last; there was no jangling of sweet bells, no strife, no pain in his departure, for

The storm that swept the wintry sky
No more disturbed his deep repose
Than summer evening's latest sigh
That shuts the rose.

His end was of all things most peaceful. He slept like a child, and passed away without a sign or groan. And do you ask why his last hours were so tranquil? It was because he believed in One who could turn the shadow of death into the brightness of morning. What men call death had no terror for him. Life, as he knew, was the only positive experience that death is only a state of unconsciousness, and has no existence at all except in the conceptions of the living, and his conceptions being just there were no compelling forces or phantom horrors for him; he was not subject to bondage through fear of death, and it is of all things a happy thing to know that death is no monster force at all, but simply the act of completion—the twin brother of sleep—nay, so far as the body is concerned, it is a sleep from which there is no waking. It is only before death that men feel, or are conscious of, anything about it. It is their thought concerning it, their fear of it, which alarms and punishes them, and not the thing itself. It will be to us now and all through life just what we think it to be. How all important then that we should think right and true thoughts on such a matter. This is what our late friend did, and therefore to him there was no darkness of death, but simply a passing away into the everlasting light. This world has been tyrannised over too long by old Superstition on this matter. Death is not defeat; it is not destruction; it is rather the culmination and real victory of life. When a great man was once passing away he ordered his friends to bring the sweetest roses, and play the sweetest music, and so, with the air of a conqueror—with the trust of a man, and the faith of a saint—his spirit went forth. He knew that the shadow of death would be turned into the brightness of morning. And when that is the case we need not toll the bell—we need not array ourselves in colours too dismal. It may be done for ourselves as an expression of our deepest sorrow, but not for them, since they have found the shadow of death turned into the brightness of morning. Death, then, so long called the old enemy, has parted, so far as we are concerned, with all its frightfulness, and puts on true beauty. It then becomes the evening star of memory, and the morning star of hope. The Hesper of the failing flesh and the Phosphor of the rising soul. That being so, we have learned to wait in faith; and when the time comes—and we hope it will not be too soon, or too late, but when God wills—but when it comes may we, too, enter the ancient mystery, and as we enter it say—]

Though I stoop
Into a dark and tremendous sea of cloud,
It is but for a time. I press God's light
Close to my heart, and its splendour, soon or late,
Will pierce the gloom and I shall emerge somewhere
Where God wills: that's enough for me.

Where that will be I do not profess to know—but this I know—before we were born into this world we knew absolutely nothing of it. We were all Agnostics then. Yet when we came into this world the love was all waiting to receive us, and all nature soon became a perfect wonder of beauty to us. And so when we are born into the next world I venture to hope that we shall find it not less wonderful—not less beautiful—not less full of love, and not less adapted to our real needs than this; and as God's way is ever onward, I venture to think that it will be infinitely more so—and if that be true, is it not a splendid fact that "He turneth the shadow of death into the brightness of morning"? That faith, at any rate, very much accounted for the extremely peaceful departure of our late friend. May we live as he did—doing justly, loving mercy, and walking humbly with God—then we too shall one day know how beautiful a thing it is to believe in that great Father who turns the shadow of death into the brightness of morning.

As the congregation left the edifice the organist played the "Dead March" in Saul.

READING.—On Wednesday evening Mr. W. A. Sothern, of London, read a very interesting paper before a gathering of the members and friends of the Literary and Scientific Society on "The Writings of Sir Thomas Browne" (the English Montaigne), physician of Norwich. The Rev. R. R. Suffield presided. Mr. Sothern justified the selection of his subject by the fact of the recent appearance of a new edition of Sir T. Browne's celebrated work, "The Religio Medici," and the interest it had excited in the literary world. He gave a brief résumé of his life and works, and drew an analogy between him as a writer and Montaigne, who preceded him, remarking that he was indebted to Montaigne for the main characteristics of his works, although there were essential differences between them arising out of national distinctions and geographical position. He considered that Browne was the more philosophical writer of the two, the other possessing all the dash and spirit of the sprightly French writers, though both exposed the errors, foibles and frivolities of the society of their day. Mr. Sothern quoted from Browne's works, and stated that he made experiments in the direction of the discovery of the magnetic telegraph, but without success, and the theory of evolution was foreshadowed in his writings, now two hundred years since. Replying to a hearty vote of thanks Mr. Sothern spoke of the value of such societies as that under which they were met, which he regarded as the outposts or vanguard of literary culture and civilisation.

THE REV. GEORGE GOULD, an eminent Baptist minister, died on Monday evening at Norwich. Mr. Gould settled in Norwich in 1849, when he succeeded the late Rev. W. Brock in the pastorate of St. Mary's Chapel in that city. He was president of the Baptist Union in 1879-80.

EPPS'S COCOA.—GRATEFUL AND COMFORTING.—"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately-flavoured beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. Hundreds of subtle maladies are floating around us ready to attack wherever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.—Made simply with boiling water or milk. Religious Intelligence.

THE LATE DR. BELLOWES.

On Sunday morning week the Rev. R. L. Carter preached at Bridport from 1 Timothy i. 5:—"The end of the commandment is charity," &c., and quoted the account in the Daily News of the eminent services rendered by Dr. Bellows, as the guiding head and inspiring spirit of the United States Sanitary Commission during the civil war. In 1850 he (Mr. C.) had been for many days his guest in New York, and was impressed by his great ability, not only as a preacher and a public speaker, but as an editor (of the Christian Inquirer), and as one conversant with affairs. Whatever he found to do, he did it with his might; while his culture, his geniality, and his sympathetic kindness won for him general esteem and affection. His congregation comprised some of the ablest and most influential persons in the metropolitan city; and their confidence in him, and expression of his value as an organiser and animator of benevolent enterprises, helped him to take the distinguished post he occupied in the war. Till 1833 the Congregational Churches, whether Orthodox or Unitarian, were established by law in Massachusetts, and Dr. Bellows retained the conservatism which is usually fostered by an Establishment. The opposition of the Churches to the Anti-Slavery agitation led many of the most ardent philanthropists to be "Come-outers;" much that was once held sacred was exposed to severe criticism, while the progress of learning and philosophy unsettled many minds. In 1859 Dr. Bellows delivered an address to the Divinity-school at Cambridge, Mass., entitled "The Suspense of Faith," which caused a great sensation. It was followed by "A Sequel," preached in his own church ("All Souls"). It seemed to him that the principle of Protestantism was being carried to an extreme, which endangered morality and social order, as well as reverence. If Catholicism cherished faith at the expense of freedom, Protestantism might lead to freedom without faith. In the soul's relation to God, Catholicism was centripetal, Protestantism centrifugal. Both forces were needed, if it would keep its appointed sphere. He would not have his church separate itself from the church universal, much less break itself into fragments, each one thinking only for himself, careless of the faith and experience stored up throughout the ages. The war for the Union checked the tendency to political isolation, the need had been intensely felt for national unity, and when that war was drawing to a close Dr. Bellows used the great influence which his services in the Sanitary Commission had given him, to promote organisation among the scattered Unitarian churches. His appeals resulted in the National Convention, which met in New York April 1865; out of this sprung the great biennial Conferences, the success of which has stimulated the effort now made in England. There was a fear lest the enterprise should be wrecked by the attempt to impose some confession of faith, which might be a cause of discord; but the earnest desire to reach some practical good led the delegates to pass, instead of any creed, the following preamble:—"Whereas the great opportunities and demands for Christian labour and consecration at this time increase our sense of the obligations of all disciples of the Lord Jesus Christ to prove their faith by their self-denial, and by the devotion of their lives and possessions to the service of God, and the building up of the kingdom of His Son, (I) Therefore the Christian churches of the Unitarian faith here assembled, unite themselves together in a common body, to be known as the National Conference of Unitarian and other Christian churches, to the end of energising and stimulating the denomination with which they are connected to the largest exertions in the cause of Christian faith and work." In these exertions he was prominent to the last. His influence and the respect in which he was held increased with years. He felt that he had most of the duties of a bishop. He was not only an overseer of the flock to which he had ministered for forty-three years, his advice and help were freely given wherever they seemed needed by our Churches in that vast Republic. He had several times visited Europe, and he published his impressions in two eloquent volumes—"The Old World in its New Face." In 1868 he preached before the Unitarian Association in London, and the Western Unitarian Society at Exeter. He had a great affection for the mother country. In his "Suspense of Faith" he spoke with enthusiasm of the first Atlantic telegraph, which, by linking the Continents seemed to unite the ardour of American hope with the serenity of memory—"Europe owns, and is, the past," and at the close of last year he expressed his joy in the hearty feeling between America and England, with "her precious traditions and venerable associations." Emigrants and others who were forlorn and friendless remember his tender kindness: and there are very many more who will always treasure the memory of his friendship; and who sympathise with his bereaved family and church. And now he has finished his career, and has left the faith, and has entered into the "cloud of witnesses" radiant with the love of God.

The Boston Christian Register of Jan. 19 records that "the Rev. Dr. Bellows's New Year Sermon was on intuition and experience. It was marked by a breadth of sympathy for the young, peculiarly beautiful in one who has garnered up such riches of experience. The discourse was a noble rebuke to pessimism and cynicism." On Jan. 17 he delivered the "charge to the minister" at the installation of the pastor of the Fourth Unitarian Church, New York; his son, the Rev. Russell N. Bellows, giving the "right hand of fellowship." The same paper contains a characteristic letter from Dr. Bellows, urging the attention of the Churches and the wealthy laity to the claims of the Rev. Mr. Mayo, who is doing an excellent work in promoting education in the South. "His Sunday sermons and his week-day addresses are thronged with hungry hearers."

THE FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCH, BARNARD CASTLE.

The following is from a "Ramble in Teesdale," published in the Teesdale Mercury of Feb. 8, and signed "Robin Rambler." After noting various objects of natural interest in the town and adjacent locality, "Rambler" proceeds:—

We are now passing down Newgate, and take a glance at the beautiful little church, the "Free Christian Church"—erected to the memory of the late Mr. Geo. Brown—a worthy memorial of a good and noble man, a man of broad culture, of a liberal mind, of a wide grasp of intellect, of great moral courage, of undoubted philanthropy; a reformer of social, political, religious, moral and local abuses, for forty years the life and soul of the Mechanics' Institute, a good lecturer, an enthusiastic, intelligent and earnest preacher, a terse and telling public speaker, and a writer of no mean order.

When I resided at Barnard Castle the Free Christian Church was in the old Broad Gates Chapel, the chapel in which John Wesley has preached. This little band of "Free Christians" has, notwithstanding their unpopularity and reputed heterodoxy, uttered many a noble word in favour of freedom and progress, and helped forward all the great movements of the age—temperance, anti-slavery, anti-war, anti-bigotry, and anti-humbug. It has been an inveterate enemy to unjust tyrannical and oppressive laws; it has favoured freedom of thought, freedom of speech, and freedom of action; its members and ministers have been free to receive new light from all quarters, whether religious, moral, social, political, or scientific.

I have a distinct recollection of the little band which was associated with Mr. Brown; most of them intelligent, earnest, enthusiastic reformers—calling themselves, I think, at that time, "Christian Brethren," and eschewing all sectarian names; but there was one man who in point of intelligence and force of character stood second only to Mr. Brown himself—old Archie Elliott. With a magnificent phrenological organisation he would, had he been placed in favourable circumstances, and been liberally educated, have made a great reformer. He was endowed with large reflective powers, great benevolence and conscientiousness, immense firmness and determination, great reverence for the true and good, and high moral sentiments. In debate he could come down with a sledge-hammer force upon his luckless opponent. I was once in his company, crossing the Demesnes, and he was endeavouring to convince my juvenile understanding of the truth of some abstruse theological subject, and in my youthful simplicity I ventured to say, "I cannot see it, Mr. Elliott." He looked straight into my face, and with a force and directness which none but Archie Elliott could assume, he said, "Young man, let me tell thee, there's nane so blind as them that wanna see." Of course I felt highly complimented, but I don't think that even this helped me to see. On another occasion, when a certain political agitator was tried for treason, and baffled his prosecutors by his immense firmness, he exclaimed, "Well, he's one great mass of refined stupidity!" His son William, who for many years has been a Unitarian minister, is a "chip off the old block." In whatever part of the country he has been placed as a minister, for over a quarter of a century, he has distinguished himself as a sturdy reformer.

The characteristics of "Old Archie" are graphically given by Thomas Carlyle, in the language he used towards one of his favourite characters, "He was the sworn enemy of all scoundrelism, knavery, and rascality, whatever guise they might assume; a man who 'abhorred a liar as the gates of hell,' would have hurled a thunderbolt at the head of a traitor, and trampled a tyrant in the dust; a true 'Village Hampden' he might be called, 'who never feared the face of man;' 'no fiercer enemy of unvaracity—veritable as the old rocks—an unwedgable and gnarled block of manhood.'"

Mr. (now the Rev.) Joseph Lee, was another of the original members of this little band. Full of vigour and animation, as he was at that time, with a splendid voice, a good flow of language, and an apt way of illustrating his subject, I have listened to him frequently with deep interest and profit. He has stuck to the old ship, through stormy seas and calm ones: he is, and justly, looked upon, both at home and abroad, as the "Bishop" of this little Free Church diocese. When he had made up his mind that a "memorial church" ought to, and must, be erected to the memory of the good and true man who had done so much for the town, and to that section of the church to which he was attached, he did not stand still, wishing and sighing, and imagining it was done, but "girded up his loins," and went to work with all the indomitable energy of Hannibal scaling the Alps. He visited every important town in the kingdom, and wherever a rich man, in sympathy with the object, could be found—that could give notes, cheques, or gold, or a poor man that could give sixpences or shillings, there was no escape from this enthusiastic devotee; and many are the amusing tales he can relate of his adventures. Without his unwearied and self-denying labours, together with those of Mrs. Lee and a noble band of women equally energetic, with their "Christmas Trees," Sewing Meetings, Bazaars, &c., the church could never have been built, and one of the chief architectural ornaments of Barnard Castle would have been absent. How he managed to collect something like £2,000, and clear this church of debt, is a mystery to all, and can only be explained in two ways:—first, the unconquerable energy and inimitable tact of the man who, without fee or reward, devoted himself to the work; and secondly, the noble character of the "Layman" to whose memory the church was to be built.

MEMORIAL HALL, MANCHESTER.

The annual meeting of the trustees was held on Friday week, Alderman C. S. Grundy (Chairman and Treasurer) presiding. During the year the free use of rooms had been granted on 104 occasions, against 94 in the previous twelve months. There had been also an increase in the number of lettings at the usual rentals. The balance in hand was somewhat smaller than usual, and it was anticipated that considerable expense would be incurred, during the ensuing summer, in painting and beautifying the Hall. Nevertheless several grants were made, which are specified at the foot of the following list of contributions made by the trustees, during the last eleven or twelve years, towards various educational, philanthropic and religious agencies, viz.:—

Making a total of £1,749

At the conclusion of the business the trustees dined together at the Palatine Hotel. Mr. Joseph Lupton presided, and Mr. Alderman W. T. Shawcross occupied the vice-chair. The following guests were present:—the Rev. James Black and J. E. Odgers; Messrs. J. Dendy, jun., F. W. Holland, hon. auditor; and E. W. Marshall, secretary. The Rev. W. Gaskell was unfortunately kept away by indisposition. In responding to the toast, "The Memorial Hall," Mr. Alderman Grundy, in an interesting speech, reviewed its history, pointed out the numerous and valuable services it had rendered, and congratulated the trustees on its still increasing usefulness. The Revs. James Black and J. E. Odgers responded for the guests; and Mr. Alderman Shawcross proposed the health of the respected Chairman, Mr. Lupton.

A NOVEL CHURCH EXPERIMENT.

A new effort now being made by the Vicar of St. Jude's, Commercial-street, to help the people to worship will, we hope, supply a long-felt but unexpressed need. Mr. Barnett starts on the assumption (based, indeed, on facts very apparent to all who will look with unprejudiced eyes) that the services usual in churches and chapels do not express the religious thought of the large masses of the people. The middle-class still "attend Divine worship" to a large extent because it is the fashion and respectable to do so. The poor man, not being bound by such flimsy fetters, has not felt it help him, and has long ceased to attend church or chapel at all. But Mr. Barnett tells them, in a beautiful and simple address—which could be seen on the boardings of East London through the past week—that, although Church services may fail to reach them, still there is in them a "buried life," which gets free only "when it hears God's voice." To help them to hear God's voice he invites them to St. Jude's Church on Sunday evenings from 8.30 to 9.30, where, he says, "as they are still, as they listen to the silence, to the music, or to the worship of others, God may speak and the buried life arise." The call rings true. How will it be responded to? How will it be carried out?

Judging from the last two Sundays, the people have responded to the call. The church contained some three hundred or four hundred people of all sorts and conditions. The lights were lowered at the western end of the church, so that no one need feel shabby in the full blaze of the gas-light. The choir seats were filled with a large number of ladies and gentlemen, all of whom, we understand, gave their services freely. The worship hour began with a hymn sung in unison, the body of sound rising grandly throughout the building. As soon as it was finished, a gentleman stepped forward and read first a portion of the Bible, and then a passage expressing the same idea in the words of a modern poet. Thus, "Ring out wild bells—ring out the false, ring in the true," was made to be the modern echo of Isaiah's passionate and hopeful words, "A King shall reign in righteousness, and princes shall rule in judgment." The reading over, the organ quietly played, until a lady soloist took up the strain of "Angels ever bright and fair." The words of praise ended, the vicar invited all to pray, himself leading with an extempore prayer. An impressive pause followed, broken at last by the choir bursting into another hymn. More readings followed more solos, and so on until the "worship-hour" was over, and the worshippers quietly dispersed to their own homes, helped, we cannot but believe, by so spiritual, so earnest (though so novel) a service.

The religious world, by its mission services, by its revival movements, by its midnight meetings for the outcast, has plainly said that its ordinary services do not supply all the many needs of its children; but all these special efforts seem to be made to reach those who have fallen out of the usual groove of life by the committal of some special sin. For the ordinary man or woman, living the ordinary life, or, as Mr. Barnett puts it, in his placarded address for those whose "lives are busy, useful and honest, but whose faces are anxious, and who are not all they want to be," for this large class no help to worship has been provided; that is to say, unless such help is to be found in the services repeated week by week in the various churches and chapels. To supply this need these worship-hours have been started at St. Jude's. It is hoped that the highest thoughts can thus be given to the people, coming to them through the time-honoured words of the Bible and in the familiar tones used by modern writers. Here, helped by the music both of highly cultivated voices and delicately-rendered organ solos, it is believed that people, disgusted by the vagaries and irrationalities perpetrated under the garb of religion, and wearied by seeing her always in a mediæval dress, may learn that the worship of God "in spirit and in truth" is possible and independent of all ecclesiastical accidents. If Mr. Barnett's efforts should teach but ten people this lesson it will be worth his work, and religious people of all denominations would be wise to keep his example before them, and give it their earnest consideration.—Christian World.

STRATFORD: WEST HAM-LANE.—A course of six Sunday evening lectures, by the Rev. J. E. Stead, has just been concluded. The subject of the course was "The Formation of the Dogma of the Deity of Christ," which was dealt with under the following heads:—"Testimony of the Synoptics," "Testimony of the Fourth Gospel," "Testimony of Justin Martyr and other writers, to the Time of Clement of Alexandria," "Testimony of Clement of Alexandria, and other writers to the time of Arius," "Arius and the Arian Controversy," "Summary of results—Trinitarian Heresy, Unitarian Orthodoxy." These lectures have been fairly well attended, and much interest manifested throughout.

EAST ANGLIAN ASSOCIATION.—A series of lectures has just been delivered, under the auspices of the above-named, and of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, by the Rev. T. W. Freckleton, of London. At Ipswich about sixty persons assembled in the new schoolroom to hear the outlines of "A Reasonable and Devotional Faith." They were deeply impressed by the very powerful exposition and the pathetic appeals to which they listened. At Lynn a similar effect was produced; and in the Temperance Hall, Norwich, an audience of two hundred or thereabouts bore away at least a vivid sense of the possibility of attaining to a coherent and inspiring theory concerning "the Four Gospels, and the Character of Jesus." Mr. Freckleton's visit to these parts has been one of unmixed advantage to us, and its influence is likely to abide.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.—The annual meeting of the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Sunday School Association was held on Monday, the 13th inst., in the schoolroom of the Church of the Divine Unity, Newcastle-on-Tyne. The chair was taken by the Rev. W. Elliott (Sunderland), and prayer was offered by the Rev. A. Payne. The Chairman, in his opening remarks, dwelt upon the importance of attaching to our schools children who otherwise would only run the streets on Sundays, and also of ever keeping before our minds the true moral and spiritual work of Sunday teaching. The Rev. R. C. Smith presented the treasurer's report, which showed a balance in hand of £4 13s. 8d., after which Mr. F. C. Slater (Newcastle), secretary, read the reports from the various schools in union, which showed that the present numbers are, Newcastle, 148 scholars and 36 teachers; South Shields, 91 scholars and 7 teachers; and Sunderland, 69 scholars and 12 teachers. Mr. Charles Slater, one of the visitors of the Union, then gave his report of inspection of the various schools; he described the work in all of them as being very fairly done, and pointed out certain matters which require attention. He and his colleague (Mr. H. A. Kay) received a hearty vote of thanks on the motion of the Rev. R. C. Smith and Mr. Manning. On the motion of the Rev. A. Payne, the officers of the Union were then re-appointed, as follows:—President, the Rev. W. Elliott (Sunderland); Treasurer, the Rev. R. C. Smith (Shields); Secretary, Mr. F. C. Slater (Newcastle). Business having been transacted, a paper was next read by Mr. C. Slater, on "The Sunday School and the Band of Hope," which was of a very earnest and exhaustive character; its chief argument being that since drunkenness so evidently leads to neglect of attendance at church the Band of Hope does an important service to both school and church by guiding the minds of children to the recognition of the duty of temperance. A discussion, appreciative of the paper followed, and a vote of thanks was accorded to the reader, as also to the chairman.

The LONDON SCHOOL BOARD at their weekly meeting on Thursday discussed the question of higher elementary education. A report on the subject was submitted by the School Management Committee, and a proposition was made to the effect that some higher elementary schools for boys and some for girls be established in the metropolis similar to the Peter-street School at Manchester. This was met by "the previous question." The further consideration of the subject was adjourned. At the end of a discussion agreements with the Gun-street, Birmingham, Industrial School, and an Industrial School in Dorset, as to the support of some of the St. Paul's Industrial School children, were approved.

HOLLOWAY'S OINTMENT AND PILLS.—Influenza, Sore Throat, Quinsy, Mumps, and similar complaints always abound in unsettled weather, and are most safely and effectually subdued by rubbing Holloway's Ointment at least twice a-day upon the chest and glands of the throat. The Ointment penetrates the skin, reduces inflammation, and heals ulcerations. This treatment is sufficient for curing the most serious and complicated throat affections, provided Holloway's Pills be taken at the same time. When swallowing gives pain, the Ointment may be relied on till improving symptoms admit of painless deglutition. In asthma, bronchitis, pneumonia, pleurisy, whooping cough, incipient consumption, scarlet fever, and measles Holloway's medicines are not less valuable in mitigating the most troublesome features than they are certain in ultimately curing.

DISSOLVING VIEWS OF ORTHODOXY.

I.—THE TRINITY.

THE course of Lectures now being delivered at York by the Rev. JOHN HUNTER, Congregationalist minister, on which we commented in general terms last week, afford another illustration, among many more that might be given, of the decline of Orthodox dogma in the popular Churches. The accepted doctrines of the current theology are no longer stated in the same terms as formerly—no longer set forth in the same uncompromising manner, or defended on the old grounds. To the careful observer the change is obvious and significant. Dogma is abating its pretensions; the statements of the creeds are being modified and amended, in order to bring them into some kind of accord with modern ideas, and the advanced knowledge of our time. This change has been going on for years past, but in a more marked degree at the present time than formerly. The reason why this should be so is easily assigned. Knowledge of every kind advances with more rapid strides to-day than ever before; and the intelligent, cultured supporters of the current theology are compelled to take note of this fact, and to adjust their Orthodoxy accordingly. Mr. HUNTER's effort, therefore, to restate the old doctrines—"old truths" he calls them, but that little bit of assumption we can afford to pass by—is quite in accord with the tendency of the time.

Having in his first discourse cleared the ground and indicated what in his view are the vital points of the Evangelical theology, Mr. HUNTER in his second discourse discusses the doctrine of the Trinity. This sermon, like the others that we have seen, is made up of concessions and readjustments. He does not hesitate to throw overboard a portion of the cargo if he can but save the rest. He sees that it is impossible to save the whole, so he sorts it over carefully and abandons what he cannot keep. And having performed this task, apparently to his own complete satisfaction, he says, in effect, that what he threw overboard was only rubbish, all that was worth anything is left behind. The line is drawn at the point which Mr. HUNTER approves, but it may not be drawn where another reformer of Orthodoxy would approve. Concerning the Trinity, this is what our author says on the side of concession:—

The Trinity as set forth in the historic creeds and in ordinary theological discourse is expressed in terms which convey very little meaning to the modern mind. The term Trinity itself is a defective one. It gives to the question the aspect of an arithmetical enigma, and was suggestive of later controversies. "Three are one and one is three" is a very unworthy statement of the Christian faith in Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, one God. The only passage in the Bible (1 John v. 7) that treats the mystery of the Godhead as a numerical and not as an ontological question is now admitted by all parties to be spurious. The term "person" was also misleading to those who did not know its history. By persons in the Godhead was not meant such defined and separate individualities as three human beings, but three modes or forms of being in one primal being. The term "persons" was employed because of the poverty of our language, and both it and the term Trinity could only be safely used when considered strictly as symbols—as suggestive of spiritual distinction in God the Infinite Spirit.

Mr. HUNTER's objection to the term "Trinity" is not new. It has been objected to by other orthodox writers when discussing this subject. Doubtless, "it gives the question the aspect of an arithmetical enigma." But does it, therefore, do an injustice to the doctrine itself? We contend that it does not. It does unquestionably make the being of GOD an arithmetical enigma, and as popularly held this is what the doctrine really is. It divides the Deity into three persons, calls each by a different name, ascribes to each a distinct function, attributes to each a distinct character, places them in distinct relations towards each other and towards mankind, and maintains all the while that there is but one GOD. What is this but an arithmetical enigma? What is the doctrine as set forth in the Athanasian Creed or in "Hymns Ancient and Modern" but an arithmetical enigma? We do not know of any term that would describe it better.

"By persons in the Godhead was not meant such defined and separate individualities as three human beings, but three modes or forms of being in one primal being." This is not orthodox Trinitarianism, certainly not Athanasian Trinitarianism, but Sabellianism. The Father is GOD in one mode or aspect, the Son is the same GOD in another mode or aspect, and the Holy Ghost is GOD in a third mode or aspect. This is the Sabellian heresy revived. The distinction of persons, which has ever been the great difficulty in the way of reconciling the doctrine with the Divine unity, is ingeniously done away with. But with the distinction of persons the essential feature of the doctrine is surrendered, and what remains is neither Trinitarianism nor Unitarianism, but something made up of each. We repeat that the essential feature of the Trinity is that of personal distinctions in the Godhead. These are softened down by Mr. HUNTER until they disappear and only "three modes or forms" of "one primal being" are left. Here, then, we have under the ingenious manipulation of our author a dissolving view of Orthodoxy.

Having given us this dissolving view, Mr. HUNTER attempts next the work of reconstruction. He considers the doctrine of the Trinity; first on "its ideal and Divine side," next "on the side of the Divine relations to humanity," and then advances to the conclusion "Father, Son, and Holy Spirit are one GOD." Much that he says, with slight difference in the phraseology, might be accepted by Unitarians, thus:—

When we were impressed with the splendour of the material universe, and with the supreme power, wisdom, and goodness that were manifested in its unchanging order; when in our hearts and consciences we felt those high instincts, before which our lower nature "trembles like a guilty thing surprised," and realised in moments of devout communion that there was One above us who followed us through life with a care that was merciful, even in its severity—then were we baptised into the name and life of the Father. In Jesus Christ we see God in humanity as the personal helper and redeemer, doing for man's spiritual redemption and education what nature and the religion of nature cannot do, meeting and satisfying wants inseparable from the natural constitution and development of man, and meeting also the exigencies which have arisen from human freedom, the choice of evil and the dominion of sin, giving to men the vision of God's face in righteousness and love, the sense of forgiveness, reconciliation and peace, and making possible a more personal and intimate communion with God. In the inner world of the individual heart and soul, in the higher ranges of man's nature and life, God is revealed and known as the Holy Spirit—a truth which is of the very essence of Christian experience. It is one and the same God who is manifested in creation, in Christ, and in the spiritual soul; therefore the manifestations, though distinct, must be in essential harmony.

There is very little in all this, if anything, to which an ordinary Unitarian would object. He believes that GOD was manifest in CHRIST, and that this manifestation of the Divine in him was the source of all that is most true, and beautiful, and holy, and high, and pure in the example, life, teaching, and work of CHRIST. Can the orthodox Trinitarian teach a higher or better doctrine? We believe in the Holy Spirit as a divine influence from GOD operating on the hearts and souls of men, and the inner religious life of man is sustained by the operation and abiding presence of that Spirit. Is not that the essential idea of the doctrine of the Holy Spirit? Can the orthodox Trinitarian teach that doctrine in a higher or truer sense? We think not. And that it is "the same GOD who is manifested in creation in CHRIST, and in the spiritual soul" we believe as distinctly and unequivocally as Mr. HUNTER himself. What we do not believe, and what he cannot prove, is, that "Father, Son, and Holy Spirit are one GOD." This is the notion which only one text of Scripture can be adduced to support, and that one is admitted on all hands to be spurious!

With regard to the popular doctrine of the Trinity the Unitarian argument is clear and plain enough. It is this:—(1) that it has no support whatever from the Old Testament; (2) that it has never been believed by the Jews; and is regarded by them as contrary to the fundamental principle of their religion; (3) that the slight inferences for its support gathered from the New Testament utterly fail to prove it; (4) that it is not a Scripture doctrine but an ecclesiastical doctrine, the authority for which is not the Bible but the Church; (5) that it was unknown in the apostolic age and to the first Christian Fathers; (6) that it was introduced in later times, met with stern opposition as an unwarranted innovation, and involved the Church in bitter controversy and persecution; (7) that its gradual growth in the Church can be traced step by step from its first beginnings, till we have it full blown in what is called the Athanasian Creed; (8) that it established itself in the Church by violence and persecution, and by the forcible suppression of the simple Monotheism which had been the primitive faith; (9) that the main points in this argument have all been conceded by eminent Trinitarian authorities; (10) that the doctrine has no religious value which does not equally belong to that of one GOD—the Maker, Father, Saviour, and Inspirer of all.

FOULING THE NEST.

FROM time to time we have had to deplore a tendency among some of those professing to be Unitarians to advocate a division in the ranks of the body. It is true that this course does not meet with much favour, nor is it, as a rule, urged by persons exerting much influence, but they are very persistent, hoping, doubtless, that by wearisome iteration they may induce others to think that the state of affairs in the body is so bad that a schism can be the only cure for it. One of the advocates of this policy is the Rev. J. PANTON HAM, who last Sunday week took occasion to address to the select few that attend the once well-filled chapel in Essex-street some "Serious Thoughts for Unitarians Suggested by the Death of the Rev. H. W. Bellows, D.D., of New York." The sermon, or, at any rate, considerable extracts from it, has since appeared in the columns of a contemporary, and has thus reached a wider circle than it would otherwise have done. By those who are far from favourably disposed to Unitarians and the religious opinions which—Mr. HAM notwithstanding—they entertain, this sermon will be read with delight, little short of positive rapture, for it will be to them a testimony in favour of what they have never tired of saying. They will not pause to inquire whether or not Mr. HAM's position in the denomination permits him to speak with authority. It will be sufficient for them that the minister of a chapel at one time famous in the eyes of London Unitarians has thought fit to speak of the denomination to which he belongs in a way that might fairly have been expected from an outsider only. They will not know that while in the denomination he is practically not of it; they will not know that of all Unitarian ministers he is the least entitled to sit in judgment on his brethren; they will probably imagine that here is one of the earnest supporters of the cause, one of those who take an active part in such denominational activities as do exist; that one who knows well what is going on among them is telling his brethren what a bad set they are, and how very mistaken in not following the advice he gives them. They will not know the real facts: hence they will rejoice.

But what is it, our readers will say, that Mr. HAM has been saying. He has been doing his best—or worst must we say?—to asperse the character of the religious body to which, nominally, he belongs, and having, to his own satisfaction at least, proved "that there is a radical rottenness in our denomination," somewhat unctuously shows his superiority to the prevailing corruption, and his desire for a separation from it. That we may not be supposed to speak too severely of Mr. HAM's utterances we will quote a few of the flowers of rhetoric that garnish the sermon to which we have referred. Having claimed for Dr. BELLOWES that he belonged to the school distinguished as Conservative, that he "held firmly to the historical credibility of the New Testament Scriptures, accepted their supernaturalism as an integral part of their authenticity, and acknowledged the absolute lordship and mastership of JESUS CHRIST," Mr. HAM proceeded to lament that in England our Unitarian Churches had not been served by such men of conviction and fibre as the deceased. "If," said Mr. HAM, "the Churches of English Unitarianism, during the last thirty years, had listened to the utterances, and been blessed with a ministry like to that of the late Dr. BELLOWES, Unitarianism throughout all England, and particularly in this great metropolis, would have won a better repute for itself," and our Churches would not be in the ruptured and languishing condition in which they now notoriously are." We hope Mr. HAM's brethren in the ministry will relish this attack not only upon themselves but upon some of their illustrious predecessors. Well may Mr. HAM say that "comparisons are odious"!

We suppose that were the question asked what is the name of the man who, during the last thirty years, has had the most influence on the thought of the denomination, but one answer would be given. Yet who would recognise his teaching when it is said, that "as a denomination we have, of late years, followed the damaging lead of a speculative, sceptically-biased, quasi-philosophical religionism that has landed not a few of us into empty negations and barren indolence"? No one who really knows what he is talking about could thus describe the influence that has for so long a time been at work on our younger ministers. After such a criticism we cannot feel surprised that Mr. HAM regards modern Unitarians in England as being in a "flaccid miserably relaxed state," that "we have become, as a denomination, prosaically dull, tasteless to insipidity (what is a tasteless denomination? or its reverse?), nerveless to impotence, and contemptibly and culpably apathetic," or that "we have been stricken with leanness and sterility," or that "our own frigid religious resources" have "well-nigh frozen us into personal and congregational petrifications," or that "we are a moribund limb of the great Catholic Church of Christendom." Nor can we wonder that the writer of all this can also say, as does Mr. HAM, that "our history is a history of decadence," and that it "is our gravest condemnation." At the same time, if that be our critic's view, we are constrained to ask how he reconciles it with another expressed in a later part of the sermon, that "the last two decades of Unitarianism on both sides of the Atlantic are the darkest, the chilliest, the most damaging in the annals of our denominational history," and that the "advanced" thinkers and teachers among us "have the unenviable notoriety of having brought about the one dark age in Unitarian history."

But what is the cause of all this rottenness, and decay, and petrification, it may be asked. Mr. HAM answers that it is the decay of faith in historical Christianity. "Yes, that is it; the decay of faith in historical Christianity has been for years past the gangrene of our churches, which has well-nigh brought about the complete mortification of our whole denomination." It is the want of a "clear, simple, doctrinal statement that is at the root of it all; without this there is mere phantasm and deplorable foolishness." And what is his remedy for the "radical rottenness of our denomination?" "Only the high fidelity of a Christian Reaction or a Christian Separation, can save our denomination from virtual extinction as an influence on the religious sentiment and life of our country," says Mr. HAM. But what does this mean? We believe in Christian action as firmly as any one, and we believe that it is being manifested more and more in all the Churches, not excluding our own; Christian Reaction, if we comprehend its meaning aright, we have no wish to see. If it means, as it seems to do, a return to certain forms of belief, a going back to older notions about CHRIST, a re-acceptance of certain ideas that used to prevail about JESUS, we see no great advantage over the prevailing tone of thought in the denomination. As for Christian Separation, what does that mean but a sort of Pharisaic self-righteousness, wholly alien to the spirit and teaching of JESUS? "The fellowship of our Churches at this time is artificial, forced, and pitifully experimental and spasmodic; it is the hollowest sham; there is neither reality nor profit in it." So says Mr. HAM, and in the spirit of "Christian Separation" he entirely disowns it, and will not stultify himself by keeping up the outward and visible signs of it. And he who would learn what the result of all this is had better visit Essex-street Chapel any Sunday morning, and if he is curiously inclined, let him inquire what is being done there to show what "Christian Separation" means, and what steps are being taken there to convince the world that there is one Unitarian church in London which is not "stricken with leanness or sterility," and where there has been no "decay of faith in historical Christianity." If after this visit and inquiry he should become convinced that the advantages of Christian separation are not very apparent, and that it differs but in name from "Christian isolation," we shall not be much surprised.

There is nothing to stop the advocates of separation carrying their theory into practice at once, and should they do so we would not refuse to bid them Godspeed; but we feel convinced that they would not be the gainers. At the same time, we do not desire a separation. There ought to be, indeed, we are convinced that with mutual concession there is room for more than one school of thought amongst us; each may, if it choose, learn something from the other; but it is a primary condition that there shall be mutual respect for honesty of conviction even if that be mistaken. For that we look in vain in the sermon we have had to criticise and condemn. We make no charge of dishonesty of conviction against Mr. HAM, but if he would preserve the respect of his fellows he will do well to discard the rôle of a prophet, under which he veils too thinly the part of a disappointed croaker.

One word in conclusion. We have not condescended to disprove any of Mr. HAM's assertions; we have too much respect for the intelligence and knowledge of our readers to do this. In the course of a debate last year the Prime Minister, replying to the speech of an ignorant self-conceited member, said "all the assertions of the hon. member I deny, and all his denials I affirm." Much in the same way are we disposed to deal with Mr. HAM's assertions, and there to leave them. All who really know anything of the Unitarian denomination during the past thirty years will know that the picture drawn by Mr. HAM is not true to fact, and that it is coloured in far too sombre tints.

FREE THOUGHT AS THE BASIS OF MORALITY—II.

MR. GOLDWIN SMITH opens his article in the current number of the Contemporary by remarking that, to ask "whether Science has yet found a new basis for Morality," is "a widely different thing from saying that Morality cannot exist without religion," and that "it is still more widely different, if possible, from imputing immoral tendencies to Science. At the same time we are not bound," he continues, "to accept at once, as science, everything that is tendered as such by scientific men on subjects with which, perhaps, they have not long been familiar." Nor should we allow ourselves to be hurried headlong by the current of new opinion into negative, any more than into positive conclusions. This is specially true, we are told, when the abjuration of a belief involves not merely a change in treatises of philosophy, but the greatest practical consequences, such as the abolition of religion. Still "abolished religion ought to be, and must be, as soon as it is proved to be founded on falsehood; the proposal of Freethinkers like RENAN to keep up the system as the means of restraining the vulgar, and protecting the refined enjoyments of the cultivated, being no less shallow, and in an age of educated artisans impracticable, than it is repugnant to morality." With this sentiment we heartily concur; but we regret our author should have been infelicitous enough to fix upon M. RENAN as a typical instance of those who would keep up religion as a hollow sham. So far as we are acquainted with the writings of the great French critic and scholar, it is a libel upon his teaching to charge him with anything of the kind. Curiously enough, the writer whom we noticed last week contrasts M. KENAN with the leading freethinkers of France, and quotes his words:—"Qu'on n'espère donc pas à se passer de religion ni d'associations religieuses. Chaque progrès des sociétés modernes rendra le besoin là plus impérieux." This statement embodies, or seems to embody, an opinion the opposite of that ascribed to its author and Mr. GOLDWIN SMITH, instead of entering him upon the list of his opponents might have claimed him as an important ally. But to proceed. It is certainly quite true that "we may accept with admiration and gratitude DARWIN'S scientific discoveries without feeling ourselves obliged to draw from them inferences which the discoverer himself has not drawn." We may recognise, too, "the breaches made by science, history and criticism in the evidences not only of Christianity, but of Natural Religion," and yet "we may decline at once to pronounce that the religious sentiment in man is devoid of meaning, and that the evidences are absolutely incapable of rational reconstruction." It will at once occur to our readers that there is a wide difference between the Christianity of Dr. MARTINEAU and that of Mr. SPURGEON, and that though the latter may be doomed the former may be far enough from perishing. So of the Natural Religion of such writers as the Duke of ARGYL when compared with that of writers of the old school.

Having prefaced his general argument in the foregoing manner, and warded off or replied to a recent attack made upon him by Miss BEVINGTON, our author goes on to say that "he must be a scientific optimist, indeed, who refuses to admit that society has come to a critical juncture." It seems impossible to question the fact, he adds, that the morality of the mass of the people has been bound up with their religious belief in the existence of an All-seeing Eye and of an infallible, inflexible, all-powerful Justice. The point in contention is, whether the loss of such beliefs can be replaced by science in so satisfactory a manner that life may be as strong and as rich in good works as it could have been with them in their purest form. Our author doubts this, and contends that whatever science may be able to do in the future it has not as yet found the required basis of morality. As a crucial test he refers to an Italian who, finding that a new and mysterious plague was ravaging his city, devoted himself to the preservation of his fellow citizens, shut himself up with a subject, took his observations, consigned them to writing, and then, feeling the poison in his veins, went calmly to the hospital to die. This heroic act he contrasts with that of a man who, seeing that there stands but a single life between him and a great unenjoyed fortune, takes that life, and, getting possession of the fortune, without suspicion, uses it to benefit not only himself but "troops of friends and grateful dependants." He then asks—"Why is the first man happy, and the second miserable? Theism, on its own hypothesis, has an answer ready. What is the answer of Agnostic Science? We must prefix an epithet because without it a distinction drawn between Science and Theism begs the question. A rational Theist maintains that Theism is science." It is in the "Data of Ethics," by Mr. HERBERT SPENCER, that we are likely to find the best answer Agnostic Science has to give, says Mr. GOLDWIN SMITH, and to this book he accordingly turns.

Mr. SPENCER begins, we are told, not with humanity but with the molluscs, and treats man simply as the last of the Evolutionary series. "His tests of right and wrong in the actions of the most evolved of animals, as in the case of the least evolved, are pleasure and pain—pleasure denoting that the action is favourable, pain that it is unfavourable to the vitality of the organism." And "an authoritative conscience, duty, virtue, obligation, principle, and rectitude of motive, no more enter into his definitions or form parts of his system than does the religious sanction. Of that which constitutes moral beauty he has no word. Actions of a kind purely pleasant are absolutely right." Hence Mr. GOLDWIN SMITH urges that on such an hypothesis of right and wrong the action of the Italian physician is partly wrong because it gives him pain, while, on the other hand, the deed of the murderer is at least partly right. "If the murdered man was a fool, a niggard, or a selfish voluptuary who would have made no use of his riches or have used them ill, it really may be said that all the visible and calculable consequences of the action are good," and though one human life is sacrificed, "from Mr. SPENCER'S point of view nothing can be said about the indefeasible sacredness of human life." The contention on the part of the Agnostics, indeed, is that after certain æons have run their course, men will have become so sensible of altruistic pleasure that it will be as disagreeable to them to injure their neighbours as to be injured themselves. But manifestly that happy stage has to be reached, and the difficulty is to see how it can be reached with pain and pleasure as the only criterion of right and wrong. The old doctrine has maintained that man must die to himself before he can live for others, that he must leave the instinctive stage of his development, where pleasure and pain dominate his being, and rise to a higher, in which the promptings of pain and pleasure yield to the voice of a moral ideal within. It certainly seems to us that if Mr. SPENCER'S utterances are to be taken as the last word of the science of to-day, then it has not yet found a new basis for morality. But "our great philosopher," as Mr. DARWIN has called him, is moderate in his views compared with many of his disciples. Our author gives a striking instance of this by transferring to his pages a long passage from an American work by Dr. BUREN DENSLOW on "Modern Thinkers," the preface of which was written "by Mr. ROBERT INGERSOLL, the foremost teacher of Agnosticism on that continent." A few sentences from this passage will show the quality of the work in question, and illustrate the fact, in no ordinary manner, that Science, as contrasted with Theism, regards man from the purely instinctive phase of his being, and not from the higher ethical stage to which we have already alluded. Here is a specimen of Dr. VAN BUREN DENSLOW'S reasoning:—"It is generally believed to be moral to tell the truth and immoral to lie. And yet it would be difficult to prove that nature prefers the true to the false. . . . Nature endows almost every animal with the faculty of deceit in order to aid it in escaping from the brute force of its superiors. Why, then, should not man be endowed with the faculty of lying when it is to his interest to appear wise concerning matters of which he is ignorant? . . . So habituated have we become to assume that truth-telling is a virtue, that nothing is more difficult than to tell how we came to assume it, nor is it easy of proof that it is a virtue in an unrestricted sense." This is plain sailing; we know what Dr. VAN BUREN DENSLOW means. We should have thought that truth-telling, taking into account the etymology of the word virtue, really might have been considered one by any Agnostic scientist. The word indicates strength; and on his own showing truth-telling is a hard thing to do. But then the question is, where virtue is to be found in the old sense of the word, on the Agnostic hypothesis, since doing the right is a pleasurable and, therefore, an easy thing, while perfection is to be the outcome of an accumulation of agreeable sensations. KANT found God behind the idea of duty; all that the advocate of derivative Morals finds behind it is, or seems to be, an instinctive craving for possession and enjoyment. FICHTE thought, according to Mr. LEWES, that by our efforts to fulfil our duty we are not only tending towards God, "but live in some measure the life of God." This noble thinker held with so many other great men that duty is "a pulse beating in the very heart of man, a power inseparable from his constitution, and that according to its fulfilment is the man complete." Alas! for the foolish moral heroes of the dark past; their idea of duty was but a dream; their love of truth a mere delusion. These things, instead of raising them to God, as they fondly thought, did but link them to the unevolved and nominally inferior animals. Still, mirabile dictu, these same delusive ideas have somehow or other inspired all or nearly all the best of men.

A mighty host of "nameless martyrs" have had no others support, either in life or in death, while not a few of those of whom the world has not been worthy have found a restful satisfaction, a blessedness, in short, in their obedience to the voice of duty, which all the pleasures procurable by the wealth of Paris or London could not have given them.

We are very far from having exhausted Mr. GOLDWIN SMITH's analysis of the claims of Science in the field of Morals. But we have said enough to show the kind of development the Evolutionary theory is likely to take, judging from Dr. Van BUREN DENSLOW's exposition of it. It seems to be forgotten by the advocates of derivative Morals that the God-thought found in religion not only shows a man the right, but gives him the strength to do it. We do not deny that reason must shed its radiance over the firmament of the spirit to make this operation complete. What we wish to insist upon is, that many of the weakest and the worst of men see the right, but have no power to perform it. They are possessed of no fly-wheels of divine emotion capable of counteracting their passions, and so they are hurried on to what the world has hitherto regarded as evil. The light of love falling upon our souls from a Heavenly Father's eye, quickens our being, while mere philosophy leaves us morally powerless. J. M.

THE BRADLAUGH BUSINESS.

The constitutional question as to the right of an Atheist to be a member of the House of Commons has again been remitted to the electors of Northampton, if not to decide at any rate to help to solve. The latest departure, to use a term now frequently affected, has been that of Mr. Bradlaugh for Northampton, he having been expelled from the House of Commons for conduct to which we shall presently refer. It will probably be remembered that at the commencement of the present Session the House of Commons again refused permission to Mr. Bradlaugh to adopt the course the law of the land provides, i.e., they took a course which we hold to be not only unconstitutional but illegal. For this, and all the untoward events that have flowed from it, a majority of the House of Commons is to blame in the first degree. Failing to obtain justice at the hands of the House, Mr. Bradlaugh's colleague in what we suppose must be still called the representation of Northampton, moved that Mr. Bradlaugh's seat should be declared vacant and a new writ be issued; but this was rejected by a large majority, the Government opposing the motion for technical and the Opposition for personal reasons. Denied justice on all hands, a member in name only, having no appeal to the law tribunals for the illegal treatment he has received, Mr. Bradlaugh took a step which in the language of the leader of the Opposition forced the hand of the Conservatives, and has led to his expulsion. Directly after the division on Mr. Labouchere's motion Mr. Bradlaugh walked up to the table of the House, and before he could be stopped read out the words of the Parliamentary Oath, kissed a copy of the New Testament he had with him and signed the paper from which he had read the oath. Being ordered by the Speaker to withdraw below the bar he complied, but immediately re-entered the House and took a seat within the bar. Being again directed by the Speaker to withdraw below the bar, Mr. Bradlaugh, having stated that he had now taken the oath required by law and also taken his seat, obeyed the Speaker's directions. This led to a warm discussion, the pretty general feeling being that a gross insult had been offered to the House by Mr. Bradlaugh. Mr. Gladstone suggested time for deliberation, and this was agreed to. On Wednesday, Mr. Gladstone, while admitting the scene of the previous evening was "scandalous in the highest degree," declined to take the initiative in dealing with the case, consistently carrying out the course he has all along adopted, viz., that it was for those who had by their illegal conduct brought about the scene to take the steps necessary to punish Mr. Bradlaugh, if punishment be deserved. Sir Stafford Northcote, after a petulant complaint that the leader of the House had cast the duty on him, moved that the Sergeant-at-Arms be instructed to prevent Mr. Bradlaugh from entering the precincts of the House. This motion was characterised as a milk-and-water one by Lord Randolph Churchill, amid the assenting cheers of many of those who regard that young gentleman as far more fitted to lead than the recognised leader of the Opposition. During the debate Mr. Bradlaugh was refused permission to speak in his own defence, which again is without precedent, and wholly opposed to the most ordinary notions of justice, and more in accord with that administered by Judge Lynch. Mr. Bradlaugh thereupon entered the House and took his seat. At this "reiterated insult" Sir Stafford Northcote asked leave to withdraw his motion—the milk-and-water one—and to substitute for it a motion for Mr. Bradlaugh's expulsion. This was carried, and as a consequence, a writ was at once moved for and directed to be issued, and it now rests with the electors of Northampton to decide whether this business is to further trouble the House of Commons.

Were we merely concerned to look at this matter from a party point of view we should be disposed to hope that Mr. Bradlaugh, who will, of course, again seek election, will fail. But we have hitherto looked at this question from a higher point of view than that of party. There is involved here a constitutional question, a question of religious liberty, and we dare not, therefore, permit the slightest feeling of desire for the sinking into oblivion of a question which has troubled the Liberal party sorely to find expression. On the contrary; we now feel that it will be better every way for Northampton to re-elect, by a decisive majority, the man who has been refused bare justice at the hands of an intolerant majority in the House of Commons. And we say this, notwithstanding the course that Mr. Bradlaugh has taken, which, however ill-judged it may have been, has so far proved successful that he has got what he wanted, viz., an appeal to his constituents.

There has been a great outcry against Mr. Bradlaugh for what is called an insult to the House. So far as an explanation has been permitted to him he has stated that what he has done he did for the purpose of getting a legal decision on his right to take his seat. That he disobeyed the orders of the House of Commons is quite clear, that he has disobeyed the law is not so clear. The men who talk about insult so loudly conveniently forget that there are some things higher than the House of Commons, and those are justice and legality. Both of these a majority of the House, inspired with feelings of party and theological rancour, have violated. It will be time enough to talk about insult when the House no longer sets an example of lawlessness, and when might ceases to override right. It is for the electors of Northampton now to give their answer to the House of Commons; we trust it may be no uncertain one.

DR. WILLIAMS'S TRUST.—XXIV.

[CONTRIBUTED BY W. D. JEREMY, ESQ.]

142. REV. ROBERT ASPLAND (1811-45).—Minister of the Gravel-pit Chapel, Hackney (1806-45). A member of the Presbyterian Board (1821-45), editor of the Monthly Repository (1806-26), and of the Christian Reformer (1815-44), of both which periodicals he was the originator; secretary and one of the founders of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and author of about fifty separate publications. This eminent minister was for many years the most distinguished leader of the Unitarians of the metropolis in their various public efforts. When he entered Dr. Williams's Trust, in 1811, "he had," in the words of Dr. Thomas Rees, "established a high reputation among the Presbyterian ministers of London, not alone by his professional services in the pulpit, but also by his active labours in religious and charitable institutions belonging to the Dissenters." He lived in exciting times, and no one in his position took a more prominent part in the political, religious, and inter-denominational struggles of the last forty years of his life. He witnessed the repeal of the "Act for preventing the Mischiefs and Dangers that may arise by certain Persons called Quakers and others refusing to take lawful Oaths"; of the Five Mile

Act, restraining Nonconformists from inhabiting in Corporations; and of the Conventicle Act, which imposed penalties of £20 or £40 upon every Dissenting preacher for each sermon addressed to an audience of more than four persons. He saw the passing of an Act (52 Geo. III., c. 155), which for the first time extended to Unitarians the benefit of the Act of Toleration. He assisted in procuring the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts, in removing the disabilities of Roman Catholics, and in procuring the Dissenters' Marriage Act, and was from the first in the midst of the unfortunate quarrels between the English Presbyterians and the two other Denominations, and he lived to see the passing of the Dissenters' Chapels Bill. He died at Hackney on the 30th of December, 1845, in his sixty-fourth year.

A memoir of his life, works, and correspondence was written by his son, the Rev. R. Brook Aspland, and published in 1850, forming an octavo volume of goodly size, and containing much historical matter interwoven with the narrative. The following extracts in relation to the main subject of these biographical notes may be appropriately introduced here:—

"It was on many accounts gratifying to Mr. Aspland to be called on to share the responsibilities of Dr. Williams's Trust. . . . One of the few rewards of his trusteeship was the occasional society of his colleagues in office. Four times a year the trustees, in accordance with the directions of their founder, assembled round a table spread with plain yet substantial hospitality. That frugal table had, however, attractions of the best kind—knowledge and strong intellectual power generally, and sometimes eloquence and wit, seasoned the conversation of the guests. The party assembled in the principal room of the Library, which is hung round with Nonconformist worthies. Earlier in the century, before fashion had put aside all distinctions of costume, venerable divines in state wigs and the other insignia of the clerical dress, and aged gentlemen in the becoming costume of a former generation, sat near the head of the table, and equalled, if they did not surpass, in dignity the figures which looked down upon them from the surrounding canvases. With stately grace did Dr. Abraham Rees preside over these simple banquets; his powers of conversation were great. On one side of him would sit Dr. Lindsay, on whom nature had been prodigal in its gifts, and who to a noble person added the endowments of a powerful and cultivated mind. On the other side might be seen Mr. Belsham, whose manners were those of the gentleman, as his conversation was that of the scholar, or a traveller from abroad, or some valued friend of religious liberty—Dr. Parr, Mr. Everett, Mr. William Smith, or Mr. G. W. Wood—was an invited guest.

"From a manuscript book in Mr. Aspland's hand, dated 1821, are taken the following notes of a conversation, which may serve as a specimen of the table-talk of Dr. Williams's Library:—

Jan. 11, 1821.—Dr. Rees related the pleasant meetings of a club which used to meet at the London Coffee-house, of which Dr. Franklin was a member. Everything new in the Royal Society was there talked of. Dr. F. was the life of the club, but when a stranger was introduced was always mute. . . .

Mr. Belsham.—Dr. Franklin was sceptical. He told Dr. Priestley that he had never fairly studied the evidences of Christianity, and lamented that, owing to his having in early life been accustomed to hear Christianity ridiculed, he was never able to bring himself to study it seriously. Dr. Kippis and Dr. Harris always looked on Dr. F. with suspicion.

Dr. Rees.—But Dr. Priestley idolised him. Dr. Kippis knew little of the world; Dr. Harris differed from Dr. F. in his politics. The truth lay between the two.

Dr. Rees talked on his favourite subject of the safety of the middle path. He reminded Mr. Belsham that, in company with Dr. Price once, he (Mr. B.) had asserted that he was a middle man; upon which Dr. P. replied, if you be in the middle I can point out one extreme, but where is the other?

Mr. Le Breton told of a late pleasantry at the Westminster School. There was a question (debated in Latin) concerning the morality of the Romans who killed Julius Cæsar, and it was said, 'Nec male fecerunt, nec bene fecerunt, sed interfecerunt.' What was the meaning of inter in this word? We had medley in a similar sense.

Mr. Belsham.—Chance-medley is accidental homicide.

Dr. Rees expatiated on his Arian views. He believed in the pre-existence of Christ—a distinguished spiritual being in a former state, perhaps this world, before the revolutions that preceded what is called the creation. The spiritual nature took the place of a human soul at generation. All souls pre-existed.

Mr. Belsham would probably agree with the Doctor if he knew his meaning.—Memoir, pp. 393, 399-401.

Mr. Aspland was brought up and educated for the ministry amongst the Baptists, but whilst pursuing his studies at Aberdeen in 1800 he was led to reject the Calvinistic theory, and on that account voluntarily resigned a valuable Baptist Scholarship which he held. In the following year he accepted an invitation from the General Baptist Congregation at Newport, in the Isle of Wight, where he was settled for five years. Whilst there he gave up Arianism, but he does not appear to have ever abandoned his anti-pædo Baptist opinions, and he had no occasion at Hackney to administer adult baptism. "It were superfluous to add," wrote the Rev. John Kentish in 1846, "that Mr. Aspland from the beginning to the end of his ministry was a Christian Unitarian" . . . "an unwavering believer in historical Christianity as it rests on miraculous attestation."—Memoir, p. 604.

In the course of a speech which he delivered at the little Lincolnshire town of Grantham this week, Mr. Goldwin Smith referred to the Bradlaugh case in words that seem to us to go to the root of the matter, and that are well worthy of the attention of those who subordinate the great and time-honoured principles of civil and religious liberty to personal prejudices, or mere electioneering policy:—

I live on a continent where religion has been entirely severed from the State, and has not suffered, but vastly gained, by the severance. Go through the American Union, from north to south, from east to west, even into the far western settlements, and you will see every little hamlet crowded with churches, built by the spontaneous piety of the people. Gentlemen, I hope Mr. Bradlaugh has no very ardent adherents here, for I am not one. It is not, therefore, as a personal question that I deal with the Bradlaugh case. I look at these things still from a religious point of view. I am one of those who do not believe that the end of religion has come. I take my stand upon the principle of the Free Churches of England, with whom on all religious questions my lot was cast. I take my stand upon principles which I believe to be those of the Founder of religion. "My kingdom is not of this world." I do not mean that religion is not a strong support of the State; I believe it is. But to support the State, religion must of itself be strong; to be strong, it must be sincere; to be sincere, it must be free. Taking my stand upon that principle, the question, I say, is not one of admitting Mr. Bradlaugh, personally, to the House of Commons, because I set him aside as the very least part of the whole matter; but of establishing once for all the principle that there shall be no religious restrictions in Parliament—that it shall not matter what creed a man professes, or whether he professes any or no creed at all—if he is duly elected, he shall go into Parliament as a matter of course. Let religion stand upon its own footing, and political questions upon theirs; that is the course which is most conducive to the interests of religion, most respectful to her, and ought to be accepted on religious grounds by all religious men. They say if Mr. Bradlaugh is admitted, you will unchristianise the House of Commons! Dr. Johnson once gained a signal victory in discussion with a person, which led his friend Boswell to remark—"You made a fool of him!" "No, sir," said Johnson, "Nature had been beforehand with me." It has not been left for Mr. Bradlaugh to unchristianise the House of Commons. Religion is a thing of reality—not of forms and professions. No sensible man cares for mere forms and professions; and why should we suppose the Almighty does?

DR. BUTLER, head master of Harrow School, in a sermon preached on Sunday at the Chapel Royal, made some pointed and noteworthy observations on Christian charity in political life. Dwelling upon the words, "Though I speak with the tongues of men and of angels and have not charity, I am nothing." Dr. Butler said:—"There seems to be a kind of tacit understanding that in political life the law of Christian love is to be ignored, or at least suspended—that, whenever it is possible, the worst motive is to be assigned; that a man's good is to be systematically suppressed, and his weakness insultingly paraded; that every error is to be magnified into a crime, every old sore unsparingly ripped up and gloated over, every success invidiously and insidiously decried. This, so far as I can see, is the prevalent language of our day, common alike to all parties, whether you look for it in the newspaper, the magazine, the Houses of Parliament, the club, or the drawing-room; and surely to a Christian it must be a sorry sight—all the more so because of our loud Christian professions." It is gratifying to know that these words were listened to by a considerable number of prominent political personages, including the Prime Minister.

WE congratulate the Liberals of Poole on having chosen so sound a Radical as our friend Mr. Thomas Chatfield Clarke to be their candidate at the next general election. On Wednesday night a large Liberal meeting was held for the purpose of giving a public reception to Mr. Clarke. He expressed an opinion in favour of the closure, upheld the home and foreign policy of the Government, and referring to the Bradlaugh question, said that if he had been in the House of Commons the previous night he should have voted in favour of Mr. Bradlaugh taking the oath. The Hon. Evelyn Ashley, M.P., followed in the same tone as regards the closure and Irish policy, and resolutions pledging support to Mr. Clarke and expressing confidence in the Government were unanimously passed. Poole will gain a valuable member and a thoroughly honest and consistent Liberal if it elects Mr. Clarke, to whose candidature we wish all possible success.

ARCHDEACON REICHEL, Professor of Ecclesiastical History in the University of Dublin, has been ventilating his broad views of "Episcopacy" in the sacred precincts of the College chapel, greatly to the astonishment of the high and dry advocates of apostolic succession and Divine rights. The Archdeacon is an advocate of views similar to those held by the Bishop of Durham and other well-known Churchmen, and those are regarded by High Churchmen as a surrender all along the line of the ecclesiastical position.

Chicago Unity, commenting on the programme of our coming Conference, writes:—"The invitation is of the broadest kind, inviting delegates from 'Unitarian and other non-subscribing congregations.' Judging from the topics assigned, our English brethren are going to begin at the work rather than at the glory end. This is well. Careful deliberation will land the body in enthusiasm, but much enthusiasm sometimes evaporates before it culminates in far reaching efficiency. Unity sends its greeting beforehand to the English brethren."—We hope the warning against mere talk and fitful enthusiasm will prove to be needless.

A propos to the question of eternal punishments, a correspondent of the Spectator tells the following story:—

It is refreshing to hear of a genuine conversion, if it be from darkness to light, especially when it is speedy and complete. A few years ago, a friend of mine—there is no harm now in telling this story, as the superstition referred to in it is exploded, if not everywhere, certainly among your readers—was taking a country walk with a friend, a clergyman, when the latter suddenly wheeled round, his face towards home, with the remark, "Let us go back, I'm tired; was called up in the middle of the night to baptise a child that was dying." "Were you in time?" asked my friend. "Just," was the reply; "another half-minute, and I should have been too late!" "And if you had been, what then?" "Why, then, I suppose, the poor little thing would have been lost." "Eternally?" "Well, yes, according to our belief." "May I ask what sort of boots you wear?" said my friend. "Boots? Elastic-sided, always." "Now, suppose you wore laced, and they had taken two minutes to put on, the child would have been dead, and—lost eternally, ay?" "That's a peculiar view of the question; I must think over my position." Two days after, the clergyman met my friend, and said, "I have thought that matter over, and must alter my view. The boots did it."

The clergyman was a fool, or he would have stood to his ground like a man. Assuming Scriptural authority for the doctrine of eternal punishment, and that the rite of baptism was indispensable to salvation, he ought to have faced the logical consequences of his hideous dogma, boots or no boots. If the child were destined to be saved it would have been kept alive, even if the clergyman wore laced boots, and so the ways of Providence would have been vindicated!

At a Unitarian meeting in Boston, U.S., on the Thursday before Dr. Bellows's death, the Rev. E. E. Hale told this touching anecdote:—"It happened to me a dozen years ago, more or less, to write a little book, of which the hero was called, for my purposes, Harry Wadsworth. He was represented as dying young, and the book began where some people who loved him attended his funeral. The book had not been published six weeks before I received a letter from the Pacific Coast, from an eminent merchant of San Francisco, of whom I had never heard, thanking me for writing this book, because it gave him some details in regard to the life of Harry Wadsworth, which he had never known before. He had not known what W. stood for in his name; he didn't know it stood for Wadsworth. 'When I was married,' said he, 'in the joy of young married life, I was in the city of New York, when, to my horror and dismay, my bride was struck down with the small-pox. The custodian of the hotel told me I must leave at once. The physician said it was impossible. The keeper of the hotel said that none of his servants must attend to her. I received then and there a visit from that Harry Wadsworth, who was then a young clergyman in the city of New York; and from that moment till my wife's recovery he came to her sick room and performed with his own hand the menial offices of the hotel chamber. You know by this time that his name was Harry Wadsworth Bellows.' Dr. Bellows's name is not Henry Wadsworth, but Henry Whitney; but that fact is an illustration of what is practical life for the man for whose life we are all praying to-day."

AT Cambridge the board of studies of modern and mediæval languages report in favour of instituting a special examination in modern languages for the ordinary B.A. degree to be held in the following subjects:—(1) English language and literature; (2) French language and literature; (3) German language and literature; and that candidates be required to satisfy the examiners in English language and literature and either French or German at their option. The report is signed by Professors Seeley, J. E. B. Mayor, Skeat, and Cowell, Mr. Bradshaw, the University librarian, Mr. Aldis Wright, and Mr. J. W. Cartmell.

WE read in an American paper that the pastor of the Congregational Church at Stratford, Connecticut, used the Revised New Testament. The officers sent him a written order to return to the King James version. "The ignorance thus shown by a people to whose enlightenment I have devoted myself," says the minister, "so disgusts me that I will no longer read any Scripture for their benefit. I have resigned."—The good pastor was quite wrong. He should have stayed and indoctrinated his people so thoroughly into the merits of the Revised Version that at last they voluntarily adopted it by acclamation.

IN Convocation of the Northern Province last week the Rev. E. Harman moved: "That the thanks of this Convocation be presented to the Revisers of the New Testament for their sustained efforts in the great work intrusted to them, and that this Convocation unites in the prayer that under the blessing of Almighty God the Revised Translation may materially advance the knowledge and understanding of the Holy Scriptures." Canon Trevor, of York, in opposing the motion, said that "this revised thing" had led to discussion and disaster to the English Bible, and so far from helping to promote the study of the Word of God, he took it to be a distinct step in the race of that criticism which had led to the most disastrous results in the country in which it originated. The President—the Archbishop of York—suggested the postponement of the question until the next Session of Convocation. In doing so he expressed his opinion that the English Bible, with all its merits and its faults, was uncommonly good English, and was very dear to the people of England, and he had no doubt that the mass of the people were not in favour of abandoning the one and taking up the other. The resolution, we are hardly surprised to hear, was withdrawn.—Canon Trevor and his school are wise in their generation. They evidently think that pure scholarship and a more accurate knowledge of what they call “the Word of God” are entirely subordinate to the interests of a dogmatic system. There is a growing conviction, the soundness of which we cannot dispute, that the Revised Version is sapping the foundations of the old ecclesiastical Orthodoxy.

GRAMMARIANS, expositors, and historians have been puzzled by the feminine article used with the masculine Baal, Romans xi. 4: ἡ Βάαλ. Some have thought that a feminine appellation such as image or statue must be added, some that the feminine gender indicated contempt, some that the name Baal was of common gender and served also for Astarte. Professor August Dillmann, of Berlin, in the Monatsbericht der Akademie zu Berlin, discusses these views and shows how untenable they are. He then proceeds to develop his own explanation and to show that in the last centuries before Christ and in the first Christian centuries the Palestinian as well as the Hellenistic Jews held the principle that the name Baal dare not be uttered, just as they never ventured to pronounce the name Jehovah. For Jehovah the Jew read Adonai, and for Baal in Greek he read αὐλόνιον. In Greek they suggested this reading by the feminine article, and Paul followed this custom when he wrote ἡ Βάαλ.

THE completed returns of the late census of the United States show the population of the great cities to have increased by leaps and bounds, while in many instances towns unknown twenty years ago have attained enormous dimensions. New York has 1,206,590 inhabitants, against 942,292 in 1871; Chicago, 503,304, against 298,977; Brooklyn, 566,689, against 396,099; San Francisco, 233,956, against 149,473; Denver, 35,630, against only 4,759. The growth has been most marked in the West and in the manufacturing centres.

THE Hungarian Protestants seem to be taking extraordinary pains to assert and preserve Hungarian nationality. A short time since the General Synod of the Reformed Church of Hungary appointed a Special Commission to draw up a new hymn-book. A Pesth correspondent states that the regulations laid down for the experts upon this Commission are extremely severe. No hymn of German origin is to be admitted. It is even proposed to exclude the Magyar translation of Martin Luther's “Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott!” The new hymnal must be first of all national, and afterwards devotional and musical. Hence it is only to include the original Magyar hymns, and original Magyar music.

THE LATE DR. SHEPHERD FLETCHER.—At a meeting of the committee of the Unitarian Home Missionary Board, held last Monday evening, Mr. Harry Rawson in the chair, it was moved by the Chairman, and seconded by Mr. J. Dendy, sen., “That this Committee desires hereby to express their deep sympathy with the family of the late Dr. Shepherd Fletcher in their recent bereavement; and to record their sense of the valuable services rendered by him as the Honorary Medical Officer of the Unitarian Home Missionary Board since the establishment of the Institution.”

It is rumoured that the Canadians are desirous of absolute independence in the matter of copyright, and that the Hon. William Macdougall will introduce a Bill on the subject in the present session of the Dominion Parliament. The complaint of the Canadians is that English books are too dear; yet our sixpenny editions are cheaper than any which they can produce themselves or import from the United States.

PROFESSOR A. H. SAYCE has returned to Oxford from his winter's tour in Egypt, but the Academy regrets extremely to hear that his health has not been benefited thereby.

Reviews.

Alexander Raleigh. Records of his Life. Edited by Mary Raleigh. Edinburgh: Black. 1881.

On one occasion only we had the privilege of hearing the late Dr. Raleigh, the minister for many years of the well-known Hare-court Chapel, Canonbury. It was at the opening of a new suburban chapel, in a neighbourhood not noted for breadth and liberality of sentiment in theological matters. The preacher was a man of grave, stately aspect, with a slight Scotch accent, and entirely devoid of pretence or striving after effect in his manner of delivery. He preached like a man who felt that he had a great message entrusted to him, and delivered it right on in a simple, manly, and natural way. His sermon was in part a very effective plea for greater tolerance of honest and conscientious scepticism, a lesson greatly needed by the Orthodox Dissenters of that day. We remember to this day the almost scornful manner in which the preacher referred to those who are keen in their scent after heresy, while remarkably tolerant of grave faults of character and life. The sermon was one that might have been delivered in any Unitarian chapel, and was certainly one significant indication of the “Changed Aspects of the Evangelical Faith,” on which towards the close of his career he discoursed wisely at an assembly of ministers of different Orthodox denominations. On another occasion we met Dr. Raleigh on one of these memorable days when the representatives of the “Three Denominations” go up to the throne with congratulatory addresses on the marriage or birth of some members of the Royal family, and then, although known to be heterodox, we received from him the friendly greeting that might be expected from the preacher of the sermon to which we have referred. All that we have read from his pen has been quite in harmony with the idea we had been led to form of the character of a grave, cultured, refined man, with a pervading vein of poetic sentiment, and deep religious feeling, which made his preaching very attractive to thoughtful readers.

The memoirs, it must be confessed, are somewhat disappointing. Mrs. Raleigh has, no doubt, performed her labour of love as efficiently as was possible under the circumstances. She has “tried to be true, as he was, and while giving—from his own hand as much as possible—enough of details to fill up the picture, she has had a loyal regard to his characteristic reticence.” But this very reticence gives the record of his life much less of human interest than we expected in the case of a man of his mark. The materials at the disposal of the biographer seem to have been limited—chiefly MSS. of sermons and theological essays. The career was an uneventful one that of an estimable Congregational minister of the front rank, who took an active part in the affairs of his own denomination, but was unknown in the larger world of literature and science. We expected in a memoir of this kind to have gained some glimpse into the interior life of a popular Dissenting body, in respect to which “people of the world,” so called, have but vague and sometimes very inaccurate notions. But here we are disappointed, and there may be good reason for the reticence, judging from some allusions to the difficulties and discouragements which even so eminent a minister as Dr. Raleigh experienced in the course of his various pastorates.

We are struck with the pervading melancholy of the book. There is an utter absence of humour, which makes us feel that we are in an entirely different atmosphere from that in which men of literary and scientific eminence live. Dr. Raleigh was, we fancy, genial and pleasant enough in his private relations, but in reading this and other memoirs of Dissenting worthies we feel as if they never put off their artificial pulpit manner. They seem to go about in the world like men oppressed with a sense of the seriousness of life, who are liable to be called upon at any moment to “engage in prayer,” and are expected to live with a constant sense of the death impending over all mortal beings. In the case of Dr. Raleigh this may be partly accounted for by the frequent pressure of ill-health; and still more by his early training in one of the strictest of Scotch sects, the Cameronians. It is obvious that in this and in many other ways the old Puritan theology exercises its gloomy and depressing influence over many who have long outgrown its dogmas. In any case the lighter aspects of life, which seem to us Liberals to have their function in the formation of character, are studiously and consciously ignored by Dissenting divines of the Orthodox persuasion. From the time when he devoted himself to the ministry, it is incidentally recorded, Dr. Raleigh never entered a theatre, being convinced that evil of several kinds was inseparably associated with the modern stage. Writing to a sister in 1844 to explain why he cannot accompany her to a concert, he remarks that his old college tutor, “Dr. Vaughan himself would make no objection, but thinks that, taking into account the state of feeling on the subject of a considerable part, and that in many respects the best part of our denomination, it would neither be wise nor dutiful in us to set an example of latitudinarianism.” What an illustration of the “fear of the folk,” and especially of the Deacon folk, in which the popular Independent minister lives and moves and has his being! For our own part we prefer the “latitudinarianism” which encourages a manly independence of thought and action, to that sickly “pietism” which regulates its conduct by the standard of “the best part of our denomination.”

The outward life of Dr. Raleigh may be briefly told in a few sentences, and his useful career, as we have said, was comparatively uneventful. He was born of respectable Scotch parentage, his father being a farmer in Galloway, the picturesque country which Andrew Rutherford loved so well, and which is famous for the heroic story of the old Covenanters. He received the rudiments of his education in the high-school of Castle Douglas, then little better than an ordinary parish school. Notwithstanding the industry and marked intelligence of both his parents they were never prosperous in life, and the young Alexander was apprenticed, first to a draper in Castle Douglas, and afterwards to Mr. White, of the same trade, in Ranelagh-street, Liverpool. When he began to read and think for himself, business became distasteful to him. “Converted” in the Orthodox sense, under the ministry of the late Rev. John Kelly, of Liverpool, he was advised to study for the Christian ministry, and the usual difficulties being overcome, he left business and entered the Independent College of Blackburn, at the comparatively mature age of twenty-three. The College, then under the charge of the Rev. Gilbert Wardlaw, was afterwards removed to the neighbourhood of Manchester, where the young Raleigh came under the guiding influence of the late eminent Dr. Robert Vaughan, the founder and first editor of the British Quarterly Review. We have a slighter glimpse than we could wish into the interior of a Dissenting College, and what little we see from this and other sources only deepens the strong conviction we hold of the essential narrowness of the “Dissenting Academy” system, and of the vastly superior advantages of the University system under which young men destined for various professions are trained together during their undergraduate course. Raleigh was not a scholarly man, and never had much ambition that way. He had not enjoyed the advantage of early classical training, and even in after days there are no traces of any interest in the deeper intellectual problems or scientific researches of the age. Knowledge of whatever kind, his biographer tells us, seemed to him only subsidiary and instrumental. His mission was “to preach the Gospel; and in this desire all others were swallowed up.”

Raleigh's first charge was at Greenock, where he threw himself with characteristic energy into his ministerial duties. After three years he resigned on account of failure of health, touched to find how much love his short ministry had won him. A period of rest followed, recruiting health and strength. Then came a successful ministry of five years at Rotherham, in the early part of which he was married, in 1851, to Mary Gifford, of Edinburgh, an accomplished woman, whose well-written tribute to her husband sufficiently proves that she was worthy of being his life-partner.

Next came a ministry of three years in Dr. Wardlaw's famous old chapel in Glasgow. The trying climate of the North did not suit his health, or that of his family, and we gather from some slight indications that he had there the usual difficulties which fall to the lot of most Dissenting ministers, who have “to please in order to live." When an invitation came from London he was ready to go, because he felt that "the conservatism of a long-established congregation, with ways and ideas fixed for fifty years, hampered his action, and without any blame being attached to individuals, fettered his freedom in a way that he felt was a hindrance to his work. It seems at first sight a little inconsistent with this remark that he accepted an invitation from the congregation of Hare-court Chapel, which was founded more than two centuries ago by one of the ejected ministers of 1662. The congregation, however, had dwindled away in the old city chapel, and the small remnant had removed the endowments and built a handsome new chapel under the same name in the Canonbury district, where Dr. Raleigh felt it to be one of the charms of the place that he practically had to make a new congregation. His ministry of fifteen or sixteen years in this place was the most fruitful and successful in his whole career. "The Church-membership which, when Mr. Raleigh came [in 1859] numbered thirty-four, stands in the report of 1861 at 414, and in 1867 at 840." Here he led the usual life of a popular metropolitan minister, and was called to the highest stations of trust and influence in his denomination. In 1862 he had an interesting and quite friendly controversy with Charles Kingsley, arising out of the Bicentenary agitation. In 1865 he received from the University of Glasgow the degree of Doctor of Divinity, and in May of the same year, in company with his former tutor, Dr. Vaughan, and his friend Dr. George Smith he visited America, the party representing the Congregational Union at the National Conference of American Congregational Churches held at Boston. His speeches on this occasion made a most favourable impression, and he was received with all the more favour because through the civil war he had been unwaveringly in full sympathy with the North, believing that the cause of the Union was the cause of humanity and right. In 1868 he achieved the blue riband of Congregationalism, the chairmanship of the Congregational Union, on which occasion he delivered two valuable addresses, one at the spring meeting on "Christianity and Modern Progress," and the other at the autumn meeting, suggested by the recent disestablishment of the Irish Church on the general question of Church Establishments. In 1879 he was again appointed Chairman of the Union, but resigned the office during his last illness. A delightful visit to Switzerland during the eventful year of the Franco-German war, and a longer journey to Egypt and Palestine in 1875 varied the even tenour of his ministerial life. In 1871 a novel experiment was tried, which does not seem to have been altogether successful. A second church was founded in fellowship with Hare-court, and sharing with it the services of two ministers, Dr. Raleigh, and a colleague, the Rev. Henry Simon. A beautiful church was built at Stamford-hill, and it was arranged that each minister should preach once on Sunday at each chapel, repeating the same sermon at both places, and dividing the pastoral work as might seem best. The experiment, which lasted for four years, did not realise the expectations formed, although Dr. Raleigh himself would never allow that it was a failure. Even at Hare-court, prosperous as it was, there were difficulties created by factious persons, which caused him much pain and anxiety, and pamphlets containing bitter accusations were circulated, containing reflections on his ministerial character, which "took the sunshine out of these later days at Hare-court."

In 1875 Dr. Raleigh was invited to become pastor of Kensington-chapel, vacant by the resignation of the Rev. Dr. Stoughton; and much to the regret of the great majority of his friends at Hare-court and Stamford-hill Chapels he decided to accept the new "call" as the only way of escape from the excessive labour which threatened a premature end of the ministry. There is little to record of his years at Kensington. They flowed evenly and pleasantly, and it was stimulating to him as a preacher to find among his congregation not a few who were influencing by speech or pen the political and religious thought of the time.

After four years successful ministry at Kensington the end came in the spring of 1880, soon after the general election, and it is characteristic of his life-long political sympathies that during his last illness he said, "There is comfort in dying when the nation is recovered to righteousness and a righteous Government."

Dr. Raleigh, as we have intimated, was a popular preacher and pastor rather than a scholar or theologian. His publications were chiefly of a practical kind; two volumes of sermons of the meditative character, showing considerable depth of religious sentiment and the command of a graceful and poetic style; and two small books of the expository class—one bringing out the practical lessons and dramatic scenes of the Book of Esther, and the other doing the same office for the much more interesting and instructive Book of Jonah.

In the course of this review we have already indicated our estimate of Dr. Raleigh's character and work. He had not the massive intellect of his friend Thomas Binney, and his name is not permanently associated with any great movement in religious thought or philanthropic action. He is scarcely one of the foremost figures in the history even of Modern Dissent, and he will live chiefly in the memory of the friends who loved him and were benefited by his preaching—perhaps after all the best kind of fame. He was a thoughtful, amiable, high-minded man, who successfully surmounted every obstacle, and attained the highest places of honour in his own denomination. In reading these memoirs we cannot help feeling that he was a man whom we should like to have known, and that he might have benefited by closer communion with some of our best men, while we in turn might have learned much from him. It is one of the trials of our isolated position that we are separated by dogmatic differences and sectarian walls from free intercourse with such men. Perhaps we have to learn that there is the real spirit of liberality in many who still use the old Orthodox formulas and cling to what they regard as the essentials of Christian faith; while they have to learn that there is the real spirit of Christianity among many who reject the whole Messianic mythology and believe with Jeremy Taylor that "religion is rather a divine life than divine knowledge."

Lay Sermons. By John Stuart Blackie. London: Macmillan and Co. 1881.

It has always seemed to us much easier to say what is not a sermon than to give a complete definition of what a sermon is. The old-fashioned notion that a sermon must be prefixed by a text or verse from the Bible, that it should be divided into a firstly, secondly, and "thirdly and lastly," has quite gone out of fashion. That it must have some reference to God in it is no longer considered essential; and it is only those who talk of "Gospel sermons" who insist on a frequent reference to Christ being made. We have listened to many sermons which but for the fact of the preacher requesting his hearers to look into the Bible, and there pick out certain words, might have done as well, if not better, for the pages of the quarterly reviews; others would have been far better fitted as padding for the second-class monthlies, than as homilies, or as appeals to the reason, or the heart. And yet all these were called sermons or discourses, the only reason being, so far as we could discern, that they were given in a place devoted to public worship, and after a religious service.

Professor Blackie seems to think that where a discourse has "a direct practical drift," or is "intended to apply Christian ethics or to expound Christian doctrine," it is entitled to be called a sermon, and not a lecture. We will not pretend to decide this point, which is not very material after all. The main question for consideration in all these cases is the substance and not the name. With this the critic has alone to deal, and the contents of the discourses we now proceed to consider. It may, however, be mentioned, first, that they originated in a series of "Sabbath Evening Addresses," delivered to the Young Men's Association connected with Dr. Guthrie's congregation in Edinburgh. Professor Blackie somewhat unnecessarily, as it seems to us, justifies his work, by the statement that he is in no wise walking out of the proper sphere of his studies in taking up theological subjects, because he has been educated for the Church, and "habitually prosecuted the study of the Scriptures in the original tongues as one of the most fruitful fields of scholarly activity."

as will be seen from their titles:—(1) The Creation of the World; (2) The Jewish Sabbath and the Christian Lord's Day; (3) Faith; (4) The Utilisation of Evil; (5) Landlords and Land Laws; (6) The Politics of Christianity; (7) The Dignity of Labour; (8) the Scottish Covenanters; (9) On Symbolism, Ceremonialism, Formalism, and the New Creature. That Professor Blackie should write something that is worth listening to goes without the saying, but it is equally true that he says many things which are less worth listening to than some other of his sayings. When he gets on to scientific matters one feels that he is not altogether a sure guide, and more especially do we feel a distrust when he allows himself to indulge in certain vigorous denunciations of some modern scientific theories. In his sermon on the creation of the world, he regards the account given in Genesis—"the Mosaic account of Creation," as he calls it—as philosophically and theologically true, and somewhat ridicules the doctrine "of evolution as distinguished from progressive creativeness." Now, Evolution may or may not be true, or it may be strictly correct so far as the laws of our physical being are concerned, and yet it may have but little to do with our spiritual or moral concerns. Scientists may claim to know too much, and to assert as facts what are but theories at best. Their philosophy of the universe may not be a true one, but we confess to having our confidence shaken in the arguments of a man who permits himself to speak of "the bastard philosophy of a one-eyed squinting science." We do not pause to consider what exactly this remarkable sentence means; it seems to us that strength of argument lies altogether outside all such forcible expressions as this, and that however right he may be, he only weakens his influence who indulges in this kind of language of an opponent.

In his sermon on the Jewish Sabbath, Professor Blackie lays down the proposition "that the Sabbath is not a divine institution now, by direct sanction of God's law, obligatory on any Christian. It is obligatory only on Jews." And this he defends at much length, to the scandal, we doubt not, of many of the "unco' guid." On this subject many of his remarks are so good, that we make no apology for quoting them. He says:—

But apart from these ridiculous oddities of grim Calvinistic Modernism, the recurrent season of rest, which convenience and propriety have brought in as a statutory adjunct of the religious services of the Lord's Day, is in every view so natural, so salutary, so civilising, and so elevating, that the observance of a Sabbath, in fact, from the very constitution of human nature, becomes a duty imperative on every man who will live reasonably in this reasonable world. About the details of the observance there is little need to enlarge: the main point is that people should set distinctly before them the grand problem of life, to make each man of himself as complete a human being as possible, and to know assuredly that no practice tends so much to the development of a complete, well-harmonised, and well-rounded human character, as the wise keeping of one day of rest in seven. The two things to avoid, and for the avoidance of which Sabbatarianism is a sovereign remedy, are, first, the weakening of the functions by the unremitted strain, which, in these fast times, is a great mischief worker, even with the help of the Sabbath; and again, the narrowing and cramping influence which mere professional occupation never fails to exert on the persons who suffer themselves to be engrossed thereby.

Supposing, then, the Sunday free from the trammels of business, and the tyranny of a professional train of ideas, how shall a man employ himself? A Christian, of course, will go to church at least for one diet of the day; and he who is not a Christian will do so wisely also; for two reasons, first, because Christianity is essentially an ethical religion, by the teachings of which every moral being may profit, and then because it is an unhappy thing for a man, a member of a social organism, to withdraw himself from all part in that which, according to Socrates, is the most distinctive act of a reasonable animal—the acknowledgment of the great common source of all-existence, of all reason, and of all excellence. The necessity of the religious nature being gratified, a reasonable man is free to spend the remainder of the Lord's Day in the manner most beneficial to his own special well-being. If he is what is called a working-man,—that is, a man who, by the hard labour of bone and muscle, feels himself much in want of a periodical cessation from all exertion,—he may spend much part of the Sabbath most profitably by lying at length on a sofa, on a primrose bank, or a thymy hillside, as his circumstances may allow. Those who are less exhausted by their week-day work will, of course, use the day of rest not so much for absolute repose as for various kinds of mental exertion, such as may interfere as little as possible with the serene temper that belongs to the day, and at the same time may in no wise invade the rest to man and beast provided with such benevolent foresight by the great Jewish legislator. Music and sketching in the country, easy social gatherings among friends, and healthy games, such as croquet, lawn-tennis, golf, boating, though scarcely permitted by British usage, are contrary neither to the letter nor to the spirit of the Mosaic command, which, though not enjoined on Christians, has, from the wisest motives, been adopted into our code of social ethics. The same remark applies to the visitation of Botanic Gardens and Public Museums of Art and Science, which not only afford an agreeable recreation to the most intelligent part of the working-classes, but may help to withdraw a selection of them from places of low and even vicious resort. The only thing to be seriously attended to here is, that no Sabbath sports shall be allowed to commence before two o'clock in the afternoon; otherwise, recreation might run away with religion; and one day in seven spent in a round of frivolous dissipation would tend to intensify instead of allaying the evils arising from the strain of unremitted business. For persons of extraordinary energy that portion of the day of rest which is not employed in the exercises of religious worship will usually be devoted to whatever kind of exercise is least provided for by the habits of their profession. Sedentary persons should walk as much as possible; persons whose time is consumed in a mechanical routine of unintellectual business should devote some part of the Sunday to the cultivation of some favourite science, in the prosecution of which intensity of zeal might compensate for scant leisure; while scholars and professional teachers would find it for their advantage to open no professional book on the Lord's Day; but, if they will read, to take a long swim in the broad sea of general human sympathy. But before all things, on Sunday a man should take care to give special attention to his moral and spiritual nature, a culture only too apt to be neglected in the engrossing pursuit of gain or power, or honour, or reputation, or whatever other bubble, the foolish world may be hunting after, instead of the jewel wisdom. This special culture may best be found in the study of the Scriptures, and in the lives of great reformers, such as Buddha, Confucius, Martin Luther, Dr. Chalmers, Oberlin, Dr. Channing, and generally of great and good men and women who have done something noteworthy for the elevation of their species, whether under the Christian or the heathen dispensation. There are no more profitable "Sunday books," using that phrase in the moral and not the religious sense of the phrase, than the works of such good, pure, and noble heathens as Socrates, Plato, Epictetus, Marcus Antoninus, Cicero and Seneca. The study of such authors—pursued not in a philological spirit, but for the sake of their human contents only—brings with it the double benefit of presenting to us immutable morality free from the technical slang and sectarian shibboleths with which it is so apt to be intertwined, and at the same time stimulating our moral energies by the example of men who stood on a platform of equal moral altitude with our own, but with much more difficulty in the assertion of it. Minute and copious rules with regard to Sabbath-keeping no wise man will lay down; but he who knows not how to use this blessed opportunity for cherishing that purity and nobility of purpose in life, which business may strangle, and professions can but feebly cultivate, does not treat himself as a good rider treats his horse, and will come out whenever the balance of life requires to be struck, in some important respects as a deficient man.

The sermon on Faith seeks to reconcile the apparent contradiction between St. Paul and St. James, upon the subject of faith and works, maintaining that it is merely verbal; "works as a claim are one thing; works as an evidence another thing," he says. Taking as examples Moses, Columbus, Garibaldi, and Victor Emmanuel, the writer contends "that all heroism, of whatever kind, whether in the political or the religious world, or the world of individual achievement, is the result of some sort of faith,—a faith if not always in God and the divine government of the world, which is the culminating form of all faith, at last in a fixed order of things and the progress and happiness of human beings, as dependent on an unconditional and self-sacrificing recognition of that order."

On the subject of the land our author holds some healthy radical opinions, and indicates some of the changes in our land laws which are necessary to restore the lost balance of property in the soil. The abolition of laws of entail, simplification of transfer, compulsory register, abolition of the law of primogeniture, the separation of the wife's property, and greater freedom for the tenant, are points in his programme which, as he admits, before they can be carried out will cause a "loud outcry among large classes of people whose ideal of life is sitting on easy chairs and doing as their fathers did before them," and especially "by the landed proprietors who have been bred on false principles of artificial privilege, selfish monopoly, family vanity, and monstrous accumulation."

The Sermon on the "Dignity of Labour" is a sound practical discourse, and none the less valuable for its brevity. There is a healthy tone about it in answer to that most ridiculous of introspective questions "Is life worth living?" that makes us regard it as the best in the book; indeed, it approaches more nearly our ideal of a sermon than any of the others. Still they are all worth reading, and whether we call them sermons, lectures, discourses, or essays matters very little. The ideas they contain deserve consideration even when, as may very well happen, we are compelled at times to dissent from the author's views.

Short Notices.

Stories from the Life of Moses. By Richard Bartram, Sunday School Association. 1882.

In his previous publication, "Stories from the Book of Genesis," Mr. Bartram, in a very interesting and instructive way, unfolded the moral and spiritual lessons of many of those old-world legends which still possess religious worth, although, as he justly intimates, their historical value may be doubted. In the present book, which is the natural sequel to the other, he presents, in a very similar way, so much of the life of the great Hebrew leader as will make young people understand "why it was that his countrymen held him in so much reverence, and why even we, who claim to be followers of one still greater—one who, while belonging to the same race, far transcended all bonds of race and nation, can regard the work that Moses did as part of the great and eternal purposes of God." Mr. Bartram has wisely avoided vexed questions of criticism; and of course he has eliminated the supernatural element, and given "a rational and reverent interpretation of narratives that, in all probability, have an historical basis, though strangely intermingled with legend." The spirit in which the book is written is excellent, and it is in every way a valuable addition to the religious library of the young. It is certainly not the fault of the writer that this book will hardly interest its readers so much as its predecessor; the subject is not so attractive as those exquisite legends of Genesis which have so much human interest, and sink so deep into the heart of childhood. The only criticism we have to make is that there is too much Scripture, and too little comment and interpretation. Mr. Bartram's notes are always so good that we cry out for more of them. In the account, for instance, of the crossing of the Red Sea, he might with advantage have added some geographical details, showing how the supernatural legend arose out of the well-known physical phenomena. The lessons drawn from the narratives are always so good that we could almost wish that the whole story had been retold in the author's simple and effective style.

Short Sermons to Children. By Three Cousins. London: Sunday School Association, 37, Norfolk-street, Strand. 1882.

We have much pleasure in commending this excellent little work to the notice of our readers. It will supply a want which teachers and superintendents of Sunday-schools have long felt. The authors tell us in a brief preface that in their engagement as teachers they "found themselves frequently called upon to fill the vacant desk and lead the service for their Sunday scholars. From this necessity arose the little volume of sermons which fill the following pages, by which the cousins hoped to influence for good some of the girls and boys amongst the little congregation of very mixed ages to whom they spoke. The little sermons are only now very humbly offered to a wider congregation, in the hope that in some hour of need when the preacher's desk is empty they may serve a good turn to some teacher who is suddenly called upon for an address, which he has had no time or previous warning to prepare." This purpose they are admirably calculated to answer. The eighteen short sermons of which the book consists are simple in style, and handle the topics they discuss in an exceedingly interesting manner. The moral and religious lessons inculcated are illustrated by biographical sketches and notices, by anecdote and story, sometimes taken from Scripture, but more frequently from other sources. The authors appeal strongly to the elements of good latent in our nature; they set before the young various examples of piety, trust, heroism and devotedness, and by these means seek to win the youthful heart to the love of goodness and to an appreciation of true nobleness of character. This book ought to be welcome in our Sunday-schools and in our homes. In many a family these short sermons might be read aloud with advantage to both old and young. We may add that the book is got up in a neat and attractive form. Altogether it does credit to our Sunday School Association."

Literary Notes.

PROFESSOR KUENEN, of Leyden, will deliver the next series of Hibbert Lectures both in London and at Oxford.

MR. DAVID SINCLAIR, one of the masters of the Wigan Grammar School, has written a History of Wigan, which will be published in two quarto volumes early this year.

MR. SWINBURNE has nearly completed a narrative poem in several books—nine, if we mistake not—upon a theme of which poets never tire, the story of Tristram and Iseult.

MR. J. A. SYMONDS is engaged in printing a collection of one hundred and fifty original sonnets. Of these five only have been previously published, three in Mr. Hall Caine's "Sonnets of Three Centuries," and two in the Cornhill Magazine.

THOUGH the negotiations for a copyright convention between the United States and this country are proceeding slowly, no doubt is entertained in United States publishing circles as to the result. In consequence of this several firms, the Athenæum says, are paying English authors larger terms for advance sheets than they have heretofore paid.

MR. F. SARGENT has completed an etching from his picture of "The House of Commons," painted in the Upper Committee Room at Westminster. It contains three hundred and fifty portraits of members of the present House, taken from life. Both picture and proof-etching are now on view in Messrs. Gladwell Bros. gallery in Gracechurch-street.

W. T. LYNN, writing to Notes and Queries, says:—"We shall have Easter this year on the anniversary of the day on which the Resurrection really occurred. The only real doubt now about the year of that great event is whether it was A.D. 29 or 30. If the latter, the Paschal full moon fell that year on Thursday, April 6; the Crucifixion would be the next day, April 7, and the Resurrection April 9."

DR. BUDDENSIEG, of Dresden, has been fortunate enough to discover in the Studien Bibliothek at Olmütz a Wielif MS., hitherto unknown, containing no less than six Wielif tracts, none of which is preserved in any English library. He also noticed a "Chronica Britannica," which, from the character of its splendid ornamentation, appeared to belong to the middle of the thirteenth century.

THE Academy says that Mr. Wild's excavations at Cairo have resulted in the discovery of a monolith belonging to Apries, the Pharaoh Hophra of the Old Testament, and bearing the inscription:—"The beloved of Ptah of Memphis, giving life for ever, the good god Ra-aa-ab, lord of the two lands, Apries."

In the collection of prints of the late Lord Beaconsfield, about to be sold by Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson, and Hodge, are some of the works of William Blake.

SIR RICHARD TEMPLE'S new book, "Men and Events of my Time in India," just published by Mr. Murray, is mainly devoted to the description of particular men in their public capacities, or to summaries of their official conduct, and of their idiosyncrasies as displayed in the manner in which they served their country. Amongst many others, the careers of Lord Dalhousie, Lord Canning, Lord Lawrence, Lord Mayo, and Sir Bartle Frere are related.

Correspondence.

THE HOME MISSIONARY BOARD AND THE SUPPLY OF MINISTERS.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—I thank you for your courtesy and fairness in inserting my last letter in your paper, and I shall be obliged by your allowing me to reply to some of the statements contained in Mr. Squier's letter in your issue of the 4th inst.

There is a tone about that letter of self-appreciation and depreciation of some of his brother-ministers which, to say the least of it, is altogether most unbecoming.

Mr. Squier opens his letter by drawing a dolorous picture of the "pain" which my letter must have inflicted on many of your readers.

Well, pain is not always an unmitigated evil, and it may be a blessing if it rouses us out of an indolent indifference. I only trust that the "pain" given to Mr. Squier and others arose from the facts I brought before the notice of your readers, and not from my "indiscretion" in drawing attention to them.

I am the more anxious to reply to Mr. Squier's letter because, if I mistake not, he is a member of the committee of the Board; but as he makes some curious if not startling admissions, I trust he is not writing as their representative. I rather suspect when they read his letter they would be much inclined to exclaim, "Save us from our friends!"

Mr. Squier labours under a mistake in supposing that I was throwing any blame on the committee because four of the ex-students are still without pulpits. If he had read my letter carefully before rushing into print he would have seen that I was objecting to the speakers at the annual meeting laying on the colours too lavishly, and ignoring the fact that there was a dark side to the picture.

It is none of my business to defend the ex-students of the Board from the sneers of Mr. Squier. No doubt if called upon they are quite capable of defending themselves against his attacks. Let me remind him, however, when he speaks in disparaging terms of their "pulpit ability," and of the manner in which they had availed themselves of the advantages placed within their reach, he is casting undeserved reflections on the tutors of the Board. He seems to have overlooked the fact that during the three and four years in which the men I referred to were being prepared for the ministry there were many opportunities in the sermons they had to preach weekly before the principal and missionary tutor of testing whether they possessed any "pulpit ability." Does Mr. Squier really believe if these men had shown any marked want of pulpit ability that the tutors of the Board would not have had the candour and courage to tell them so? If he does, he is grievously mistaken. Then he is as much at sea in supposing the men had not made the most of their advantages. Two of them had done so to the extent of having conferred on them, after examination, the Gaskell and Owen's scholarship.

But the most startling statement in Mr. Squier's letter remains to be noticed. If there was one thing more than another impressed on us by the speeches made at the annual meeting, it was that the more highly cultured our ministers are, the better will they do the work intended for them. The Board was instituted for the training of missionaries, but Mr. Squier, contradicting the speakers at the annual meeting, tells us he knows better, and says many of the men are so highly cultured that they refuse to take mission pulpits! That is certainly a pretty pass to have come to, and well worthy the serious consideration of the subscribers. I believe here, again, that Mr. Squier's information is inaccurate.

What does Mr. Squier mean by the ex-students becoming "ministers at large"? I should say that they had had enough of being "at large" already. He forgets they are not men of means, and that an engagement every Sunday is nearly an absolute necessity for them if they are to live.

Your editorial note to Mr. Squier's letter instead of disproving my thesis "that the supply of ministers is greater than the demand," supports it, inasmuch as the ex-students of the Board who are without congregations are men who have left the Institution recently.

Our Contemporaries.

THE LATE DR. BELLOWES.

The New York Tribune writes:—Beloved as he was by the congregation to which he ministered, the regret at his demise will be more widespread and general. He was eminently a public character, admired and valued by many who never listened to his sacred ministrations. He was much more than the pastor of a church. He took a lively and intelligent interest in most public affairs, and this trait of his character was admirably presented in the large and good work which he accomplished as President of the Sanitary Commission. In private life no man could be more honoured, respected, and beloved. His sweet and generous nature endeared him to all with whom he came in contact. There was no audience which was not glad and ready to listen to his voice; nor was there any cause which he undertook which was not the better for his advocacy.

The New York Times also has an appreciative editorial tribute:—By the death of Dr. H. W. Bellows this city has lost one of its most valued and useful citizens, and the whole country suffers something by his removal. In the swift race which the living run, we do not often pause to admire the excellences of any man. But when one who is useful and valuable to his fellows suddenly falls, we must needs stop and ask, with some anxiety, Who will take up his work? There was no social activity, no movement for the elevation of the poor, friendless, and ignorant, no scheme for the alleviation of the numberless woes of humanity, which did not find in Dr. Bellows an ardent and persuasive champion. His tastes and inclinations were refined and artistic. But his sympathies were with the poor and needy, and he plunged into the rough, hard work of practical philanthropy with a zest that never knew weariness. His pulpit was always abreast of all social and moral reforms, and his religion was that "liberalism" which is intolerant of nothing but oppression, fraud, and wrong. It is not possible that a life so generous, genial, and well-ordered as this life can come to an end among men without leaving among those familiar with it a sense of personal bereavement.

The Christian Register, of Boston, U.S., writes:—In theology he could scarcely be claimed by any party. He was a Churchman by habit and tendency; but he was also a critic and a free thinker. He loved the forms and the phrases of Christian devotion, but he delighted also in scientific thought and philosophic discrimination. He believed in the past, but he had hope for the future. He was not a great theologian. He had no system accurately defined and capable of logical statement. He has left no great work to build his fame upon. He was not a student capable of shutting out the world while he framed a definition which would hold for a century. He lived too near the common life, and was himself too great a part of the best life of the day to have time or power to make his mark as a philosopher. His record is that he was loved, honoured, trusted, and mourned by all who are working to build up the higher life of man in all free and beautiful forms of thought, and in all the practical applications of religion to life as a consolation, a guide, and a mastering influence. He was our friend, our counsellor and inspirer; and, now that he is gone, weightier burdens fall upon us all, because his strong arm is withdrawn, and his cheerful voice is no longer heard.

THE ORIGIN OF ENGLISH UNITARIANISM.

The Athenæum, reviewing a recent book entitled "Des Origines du Christianisme Unitaire chez les Anglais," par G. Bonet-Maury, writes:—

This is an interesting and thoughtful treatise on a somewhat obscure point of ecclesiastical history. The rise of the Unitarians as a distinct English sect is, of course, well known, but long before Priestley wrote, or Essex Street Chapel was founded, there was a good deal of latent Unitarianism in the country. Sometimes it was unconscious, as when Presbyterian congregations found themselves gradually growing indifferent to the ordinary doctrines of orthodoxy. Occasionally it was the speculation of some theologian or philosopher, now put forth tentatively, and now openly avowed. Unitarianism (the word itself is of later date) had its martyrs in the reign of Edward VI. Later on, Milton wrote his great essay "De Doctrinâ Christianâ," and later on, as Voltaire says, "le grand Newton faisait à cette opinion l'honneur de la favoriser." Modern Unitarians, not unwilling perhaps to strengthen an unpopular position by aid of illustrious names, have also professed to include both Falkland and Chillingworth among the early adherents of their faith. The question that M. Bonet-Maury tries to solve is how the seeds of Unitarianism first took root in England. He contends that they did not come from Holland or from Germany (as is commonly supposed), but from Italy, and that the Italians themselves owed them, in part at least, to the teaching of two Spaniards, Valdez and Servetus. However this may be, it is undeniable that the views of the Socini (we are not so sure as to those of Ochino) had considerable influence in England, though we can hardly admit that English Unitarianism "est une conception de quelques Protestants espagnols et italiens, apportée par eux à l'Eglise des Etrangers de Londres, vers le milieu du XVI^e siècle." One curious point connected with the history of Unitarianism is its very local character. Theological critics so different as Dr. Newman and Mr. Morley have remarked that the optimistic rationalism of which Unitarianism is the chief representative seems mainly to flourish at our great commercial centres, and beyond them it takes no real root. In America it is powerful at Boston, influential at New York, and there it almost stops. Only in one part of Europe out of England has the Socinian influence still some organised power, and that is with the Szeklers of Transylvania, where whole village communities are grouped (strangely enough) under one Unitarian episcopate. M. Bonet Maury more than once alludes to some articles on the writings of Ochino and other early foreign heretics by the Rev. Alexander Gordon, of Belfast. We have a strong impression that these articles are worth reprinting, and, at any rate, this branch of the history of theological thought deserves more attention than it has yet received.

AN ENGLISH PREACHER OF NIRVANA.

The Spectator, under this heading, writes:—The volume of papers by the late Mr. Hinton, which Miss Caroline Hadden has given to the public, is at once very interesting and very bewildering reading. One feels as if one were reading a translation from the writings of some Oriental Buddhist, instead of the thoughts of a great English aurist; and yet here and there the physiological training of Mr. Hinton crops out in the most curious metaphors and sayings—metaphors and sayings which are as alien to the Oriental mysticism which so deeply pervades the book as the bustle of a Western railway is to the dreams of a Yogi, or the rapture of an Indian seer in search of "the pure goal of being," such as was present to Matthew Arnold's mind when he said that such a one—

"Pondering God's mysteries untold,
And tranquil as the glacier-snows,
He by those Indian mountains old Might well repose."

When Mr. Hinton suddenly interrupts a dream of Being without personality, all the richer, he thinks, as Being, for its deficiency in personality, to tell us that "evil is the nutrition," and "the holy acts we thus get power to do" are "the functions" of the spiritual life, we are almost as much startled as we should be by hearing the whirr of the wheels of a cotton mill in the Great Desert, or by coming on an electric telegraph office among the snows of the Hindoo Koosh. Yet, no doubt, part of the attraction of Mr. Hinton's writings is this strange mixture of the fruits of a strict physiological training with the raptures of a mystic of no common enthusiasm. Mr. Hinton sometimes writes as if he had been granted the incommunicable vision of the Godhead itself, and speaks with a fervour and a reality rare even to the seer. At other times, again, he speaks like a modern man of science, of what you might term even the extreme rationalistic kind; and again, he mingles very closely and very strangely the forms of thought of both these very different schools. Indeed, in his denunciations of personality, he probably speaks for both schools at once, and hence the fervour and conviction of this part of his book. He denounces personality in the name of all true Being. He denounces it as the negation of true Being. He denounces it as the antagonist of all true science. He denounces it with his heart and head alike. He denounces all that is involved in it, for example, the belief in personal immortality; and he declares that "the desire of personal immortality is not truly a noble or worthy attitude of humanity."

It is almost as difficult to make out as it is in the case of the Buddhist Nirvana, whether Mr. Hinton really hoped to see all personal existence extinguished at death, or whether he really meant, by personal existence, nothing but selfish existence. Yet even if he meant the latter, it is very difficult to understand why he, a spiritualist, held the mere extinction of the body to be the dissolution of selfishness, which is not a function of the body; while if he meant the former, it is impossible to guess what he meant by the eternal life which he regarded man as enjoying with God. If, as he thought, personal existence is a mere negation, mere limitation of existence, if impersonal existence is something higher and larger and deeper than personal existence, then the cessation of personal existence is not a cessation of love, or joy, or peace, or self-sacrifice, but only the indefinite expansion of all these into infinite and eternal dimensions. But how there is to be love and joy and peace and self-sacrifice without anyone to love, or rejoice, or feel peace, or sacrifice himself, is so utterly beyond our comprehension that we could as easily understand what addition meant without quantities to be added, or multiplication without factors to be multiplied. The fact is, that Mr. Hinton, who adopted all the spiritual teaching of Christianity with a fervour which makes even his most mystical philosophy attractive, fell into the intellectual trap of supposing that by diminishing indefinitely the reflex character of self-regard you must at last reach the extinction of any self to regard. The truth is, that though regard of any kind does not necessarily imply self-regard, it does imply a self-capable of regarding others and of being regarded by others; and that if you extinguish the regarnder, you extinguish with it the regard. There are few pages of Mr. Hinton's from which we may not learn something; but there are also few in which we do not note that the mystical nature of the man led him to confuse between the result of diminishing the circle of moral egotism to a point, and the result of suppressing the ego altogether even as a point,—in other words, suppressing the radiating centre of trust and of adoration.

THE AMERICAN UNITARIAN YEAR-BOOK FOR 1882.

Chicago Unity, in an article on this book, protests against some significant exclusions:—

The well-known names of Dr. C. A. Bartol, of Boston; John H. Clifford, of Andover; W. C. Gannett, of St. Paul; Samuel Longfellow, of Germantown; George C. Miln, of Chicago, and W. J. Potter, of New Bedford, are missed from this list, for theological and ecclesiastical reasons, against which we wish here, and on all other proper occasions, to enter our earnest protest. Any principle that includes Dr. Hedge, and excludes Dr. Bartol; that counts in Connor, and counts out Gannett; that has a place for C. G. Ames, and none for his congenial neighbour, Samuel Longfellow; that has use for Savage, but none for Potter; that recognises Slicer, but not his friend Miln, is, on the face of it, arbitrary and unjust. To our mind, any attempt to go back of the principle of Independent Congregationalism, upon which is based the entire Unitarian movement in America,—to inquire, either directly or indirectly, into the theology of a minister which any society belonging to the Unitarian fellowship has seen fit to employ, before registering his name,—is to assume an ecclesiastical authority foreign to the spirit and the letter of Unitarianism. Some of these brethren may prefer to have their names omitted from a list compiled on a partial basis, as we would; but so some men might wish to have their names left out of the city directory, or their farms left out of the county map, but it is the province of the statistician simply to take the census as it is. This is the only rule that should guide the compiler of an Unitarian Year-Book; and until the American Unitarian Association recognise their limitation in this direction in the compilation of their annual, said annual will so far misrepresent the Unitarian movement. Unity extends its right hand of fellowship to the excluded six. Your names are promptly entered upon our Year-Book; and on behalf of the recorded four hundred and three, we respectfully ask you not to exclude us from your more truly Unitarian fellowship.

ULTRAMONTANISM.

M. de Pressensé, in an interesting letter to the Christian World this week, writes:—

It is deeply to be regretted that such a scandal as this failure of the "Union Générale" should have arisen when religion has enough to suffer from the virulence of contemporary scepticism. If we try to trace back so disreputable a state of things to its moral causes, we do not hesitate to say that the debasing superstitions of Ultramontanism have much to answer for. Religion is divested by such teaching of all that is really holy and purifying. God is represented as exercising a sort of magic power which men may turn to their own advantage by means of such incantations as are practised at Lourdes and La Salette. He is a fetish to be worshipped with rites as senseless as those of the heathen. Conscience is stifled by such practices. Devotees have recourse to the Virgin Mary for health, as the Greeks sought it from Esculapius. Why, then, may not the Exchange be made a fountain of miraculous good to those who have received the blessing of the Holy Father? Will not the end justify the means? Are not the Ultramontane clergy found ready to receive gratefully the accursed gold won at the gambling tables of Monaco, in order to found with it charitable institutions? When the proprietress of this haunt of iniquity died, gorged with money which was the price of blood, did not the Church lavish upon her its funeral pomp, while the journals which delight to see elegant vice linked with devotion waxed eloquent and unctuous over her obituary? Figaro was the Bossuet of this princess of the gaming-table. Can we wonder that while such things are done religion becomes to many an object of scorn and repulsion?

THE BRADLAUGH CASE.

The Pall Mall Gazette writes:—Mr. Labouchère's motion for a new writ for Northampton was rejected by Mr. Bradlaugh's opponents on Monday night; but, thanks to the very tactics which so inflamed the House, the same majority which on Monday refused a new writ was yesterday induced to issue it without a division. Mr. Bradlaugh has thus gained his immediate point, but at a cost to the dignity and reputation of the House of Commons on which we do not care to dwell. For that damage to its credit the House has only itself to thank. It is easy to denounce Mr. Bradlaugh; and there are only too many who, lending a ready ear to the counsels of cowardice, seek to clear themselves from the social unpopularity attaching to their support of the principle that he represents by denouncing in unmeasured language the steps by which he has attempted to vindicate it. His tactics may have been all that these persons say they were; but it should not be forgotten that they were adopted by him—whether with decorum and self-respect or not, we do not ask—not in order to insult the House or to defy its authority, but to vindicate the law and to execute the mandate of his constituents, which the House had illegally over-ridden. Mr. Bradlaugh may have acted profanely, vulgarly, rudely, if you please, but since his last election he has kept himself within the limits of the law, and that is more than can be said for the majority of the House of Commons. To break the law is a greater offence than to violate the canons of good taste or even the unwritten law of society; and, when the latter offences are committed in resisting a breach of the law, the law-breakers must not expect too much sympathy when complaining of the objectionable consequences of their own act.

It is difficult to discover, in the whole of the long and melancholy record of the struggle which culminated in the decision to expel Mr. Bradlaugh without even allowing him that hearing in his own defence which was accorded to Wilkes, a single incident which reflects credit upon the House of Commons. From the Speaker to Mr. Bradlaugh the contest has discredited all who took part in it, and most of all those weak and wavering members of the Liberal party who have allowed themselves to be made the tools of an unscrupulous faction, in order to gratify a social prejudice by sacrificing the principle of religious liberty. It is a humiliating revelation of the shallowness of much that goes by the name of Liberalism nowadays to find that so many members who sit on the Ministerial benches should have been tried and found wanting when subjected to so simple a test as the imposition of a new religious disability on an unpopular member of Parliament.

The Times says:—There is, we have often urged, but one remedy for this humiliating condition of affairs; namely, to pass a short Act enabling any member to affirm instead of swearing, at his option. After all that has passed we cannot think that such an Act would meet with any serious opposition in either House. It must be tolerably clear to everyone by this time that the oath is not intended to test a man's religious opinions, but simply to give some kind of solemn assurance that he will be faithful to the trust reposed in him. It is also clear that even from this point of view the practical utility either of oath or affirmation is exceedingly small. No Court of Law in this country would undertake to decide the abstract and metaphysical question whether a given action is so far inconsistent with either as to deserve punishment. It would inquire whether the action is, in fact, an infringement of some concrete law, and would punish in case of guilt according to the law infringed.

The Daily Chronicle has no sympathy whatever with Mr. Bradlaugh's theological views, but it cannot help feeling that in him a vital principle of the Constitution has just been violated. The exclusion of a member from the House of Commons because of his heterodoxy appears an absolute anachronism. We seem to be taken back to the days of the Test Act. The freedom we had supposed to exist was mythical. Experience has proved religious belief is not an essential qualification, but it is essential that the want of that belief should not be proclaimed. This is really the outcome of all the wrangling that has taken place over the representation of Northampton. The rights of constituencies are invaded. Sir Stafford Northcote and his followers have made Mr. Bradlaugh the representative of a principle which the country cannot afford to abandon.

The Liverpool Post (L.) says:—Mr. Bradlaugh has in part been forced into this position by the recalcitrant and abstaining Liberals, of whose conduct, whether dictated by real religious prejudice or mean fear of their constituents, it is impossible to speak in terms of reprobation and contempt too strong. But we cannot help thinking that it was the duty of the Government to have attempted before now to settle this question by the passage of a Bill which should have set this and all similar questions at rest for ever. The sooner they set about it in earnest now the better.

The Leeds Mercury (L.) says:—Treatment more outrageously unjust it is difficult to conceive. Whatever may have been the personal defects of Mr. Bradlaugh, it is impossible not to feel some sympathy for him when we think of the unfairness of which he has been a victim, of the mingled cowardice, malignity, and imbecility of the treatment accorded to him by the majority of the House. Nor does it make matters better, but rather infinitely worse, that this cruel and unjust behaviour on the part of the majority professes to be founded upon their reverence for Christianity, their desire to do honour to One whose whole Gospel is a protest against the treatment even of the greatest of His enemies with cruelty or injustice.

The Newcastle Chronicle considers Mr. Gladstone's defence of the consistency of his attitude from the beginning of the Bradlaugh difficulty quite unavailable. In the interests of truth and liberty it regrets that Mr. Bradlaugh did not follow the example of those Quakers, Catholics, and Jews who won regard by refusing to swear, and who, by their patience, perseverance, and dignified demeanour gained victory for their respective faiths and succeeded in removing from the statute book what was insulting alike to religion and common sense.

"A.K.H.B." AT ST. ANDREWS.

(From The World.)

"Grand place, St. Andrews!" once upon a time said Thomas Carlyle. "You have the essence of all the antiquity of Scotland in good and clean condition." And "Grand place, St. Andrews!" echoes almost every visitor to the quaint old-fashioned city, lying in its isolated picturesqueness in a remote eastern corner of "the kingdom" of Fife. It is famous for many things—the grey glories and the historic association of its ruins of ancient Norman tower, cathedral, and castle; its sunset splendours; the blue waters of its dangerous bay; its yellow sands; its splendid "links," where go the golfers in their coats of scarlet and their buttons of yellow brass; its eminent, if somewhat poverty-stricken, professors; its red-gowned students; its rosy damsels, from whose pleasant ranks many an Englishman has carried away a wife. The seat of the most ancient university in Scotland, many distinguished men have been connected with it in times past, and not a few in times present; men who have won distinction in every field of the thoroughly cultivated, if somewhat limited, range of academic study. But it is not to inquire if any of these are "at home" that now and again there comes a telegram to the stationer's shop, which does duty as a post-office, from some wandering American or peripatetic Englishman. The inquiry is "concerning" one who has made that phrase "concerning" famous, and the wished-for answer tells that his parish minister, the Rev. Dr. Boyd, better-known elsewhere as "A.K.H.B.," or "The Country Parson," is at home, and is to preach on Sunday. And if you happen to be near that post-office, in the principal street of the city—one that reminds English university men of the High-street of Oxford; a broad spacious street, on either side of which young trees are fighting for life with the rigours of the climate and the strength of the east wind—you may, about two o'clock in the afternoon, see a very ecclesiastical-looking personage, very carefully dressed, very trim and tidy, and, despite the "middle age" from which he has taught us such charming lessons, very fresh and active-looking, engaged in posting his own letters, a duty which he is reluctant to entrust to another. He has written somewhere that, "He who posts his own letters is possibly a good man, but certainly a wise one."

The English mail is, perhaps, just going off, and many people are engaged in a similar occupation, with some of whom, including common folk and the children going to school, he converses. Then, perhaps, with a "Good-bye, my good little girl," to some little lassie, he goes off upon his afternoon's round of calls, his forenoon having been spent at his desk. He has the names of the people he has to visit carefully written on a long slip of paper; and, with the method that characterises his minutest work, he marks them off as one by one he overtakes them. They are the ordinary visits of a parish minister (and the Church of Scotland has no more conscientious pastor than Dr. Boyd)—a bedridden woman, a consumptive lad, a sick child; a word of encouragement here, of comfort there; and right welcome he is wherever he goes. The last visit will probably find him near the links and the sands, on either of which he will take a meditative stroll, or be joined by his wife and only daughter, or by some friend. It may be a wintry afternoon, and the sunset, which has dyed the sea in lovely colours, and made the old ruins stand out in beautiful outlines, is over. The pink glory is going out of the atmosphere, and the night sets in wan and chill. He turns in to the pleasant little club house, which in old days used to be called "the Parlour," where he will read the newspapers for an hour, or wander into the large room where the golfers are refreshing themselves after the labours of the day, in search of some one he wishes to see, and whom he will, perhaps, find draining a tumbler of gin-and-gingerbeer, pre-eminently a golfer's drink, or lighting a cigar, or sitting down for an early rubber. Then in the darkness he will betake himself home, and, after indulging in a tumbler of milk which is always waiting for him in his library, he will rest for half an hour before dinner. His library or study is a large handsome room, with a great number of well-bound books in carefully dusted cases all round the walls. Among these no fewer than twenty volumes in crown octavo, and varied colours, are from his own pen, and tell of his untiring industry.

If you remain to dine with him you will be sure not only of a very good dinner, but also of a very hearty welcome; and a stranger will soon discover that he is in company with one of the best and brightest of talkers: full of information on all sorts of subjects, given to apt allusion and pat quotation, fond of a good story, which he tells in his own peculiarly effective manner; and if it is at the expense of a neighbour, no mortal can detect any maliciousness in the smile with which it is accompanied, and which shows that he likes the man he is laughing at, or calling by some fantastic and queer nickname. Dr. Boyd's flow of talk is unlimited, and one sees no reason why, like his writing, it should not go on for ever. He will take you back to old days, and tell you stories of the country gentlemen and the Scotch ministers, and the strange customs in covenanted Ayrshire, where he spent his boyhood; and how "awfully touching" were the "open-air services on Communion Sunday evenings under the blue dome of sky, under the setting sun of July, the air sweet with the fragrance of the clover, borne in by the warm summer breeze; the mossy headstones and the little swelling graves; and then the great psalm rising up to Christ in strains never to be exceeded—at least, to a Scottish ear and heart—anywhere in all this world." He will also talk of his undergraduate student days at Glasgow University, and tell stories of "Logic Bob" and some of the other professors, and, among the students, of the man who beat Tait (Archbishop of Canterbury), and will add, as he thinks of the differences of the two fates, "Yet Tait, beaten at Glasgow, has done fairly well elsewhere." He will tell you of the time he spent at King's College School, and of how, towards the end of 1841, he was entered a member of the Middle Temple, and read law hard, attending the courts at Westminster Hall and Guildhall, and saw and heard all the great barristers and judges of that time, about whom he is so fond of writing pleasantly to this day. He will tell you of his time at King's College, when Lonsdale, afterwards Bishop of Lichfield, was principal, and how he studied under Maurice, Browne (Archdeacon of Wells), Brewer (Rolls), and other less remarkable people; of how, during the four years of his London life, he resided with a wealthy uncle, who intended that he should go to Oxford and take his degree before being called to the English Bar; and you can learn how vexed his uncle was when he threw up his fine prospects, and in the summer of 1844 resolved to study for the Scotch Church, and thus made what he now, we fancy, considers the great mistake of his life. His uncle, no doubt, thought his resolve very quixotic and suicidal; but young Boyd had a romantic idea of serving the Church of his country, of which his father was an honoured minister. And no doubt that Church sorely needed such as he. So he left London, its pleasures, and its studies, and went to the Divinity Hall at Glasgow, and in due course, after three winter terms, was "licensed" to preach the gospel by his father's presbytery. He began his clerical career as "assistant minister" in the most fashionable church in Edinburgh; and no doubt some of his sermons would be distinguished by the extravagancies of youth. His "Bishop," as Scotch assistants—Anglicæ curates—call the minister under whom they serve, was wont to recall some of the remarkable things he said and did; but "A.K.H.B.," always equal to the occasion, has been heard to retaliate that he, at any rate, remembered not one single word that good man ever said, though he heard him preach very frequently. His first charge was Newton-on-Ayr, a village which has had quite an apostolical succession of the best men of the Scotch Church. His second parish was a beautiful country living in Dumfriesshire, with which the readers of his "Recreations" were to become so soon familiar. It is a beautiful district of the country—fine hills and rocks; two beautiful rivers; deeply wooded, too, with such trees as are seldom seen in Scotland. Carlyle, going from Dumfries to Craigenputtock, always used to drive through it, and has been heard to talk warmly of the loveliness of its scenery. In February, 1856, he began his life-long connection with Fraser, in the series of essays which made the initials of "A.K.H.B." famous on both continents, and won him so many literary friendships, which he cherishes so warmly—Arthur Helps, Charles Kingsley, James Anthony Froude, and Archbishop Whately, among others. Going up to town on an occasional holiday he made the acquaintance of many interesting men and women at the Parkers' and the Longmans'. Much of the success of these charming essays, these reflections on many subjects, these notices of men and books, strung together with a pleasant personal thread of narrative and meditation, he attributes to the fact that he was a Scotch parson, and at the same time very familiar with London and all the surroundings of English law; essays which you cannot read without admiring the talent and loving the kindly heart of the writer, and which have found their way into the most outlandish corners of the world, as travellers in remote places testify.

The well beloved Country Parson became, in 1859, the popular minister of St. Bernard's, Edinburgh; and the excellent portrait in oil that hangs in the dining-room at 7, Abbotsford-crescent, St. Andrews, is the gift of an attached congregation, when Dr. Boyd left Edinburgh to become first minister of that city—one of the prizes, such as they are, that the Church of Scotland has for her distinguished sons. In St. Andrews there are two churches in the one parish, and two ministers; each minister officiating alternately once every Sunday in each of them, to queerly mixed congregations of learned professors and red-gowned students, of ordinary residents and of fashionable summer visitors, and working people from both town and country. The parish church has historical associations which delight Dr. Boyd; for here men and women of diverse faiths have worshipped for fifteen generations, and here the great John Knox thundered in Reformation days. Long ago it has been all that even its minister would have his church to be; and it is one of his dreams that it may some day be restored to its pristine ecclesiastical proportions. Meantime it is chiefly remarkable for its ugliness and vastness. Here Dr. Boyd "preaches"—for that is how all public worship is spoken of in Scotland—and conducts, once each Sunday, divine service according to the bald forms of the Scottish Kirk. But he makes no secret of the fact that he is much more at home in the other church, the Church of St. Mary, in which he has been able to get the service what the worship of the national Church of Scotland is becoming, in all new churches which have a minister of some taste and culture, and congregations who have got beyond the idea that everything connected with divine service should be as ugly and repulsive as possible. Here the people sing the Te Deum and the Magnificat, and go in for chanted prose psalms and anthems, led by a good choir and a harmonium nicely played. Here he reads his prayers, the congregation responding with an Amen, and audibly joining in the Lord's Prayer, and standing at the ascription of praise after the sermon; all very commonplace pieces of ritual for the English reader, but terribly advanced for the Scotch Kirk; so much so that the service has been called a "Poppish pantomime or panorama," and Dr. Boyd likened to the "Popp" of Rome, and said to be in close alliance with the Scarlet Lady. Here he has a pretty pulpit and a fair reredos, an altar-table and a lectern, from which in summer a popular baronet, and in winter the students of divinity, read the Lessons. And here it is a real pleasure even for the Anglican to worship on lovely summer evenings, and to hear one of those beautiful and touching sermons, of the nature of which all readers of the "Graver Thoughts of a Country Parson," "Counsel and Comfort from a City Pulpit," "Sunday Afternoons in a University City," and other volumes, are familiar. And the worshipper is doubly fortunate if, when service is over, he has access to the vestry, and can accompany the preacher on a visit to the ruins of the cathedral, and hear him tell its story; and as he talks you find that, though a Scotchman, he knows and loves the English cathedrals as few people do, even among the English clergy: or in a quiet stroll upon the soft, green, elastic turf of the links, or the hard yellow sands, upon which the blue, white-crested waves are breaking in pleasant music; watch with him the old bleached bones of the once famous cathedral city gleam in the setting sunlight; and bid him a fond and lingering "Good-night" as the summer darkness falls, and the stars come out for their short vigil. And as he goes home in solitude he thinks that St. Andrews would not be the same place and Sunday not have the same charm were "A.K.H.B." not there; and if the national Church is at all dear to him, he will not be sorry that Dr. Boyd made a mistake forty years ago, and is not at this moment a great legal luminary, or a distinguished prelate of the sister Church of England.

MRS. C. W. PEACH.—We regret to record the death of Mrs. Jemima Mabson Peach, the devoted wife of Charles W. Peach, the distinguished naturalist and geologist, at 30, Haddington-place, Leith-walk, Edinburgh, on the 13th inst., in her eightieth year. She was interred in the Rosebank Cemetery on Thursday week, in the presence of a large number of sincere friends, including some whose names are of deserved eminence in science and literature. The Rev. R. B. Drummond officiated with admirable taste. She had been married to our co-religionist for fifty-three years, and was endeared to a numerous circle. To her more immediate friends her loss is irreparable. In 1844 Sir Robert Peel granted to her a small pension out of the Queen's Bounty.

THE PERSECUTION OF THE JEWS IN RUSSIA.—Saturday last was observed in all the synagogues in London as a day of special prayer for the Jews of Russia, under the direction of the venerable Chief Rabbi. At the West London Synagogue, Upper Berkeley-street, the Rev. Professor Marks preached on the tenth verse of the second chapter of Malachi—"Have we not all one Father; hath not one God created us?" The rev. professor said whilst in Russia this text was a powerful condemnation of the want of fraternity on the part of Russian Christians towards Russian Jews, in England it was a calumny on Judaism to say of it that it was anti-social. This, however, was only asserted by one or two individuals, whereas the mass of Englishmen of every denomination and party had in the last few weeks proved that they recognised the true fraternity between Jews and Christians. The preacher regarded the noble expressions of sympathy throughout England, and the manifestations of goodwill between people of different sects, as the one great good which had come out of the terrible evil of the disasters abroad. These things had brought men together in the light of the common fatherhood of God. He made an earnest appeal for the Mansion House Fund. At the close of the sermon Professor Marks read the prayer which the Chief Rabbi had sent to him, a copy of which was in the hands of all the worshippers.

Religious Intelligence.

HACKNEY.—Mrs. Bateman (widow of Dr. Bateman, for many years a member of the congregation) has presented to the New Gravel-pit Church an organ now in course of construction by Messrs. Booth and Hepworth, of Otley. The organ is to be opened about the end of March.

BIRMINGHAM.—It is stated that the Rev. Dr. Collier's health is fully restored, and that he intends to return to his pulpit about the end of March, President Arthur having accepted his resignation of the office he holds at Leipzig.

HULL.—On Wednesday evening, the 15th inst., the Rev. J. R. Boyle, of the New Jerusalem Church, lectured in Park-street Church School-room, on "Lancashire Life, Tradition, and Character." The lecture was a very interesting one, and was thoroughly appreciated by a good audience. On the motion of Mr. Maxwell, seconded by Mr. J. Wilkinson, a hearty vote of thanks was given to the lecturer. The Rev. J. M. Dixon occupied the chair.

ROCHDALE.—The lecture on Sunday week, on "The Devil and the Devil Killer," at Blackwater-street Unitarian Church, drew an overflowing congregation, the church being again packed to its utmost capacity, many standing outside during the service, while some two to three hundred left, unable to gain admittance. Mr. Carter, to meet the wish of these, repeated the lecture last Sunday evening, when the church was again filled. Brisk and well-sustained discussion followed the service each evening between Mr. Carter and his hearers, most of the congregation remaining to the end.

TAMWORTH.—On Monday evening a meeting of the members and attendants of the Unitarian Chapel was held in the Town Hall, kindly lent for the occasion by the Mayor of Tamworth, when one hundred and sixty-seven persons sat down to a very plentiful repast. The trays were given by various members of the congregation, in order that all connected with the chapel might be invited to spend a pleasant evening, free of expense. The room was decorated with flags, flowers, trees, &c., and at one end there was a large platform, screened from the other part of the room with draped curtains, making a kind of stage, on which the teachers and children of the school performed a kind of charade, written by the Rev. John Taylor, of Horsham. A band was in attendance, and played several selections during the evening, and the Glee Club sang several choice selections of music. Mr. S. Spruce presided, and expressed his pleasure at seeing such a number of friends at the meeting.—Mr. Birks (the pastor) gave a brief sketch of the working of the congregation for the past three years, at the beginning of which period he came to Tamworth to endeavour to resuscitate the cause, observing with what satisfaction the congregation could review their present condition. During the past three years between sixty and seventy sittings had been taken, about forty families joining the chapel; and to show that the work was still continuing, he stated that during the past fortnight more sittings at the chapel had been held than during any month since the congregation had been revived.—Mr. Lakin, who had been connected with the congregation for nearly half a century, said it would have been impossible for any of their members some fifteen or twenty years ago to have had such a meeting as they had had that night, in connection with the little chapel on Colehill, and that if a tea meeting had been held, a very small room indeed would have been large enough to have held all the members of the congregation. He rejoiced in their present prosperity, and said that his attachment to that place of worship was entirely through his attachment to the truth, and whether the chapel was crowded or whether there were only a few present he always felt it his duty to attend worship, and he was delighted to be there. He spoke of the very able and efficient way in which their services were conducted, Sunday after Sunday, by their minister, and said he should be surprised, indeed, if anyone went to a few of their services without wishing to remain with them. At the conclusion of the meeting votes of thanks were passed to the Mayor for the use of the hall, to those who gave the trays or had taken part in the charade, and to the band and choir. Also a vote of thanks to the pastor (the Rev. Mr. Birks) for suggesting and helping to carry out the arrangements for that evening's enjoyment.

BOLTON.—WELCOME OF THE REV. G. W. BANNISTER. —A public meeting were held on Wednesday evening, February 8, in the Free Christian Church, for the purpose of according a welcome to the Rev.

G. W. Bannister, who has recently settled in Bolton, as minister of the congregation. Mr. F. Taylor presided, and was supported by the Revs. G. W. Bannister, T. Mackereth, F.R.A.S., &c. (New Jerusalem Church), J. Bevan (Commission-street), and S. Farrington (Manchester), Councillors Bromley and Brimelow, and Mr. James Grundy. The last named gentleman reads letters of apology for non-attendance from Mr. J. P. Thomasson, M.P. (who was sorry he could not be present owing to duties in London), Mrs. Winkworth, and the Revs. R. Best, C. C. Coe, C. A. Berry, J. E. Clayton, Joseph Freeston, George Ingman, and S. A. Steinthal. The Chairman, in an appropriate speech, welcomed Mr. and Mrs. Bannister on behalf of the congregation. Free Christianity, he said, was Liberal Christianity, and though there were little differences in the names of organisations, he considered they were battalions engaged in the same warfare, fighting under the same leader in the battle against ignorance and vice, to spread righteousness and peace, and to help on the coming of God's kingdom upon earth. Additional interest attached to the proceeding of that evening inasmuch as they were welcoming Mr. Bannister to his first ministerial labours in a Free Christian Church. He hoped the rev. gentleman would bring with him much of the religious zeal and piety of the church to which he formerly belonged. The meeting was also addressed by the Revs. S. Farrington, T. Mackereth, and J. Bevan, and by Mr. Councillor Brimelow. Mr. Bannister, after thanking those who had assisted him since he entered on his ministry at the Free Christian Church, and the speakers for their kind expressions of goodwill, said he found, and had been told, the place was looked upon with a good deal of suspicion by people belonging to other denominations, and when he remembered how he had been occupied in another town, and the pleasing and highly-beneficial relations in which he stood to ministers of all denominations, he felt like a saint placed on the top of a pillar, and cut off from a society that would be very congenial to him. They at that church were a society of people who, simply did not hold out any theological plan, they merely left the matter of theological opinion to the individual instead of taking to themselves any special name; and this, it seemed to him, was the only thing that divided them from other denominations. They were endeavouring to make for a higher life, to do something for their fellow-men, to lighten their minds, to sympathise with them in their sorrows, and to elevate them, never forgetting Him who was the perfect life, the perfect light, the perfect love. As the minister of that place he must be allowed to utter all he thought from that platform. He claimed the most perfect liberty of speech. Let outsiders know that his people did not at all bind themselves to receive all he said, indeed they distinctly refused to be responsible for the opinions he expressed. The utterances of the minister for the time being must not, therefore, be taken as giving any theological colour to that place. If that church ceased to benefit by his ministry he would be prepared to go, and the people there would be free to select a man who was an Independent, a Unitarian, or a Baptist minister, or even a Roman Catholic priest—(laughter)—if their free inquiry into truth should lead them into that direction. The meeting was brought to a close with the usual vote of thanks.

THE LIBERAL SOCIAL UNION held its monthly meeting on Thursday evening at the rooms of the Society of British Artists, Suffolk-street, Pall Mall. The chair was taken by Mr. W. H. Domville, and an admirable address was delivered by the Right Hon. Sir Arthur Hobhouse, K.C.S.I., on "The Local Government of London." A discussion followed in which the following, among others, took part:—Messrs. Leriche, Reed, Jennings, Lyon, Beal, and Broomhead. Sir Arthur Hobhouse replied, and the proceedings were brought to a close in the usual way. The preponderant feeling was in favour of the essayist's views advocating municipal reform, and the creation of one great municipality representing the whole metropolis.

THE LONDON SCHOOL BOARD at their weekly meeting on Thursday discussed, for the second time, the question of higher elementary education, and the debate was again adjourned without any vote being taken. The precepts for the education rate were presented and agreed to. A petition to the House of Commons as to the funds of the City Charities and the utilisation of some portion of them for elementary education purposes was adopted.

HENRY WHITNEY BELLOWES.

A BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

BY THE REV. DR. E. E. HALE.

Dr. Bellows was born in Boston, June 11, 1814. He was one of twins. His twin brother died at the age of twenty-three. His father was one of the active and successful merchants of Boston, greatly interested in the establishment of the new Municipal Government in 1821, and one of the aldermen with Mayor Quincy. His business was large and his circumstances comfortable, and his large family were all carefully educated. When only seven years old Dr. Bellows was sent to the well-known boarding school at Jamaica Plain, kept by Mr. Jacob Knapp, the father of the Rev. Frederic N. Knapp. His ninth year was passed at Walpole, N.H., where he made his first acquaintance with the real country. At ten he was sent with his twin brother to Round Hill School, where he spent four years under Bancroft and Cogswell. He was fitted for Harvard at thirteen, entered at fourteen, in 1828, and graduated in 1832. He was delicate in his youth, the twin brother having all the vigour, muscularity, and gaiety of the two. He was indisposed to boys' sports, shy, timid, small for his age, extremely sensitive to pain, and—as he says of himself in a note from which I take these memoranda—rather dreamy and solitary and homesick at school and in college, whither his twin brother did not go, so that he felt his loneliness the more. Even then, as I know from the best authority, the sensitive boy showed supreme tenderness of conscience, and the aim "to be good" was his characteristic. This was so marked that in his early life his father, an experienced man of affairs, singled him out as a boy, and afterwards as a young man, who could be relied upon.

Dr. Bellows used to say that he was too well fitted for college. He had gone through the Freshman studies when he entered, though he was only fourteen years old. The time which he did not spend in study he did spend with his gun and fishing-rod; and the world may have gained in the strength and spirit he drew in from the open air and nature what he thought he lost in application in college. Professor Nuttall, now mostly remembered as an ornithologist, was then the professor of natural history. He made a pet of the boy, and had him much in his company. I have heard Dr. Bellows tell of the efforts he made to obtain a king-fisher for Nuttall, and of the difficulty of shooting that very shy bird. Dr. John Farrar and Mrs. Farrar were other early friends. In this sensible training his health and strength improved. He began to grow fast, and, with vigour and vitality, to take a real interest in study. In the last two years of his college life he grew to be as tall as he ever was; and he took a fair position in college. Dear Edward Channing, as we oldsters love to call him, took an interest in the boy, and was as much concerned about his English style as if he had been his son. To him Dr. Bellows always felt greatly indebted. He had a few close friends, among whom he would afterward name Charles Mason (the Episcopal clergyman afterward), W. C. Appleton, William Silsbee, Charles T. Brooks, and Samuel Osgood. His Mentor, he says in the note I have alluded to, was John W. Huntington, elder brother of Bishop Huntington, his chum for ten years, a very religious man, "and very judicious in leading me in a Christian way." Bellows joined a religious club in his junior year; and an earnest and helpful club it was, he says. He united with the "College Church," under Henry Ware, and became profoundly interested in personal religion, as he was to the last moment of his life.

When he was only seven years old he had resolved to become a minister; and he had the anxieties about religious experience which, in one form or other, come into almost every young life. Speaking of these anxieties in one of his own writings, he says:—"I conquered these by a habit of prayer, which I formed with a great difficulty and obstinate persistence, led to it by reading the autobiographies of the saints,—Brainerd among others,—and by gradually acquiring a sense of God which set aside the childish images of a form, and put me into the possession of my spiritual senses. I can recall the day and hour when I first felt a reliance upon the witness of his Spirit with my spirit. It is like my memory of the first time I trusted the buoyancy of the water, and, after two years of being in it without faith, suddenly found it, and so could swim."

John Bellows, the elder brother of Henry, was engaged in keeping a school for girls at Coopers-town, on Otsego Lake in New York, at the time when the younger brother graduated. Here Henry

Bellows joined him, and he spent a year in that lovely village, celebrated for the refinement of its society and the beauty of its women. His earliest literary work in print would probably be found in some file of the Otsego Republican. He taught French, German, Italian, Latin, Greek, and Mathematics, and delivered lectures to the school-girls,—all at the age of eighteen. It may be imagined that he had a "good time." After a year of such an Arcadia he entered the Divinity School at Cambridge, but left it again that he might go to Louisiana to be the tutor of a young gentleman named Baldwin, the heir of a large landed property there. The journey and the offer of a handsome salary were a temptation,—for his father, in commercial reverses, had lost his wealth, though not a competency,—and Henry Bellows chose to earn his own livelihood and pay his own charges, when he should study for his profession. A year spent in Louisiana, with the care of a single pupil and the free use of an admirable library, was probably as good a year's training for useful service as a man could have. He returned to Cambridge in 1835, and completed the course of the Divinity School. He supported himself and bore the school expenses by taking pupils, having six boys in his room all the morning, and revenging himself on his studies half the night. The school was in good force at that time. The two Wares, father and son, and Dr. Palfrey were the teachers. Among Mr. Bellows's classmates were the poet Sears, Rufus Stebbins, since President of Meadville, Thatcher and Warland, Theodore Parker was in the school in the class which graduated in 1836.

In 1837 Mr. Bellows graduated, and was induced to go to Mobile, Ala., by the Rev. Ephraim Peabody, to take charge of a congregation he had gathered. He was not ordained, and went as an evangelist. He preached on the way in all the capitals, Richmond, Columbia, Murfreesborough, &c., with some curious experiences, usually in the State Capitol building. He flashed his maiden sword at Mobile, and seems to have acquired confidence by success. He was urged to stay, and was offered a salary of 3,000 dollars; but the awful shadow of slavery frightened him away. He felt alarmed at the mitigation of his horror of slavery under the actual experience of many of its good features. He wished to preserve his New England hostility to it, and he fled.

Returning to Boston after that invaluable first year in the profession, spent in such varied fields, he was warmly urged to take the charge of the First Congregational Church in New York, which was the first Unitarian church there. The position could hardly be called attractive. The meeting-house was down-town in Chambers-street, but the up-town hegira of New York had begun. Dr. Dewey was minister of the Second Church, and it need not be said that whoever could go to hear him went. The first society was weak and divided. Its first minister, William Ware,—who has earned so honourable a place among American authors—had resigned a year before. Dr. Follen had occupied the pulpit in the mean while.

Mr. Bellows's settlement at New York has proved to be a very important event for the Unitarian Church of America. He had never been a candidate for any pulpit. A minister was needed for the First Congregational Church; and Dr. Channing, Dr. Ware, Dr. Walker, were all urgent that he should go. The professors in the Divinity School even intimated that they had "designed him for New York." He told me once that it went against his grain. He was somewhat delicate in health, and he coveted a country parish. But fortunately for him, for his Church, and for our cause, he deferred to the wishes of the parish and the counsel of his advisers, and also to the personal attraction of Dr. Dewey. During the four weeks of his "supply" in New York before he was called, he lived in the same home with Dr. Dewey, and from that moment to this the most tender friendship has always subsisted between the two. He was ordained Jan. 2, 1839, forty-three years ago, so that the last sermon he preached must have been the beginning of his forty-fourth year in that pulpit. The society was poor, divided, and weak. Dr. Dewey and the attractions of the upper part of the city had drawn off most of the pillars of the Church. Dr. Follen, who had temporarily supplied the pulpit, could not have been expected to build up a struggling American congregation. But from the moment of Mr. Bellows's ordination the parish flourished as it has done to this day, and, much more than that, his ministry has succeeded. Most of the work of a Christian minister in such a city is, from the necessity of the case, outside the limits of the society which invites him. Dr. Bellows was an indefatigable sermoniser and visiting pastor, and welcome everywhere. He has always been connected prominently with the best movements for art, literature, history, and education. He very soon began to lecture and speak on public occasions, and for a generation has been one of the most acceptable of the public speakers of America.

The little congregation outgrew its humble quarters in Chambers-street. They built the church edifice on Broadway, which they called the Church of the Divine Unity, afterwards occupied by Dr. Chapin's society. The First Congregational Church had again removed, and built and occupied the beautiful Church of All-Souls, which is now their home.

In the period of his early ministry he married Miss Eliza Townsend, who became the mother of five children, two of whom survive him. The other three died before they were five years old.

After a few years in Chambers-street the congregation built the "Church of the Divine Unity" in Broadway. This church gave the name to all other churches of the Unity now existing. In the interim between leaving the old church and occupying the new they occupied "Apollo Hall;" and Bellows used that period in a course of extempore lectures on theological subjects, which made many converts and brought to him some of the best supporters of after years. The congregation remained only seven years in that church, and then moved still farther up town.

"My experience as a preacher and pastor," he writes, "is the real back-bone of my career,—the best, the hardest, the most persistent and coherent fact of my life, and that which has exacted most from my mind and heart. I was here in a strange city—and it continues to seem so in part—in a camp of hostile sects, that were agreed in little then except dislike, distrust, or abhorrence of our faith. It required real courage to be a Unitarian layman in New York in those days. A minister was a sort of clerical outlaw. Then, our Unitarian body was torn with all sorts of divisions, and seemed going to pieces. My own opinions had all to be re-examined and laid deep in personal conviction. I had to watch my own theology, and to fight the worldliness, conformity, bigotry, materialism, and, in short, the Philistinism of this metropolis. It nearly killed me! At the end of ten years I fainted dead away in the pulpit, and did not recover my health for nearly a year. All from nervous exhaustion and overwork! But more and more the congregation increased, strengthened, and took on an individuality which at once became known and felt. It has been for twenty-five years a solid, self-respecting, free, reverent body of men and women, second to none in the city in influence and dignity, and second to none anywhere in character and in faith. The number of rare souls that have been connected with us is incredible, and the weight and influence our members have had in the life of the city and country truly exceptional. To have helped on to this result is the glory and joy of my life."

Dr. Bellows early became a trusted leader in the affairs of the Unitarian Church; and the securing of one college in the country, Antioch College in Ohio, to be under the counsel of the Unitarian Church, is due to his foresight and energy. But he was always a loyal son of Harvard. He used to be almost always at Commencement. His Phi Beta Address of 1853, on the necessity and use of wealth, naturally excited attention and discussion. To this day it is one of the few common-sense statements of the truth, in reply to the twaddle of the sixpenny sentimentalists, trained probably by the Church of the Dark Ages, as to the moral value of pauperism. His address before the Divinity School, on the Suspense of Faith, excited wide and amazed discussion. Indeed, there is probably no Unitarian writer, except James Freeman Clarke, so much read by the orthodox clergy—read with mingled horror and delight. As lately as 1879 Dr. Bellows was chosen almost unanimously a member of the Board of Overseers of Harvard University; but, by a mistaken interpretation of the statutes, after he had sat with the board for some months, it was held that a person not resident in Massachusetts was not eligible. The more correct practice has now been justified by a special act of the Legislature of Massachusetts.

In the course of legitimate parish work he delivered an address on the drama, justifying its existence and pointing out the true means of preserving its purity. He told me once that he found passages from this address permanently preserved in some German theatres. Here it made no end of discussion, the clergy of the creed sects being generally horrified by it. But it seems to have expressed the better opinion of the quarter-century which has followed it. In 1857 he delivered a course of Lowell lectures in Boston, on the Treatment of Social Diseases—a course which would, if printed, be a good handbook for practical people.

Meanwhile, he had founded the Christian Inquirer, a weekly newspaper in New York, which in 1865 took the name of the Liberal Christian. Sometimes it had another editor, and sometimes it did not. Whether it had or had not, he wrote for it on subjects of every kind, and thus had, as active men are so apt to wish to have, his own "organ." He and his friends paid for it—when a careless public neglected to do so. The value of this agent for the best and freest discussion all over the country can hardly be estimated. In 1866 he became the chief proprietor and editor of the Christian Examiner, which was then transferred to New York. He held this trust till 1871, when the Examiner was absorbed in Old and New.

In the midst of this literary work he has written but one or two books, rated as books in the catalogues. For instance, in the voluminous index of Allibone his name does not even appear, though one may find any barber's name there, if he happen to have printed with stiff covers a hundred copies of a tract on lather. Hundreds of pamphlets Dr. Bellows has printed, as occasion required. A collected volume of sermons, "Restatements of Christian Doctrine," has more theology hidden in it than one looks for in volumes of sermons, and its circulation in evangelical circles has been large. "The Old World in its New Face" is a collection of letters from Europe which were written for his newspaper in a journey he took in the years 1867 and 1868. He went to cultivate his love of leisure, and found he had none to cultivate.

At the very outbreak of the Rebellion, he suggested the United States Sanitary Commission, which filled so important a place, not for the army only, but for the country. In the first blush of enthusiasm he foresaw the necessity of giving to the loyal people of the north the means of ready and active sympathy with the organised army. Large indeed as was the work which the "Sanitary" did in the army, its real work was larger in the rear—in the real base of supplies, in hamlet, village, and city, where the love of liberty and of country, and an enthusiasm for the cause, were kept bright, as men and women brought in their best work for the soldier at the front. In this society Dr. Bellows was not only the founder, but the active spirit. He was the unoffended "buffer" upon whom crushed harmless the blows of people who quarrelled. He was the cheerful optimist when everything seemed dark. He travelled, he spoke, he wrote letters; he could nurse a private or take counsel with the President. And all this time, whether at Washington, at Gettysburg, or wherever it might be in the week-time, he would preach on Sunday in the Church of All Souls in New York. To this remark, the one exception is in a journey which he made in California, which resulted in a contribution of a million and more dollars from the Golden State. The important contributions of the Commission to the great social sciences with which it had to deal have commanded the attention of the world. So wide was the range of its work that its affairs were not fairly wound up till the year 1879.

Of the work which Dr. Bellows has done in the organising of the Unitarian Church of America I need hardly speak at length in this notice. So far as that slight organisation exists, it has followed lines which he earnestly advocated. So soon as the National Conference was formed, in 1865, he was chosen the first President of the Council; and he retained that office with slight exceptions till he resigned it in September, 1880.

Such is a brief sketch of the outside of a life indefatigable indeed. He has died in harness, as he always wished to do. Other pens, in other columns of this paper, will show something of the value of his work to the Church of Christ. It is impossible for any pen to tell what is the loss to private friendship in such a separation. The better one knows him, the more one loves him. The better one knows him, the more natural his tireless zeal; it becomes a thing of course. The more intimate relation with him, the more often you saw how he drank at the Infinite Fountain. The most intimate communion with God, the most distinct personal consciousness of God's presence and power, gave the quickness, the energy, and the intensity of his daily duty.

THE THEOLOGY OF THE PRESIDENTS. (From the Christian Register.)

In a late Wesleyan paper I noticed a communication from a New York correspondent, on the religious, or rather denominational, opinions held by the literary and other distinguished individuals of the country, in which the large proportion of Unitarians was noticed. It struck me that if the theological views of all our Presidents could be given it would make an interesting article. I have taken some pains to obtain information on this point, by correspondence and otherwise, and subjoin a few names whose theological opinions are pretty well ascertained, as well as some of whose beliefs or professions I am not positive; doubtless, some of your correspondents can complete the information.

Washington, as is well known, was an Episcopalian, that being the prevailing sect among the Virginia planters of the last century, and in fact from the first settlement of the State. When scarcely twenty-one he was almost unanimously elected one of the vestrymen of the Episcopal Church near Alexandria, and he ever afterward was devoted to his Church.

John Adams, as is equally well known, was a decided Unitarian from study and conviction. Speaking of his religious character, his grandson, Charles Francis Adams, says:—"Rejecting with the independent spirit which in early life had driven him from the ministry, the prominent doctrines of Calvinism, the Trinity, the Atonement, and Election, he was content to settle down upon the Sermon on the Mount as a perfect code presented to man by a mortal teacher. Further, he declined to analyse the mysterious nature of his mission. In this faith he lived with uninterrupted severity, and in it he died with perfect resignation."

Mr. Jefferson must be classed as a Unitarian. I am aware it was, and still is, common among his political and religious opponents to call him "an infidel." But this amounts to but little. Sixty to eighty years ago Unitarians of the most exemplary lives frequently had the same opprobrious epithet applied to them. In a letter to a Quaker friend, dated Sept. 13, 1823, Mr. Jefferson said:—"Of all the systems of morality, ancient or modern, which have come under my observation, none appears to me so pure as that of Jesus. He who follows this steadily need not, I think, be uneasy, although he cannot comprehend the subtleties and mysteries erected on his doctrines by these who, calling themselves his special followers and favourites, would make him come into the world to lay snares for all understandings but theirs. Their metaphysical heads usurping the judgment-seat of God denounce as his enemies all who cannot perceive the geometrical logic of Euclid in the demonstrations of St. Athanasius, that three are one, and one three."

Of Mr. Jefferson's immediate successors, Presidents Madison and Monroe, I have not been able to obtain any information, even as to what churches, if any, they attended in Washington, while Presidents. They were probably Episcopalians, possibly tinctured with the theology of Jefferson, their friend and their idol.

John Quincy Adams was a decided Unitarian, and one of the early supporters of the Unitarian church at Washington. (Mr. John C. Calhoun's name appears next to that of Mr. Adams on the list of its original subscribers. Whatever we may think of Mr. Calhoun's political views his personal character was never impeached. Mr. Adams appears to have regarded him highly.) The August number of the Unitarian Review contains the following extracts from the journal that Mr. Adams kept till within a few months of his death:—"Tuesday, April 12, 1812: The Trinity, the Divinity of Christ, the whole doctrine of Atonement, the immaculate conception of Jesus, and a Devil maintaining war against Omnipotence, [appear to me all as contrary to human reason as the real presence of the Eucharist,]" April 18, 1829: Walked to the Presbyterian Church; heard a stranger, from John i. 29. It is painful to me to hear a Calvinist preach from this text, and to witness the solemn and fervid sincerity with which they pour out absurdity and nonsense.

President Jackson was a staunch Presbyterian, certainly believing in the "church militant." He was one of the most positive characters, in politics and theology, in American history. He did not join the Church and become a communicant till after he had retired from public life.

President Van Buren undoubtedly belonged to the Dutch Reformed Church, that denomination being the prevailing one at Kinderhook, as well as in the neighbouring Dutch villages on the Hudson River, near Albany, where he passed his early life.

Mr. Fillmore was a leading member of the Unitarian Church at Buffalo and at Washington during his official life.

President Harrison in early life belonged to an Episcopal church in Cincinnati, of which he was a vestryman more than fifty years ago. After removing to North Bend he worshipped at the Rev. Mr. Scofield's Presbyterian church at Cleves, near by. In his inaugural speech, March 4, 1841, he said "he deemed the occasion a fitting one for the announcement of his belief in the divine origin and obligations of the Christian religion." He was an educated gentleman, of excellent personal character, and a thoroughly honest patriot of the old school.

John Tyler and General Taylor were probably Episcopalians.

President Polk undoubtedly was a Presbyterian. His wife certainly was a decided one.

President Pierce belonged to the Orthodox wing of the Congregationalists. When in Washington he worshipped in the little Presbyterian church in the rear of Willard's Hotel, of which it was afterwards an adjunct, and used as a hall for concerts, lectures, &c.

President Buchanan worshipped at the same church as Mr. Pierce.

President Lincoln's family worshipped at the New York Avenue Presbyterian Church, but he entertained the most liberal religious views himself. Like his Secretary of State, Mr. Seward, he was a great admirer of Theodore Parker, who corresponded much with Mr. Seward, and some with Mr. Lincoln, in 1850-1860. Many of the thoughts of Mr. Parker can be found in the writings of Lincoln and Seward. The identity between the clear, transparent style of Mr. Parker and that of Mr. Lincoln was noticed before the latter was President. In Mr. Lincoln's immortal Gettysburg speech, which has been read with admiration wherever the English language is spoken, the expression "A government for the people, by the people, &c., was a thought of Mr. Parker's, which occurs in his "Experience as a Minister," page 99:—"Freedom which leads at once to Industrial Democracy, respect for labour, government over all, by all, for the sake of all," &c. Mr. Lincoln was very friendly to the Rev. William H. Channing, and expressed much satisfaction at his being settled over the Unitarian Society in Washington; and when the church was closed, and used as a hospital during the war in 1864, he appointed Mr. Channing a chaplain in the army.

Of Andrew Johnson accounts are various. He has been classed as a Lutheran, a Methodist, and as a Campbellite, the latter sect being numerous in the south-western States. Perhaps he changed his religious views as easily as he did his political. The Rev. Mr. Power, the present chaplain of the House of Representatives and pastor of the Disciples' Church in Washington, however, speaks of him as having been certainly of the Campbellite persuasion, and that he was at one time his parishioner.

President Grant was a regular attendant at the Rev. Mr. Newman's Metropolitan Methodist Church at Washington, to the building of which he subscribed liberally, besides giving five hundred dollars (in the name of Mrs. Grant) towards the purchase of a new chime of bells.

Mr. Hayes was a Methodist, and worshipped at the Foundry Church, near the White House, in preference, for some reason, to accepting an invitation to occupy the "President's pew" at the Metropolitan Church; where, as well as at St. John's Episcopal Church, a pew has always been set apart for the Presidents.

President Garfield, as is well known, was a member of the Disciples or Christian Church.

Mr. Arthur is an Episcopalian, and worships at St. John's, a little Episcopal Church near the Executive Mansion, where many high public functionaries have always attended.

Of all the Presidents, Washington, John Adams, John Quincy Adams, and Garfield are said to have been the only communicants. Probably General Harrison, if he had lived, would have been one.

THROAT IRRITATION.—Soreness and dryness, tickling and irritation, inducing cough and affecting the voice. For these symptoms use Epps's Glycerine Jubes. Glycerine, in these agreeable confections, being in proximity to the glands at the moment they are excited by the act of sucking, becomes actively healing. Sold only in boxes, 7½d. and 1s. 1½d., labelled, "JAMES EPPS and Co., Homoeopathic Chemists, London." A letter received:—"Gentlemen.—It may, perhaps, interest you to know that, after an extended trial, I have found your Glycerine Jubes of considerable benefit (with or without medical treatment) in almost all forms of throat disease. They soften and clear the voice.—Yours faithfully, GORDON HOLMES, L.R.C.P.E., Senior Physician to the Municipal Throat and Ear Infirmary."

THE WESLEYAN CONFERENCE AND "ETERNAL TORMENTS."

The Wesleyan Conference has lately issued a revised edition of the Catechism, "No. I., for Children of Tender Years." It is instructive to compare this revision with the former work. The old Catechism has been in use in the Connexion more than sixty years, authorised and published by the Conference; the new one comes forth under the same authority.

With the exception of an additional section, headed "Of Jesus Christ and Little Children," and some slight alteration of arrangement, the work of revision has been principally exercised in the fifth section, with the following result:—

FORMER EDITION.

Section 5. Of Heaven and Hell.

1. What sort of a place is hell?—Hell is a dark and bottomless pit, full of fire and brimstone.
2. How will the wicked be punished there?—The wicked will be punished in hell by having their bodies tormented by fire, and their souls by a sense of the wrath of God.
3. How long will these torments last?—The torments of hell will last for ever and ever.
4. Where will believers go after death?—After death believers will go to heaven, &c.

REVISED EDITION.

Section 5. Of Judgment and the Future State.

- Will all men be judged hereafter?—Yes; we must all be judged at the last day.
2. Who will be the judge of all men?—Our Lord Jesus Christ, who died for us, will be the Judge of all men.
3. What will become of the wicked after the Day of Judgment?—They shall go away into everlasting punishment.
4. Where will the wicked be punished?—In hell.
5. What will become of the righteous after death?—The righteous shall go into everlasting life, &c.

Three or four years ago Mr. Impey, a very distinguished member of forty years' standing, and holding an official position as General Superintendent of Wesleyan Missions in South Africa, Eastern Province, was constrained to leave the Connexion on the ground of his inability to teach the doctrine of the Wesleyan Standard on the subject of Eternal Torments. In a statement made for the satisfaction of his friends, entitled, "Why I leave the Wesleyan Methodist Church," Mr. Impey laid special stress on the teaching of the Catechism. His words are these:—

"What is the teaching of the Wesleyan Catechism on this subject? It may be said that the Catechisms are not standards of doctrine—that the only Connexional Standards are as stated above; the Notes on the New Testament and the first four volumes of sermons. The Catechisms may not be the Legal Standard, but surely they must be considered the popular exponents of it. The Wesleyan Catechisms were directed to be prepared by the Conference of 1815 (certain minutes of which, called the 'Liverpool Minutes,' are annually read in every district meeting). They were prepared, mainly if not exclusively, by the Rev. Richard Watson, whose 'Institutes' used to be, and probably continue to be, a Text Book in the Wesleyan Colleges; they are approved and sanctioned by the Conference, they are printed by the Conference, they are sold at the Conference Book-room, they bear on the title, 'Compiled and published by order of the Conference,' they are used in all schools directly under the control of the Conference, and it is not too much to say that every Wesleyan minister and teacher, if he uses a Catechism at all, is expected to use these. If the Catechisms are without authority on this doctrine, so may they be on any other, or on all others, and then, whence their value?"

"In rejecting the dogma in question it would to me be nothing short of an evasion to plead conformity to Wesleyan Theology, on the ground that the Catechism, which unquestionably teaches it, is not one of the Connexional Standards. The same remark applies to the fact that some of Mr. Wesley's most direct teaching is not found within the exact limits of the Legal Standards."

"What says the Catechisms? The first part of these Catechisms—No. 1.—is designed 'for children of tender years.' The answer to each question being put in the form of a complete proposition, embodying the entire sense of the question and answer united."

"Part I., Section 5, Quest. 1. 'What sort of a place is hell?'"

"Ans. 'Hell is a dark and bottomless pit, full of fire and brimstone.'"

"Quest. 2. 'How will the wicked be punished there?'"

"Ans. 'The wicked will be punished in hell by having their bodies tormented by fire, and their souls by a sense of the wrath of God.'"

"Quest. 3. 'How long will these torments last?'"

"Ans. 'The torments of hell will last for ever and ever'"

"The first answer describes hell, the second defines the punishment, the third fixes the duration. This is done in terms adapted to the understanding of 'children of tender years,' who may be, and presumably are, expected to receive them literally; such are the terms, also in their literal acceptation, in which this doctrine is taught to ignorant and untutored heathen when first brought into contact with the Blessed Gospel of Christ."

How now? Does not the Revised Edition virtually abandon the very dogma which, in the opinion of the Conference, rendered Mr. Impey's resignation necessary? It may, perhaps, still be found in other expressions of Wesleyan theology, but it has disappeared from the Catechism. It is some satisfaction to find that, after all, the Wesleyan standards are not so inflexible as they have been asserted to be, and that, in this instance, at least, there is the adoption of a more Scriptural statement of doctrine.—Christian World.

PUNJAB UNIVERSITY COLLEGE.—The Government of India having finally decided to raise the Punjab University College to the status of a university, it is interesting to note the progress of the college in public favour, and its academical success during last year, as far as these can be estimated from its improving financial position. The subscriptions, which were Rs. 9,880 in 1880, rose to Rs. 16,159 during 1881, or more than four times the amount at which they stood in 1876; and the fees were Rs. 14,500, compared with Rs. 3,131 in 1877. Donations amounted to Rs. 30,000. The total income of the college rose from Rs. 69,477 in 1880 to Rs. 76,999 in 1881.

A PAPER has been discovered in the archives of Venezuela, dated 1780, which gives an historical summary of early projects for piercing the Isthmus of Panama. The first goes back to the reign of Philip II. of Spain, who, at the instigation of the Viceroy of the Indies, sent certain Flemish engineers to investigate on the spot the feasibility of the undertaking. Their report was altogether adverse; and thereupon Philip II. threatened the penalty of death against whoever should again bring up the project.

A DECREE has recently been issued in Egypt, appointing a commission (which includes Rogers Bey and M. Baudry) to investigate and preserve the monuments of Arab art; and a sum of £7,000 will be granted for pressing needs during the current year. In Japan, too, a society has been formed by the Prime Minister and other high officials for the protection of old temples and monuments; and in this case it is said that two million yen (£400,000) has already been subscribed for the purposes of the society.

PROFESSOR STOKES, of Cambridge, has accepted the appointment of Burnett Lecturer in connection with Aberdeen. In accordance with the new regulations of the Burnett trust, he will hold the appointment for three years, on condition of delivering a course of lectures at Aberdeen upon "recent researches in physical science, with special reference to natural religion." These lectures are in substitution for the Burnett prizes, awarded every forty years, of which the second prize was won in 1815 by Archbishop Sumner, and in 1855 by Principal Tulloch.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE.

ORIGINAL AND ONLY GENUINE.

COUGHS, COLDS, ASTHMA,
BRONCHITIS.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE.—This wonderful remedy was discovered by Dr. J. COLLIS BROWNE, and the word CHLORODYNE coined by him expressly to designate it. There never has been a remedy so vastly beneficial to suffering humanity, and it is a subject of deep concern to the public that they should not be imposed upon by having imitations pressed upon them on account of cheapness, and as being the same thing. Dr. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE is a totally distinct thing from the spurious compounds called Chlorodyne, the use of which only ends in disappointment and failure.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE.—Vice-Chancellor Sir W. PAGE WOOD, STATED PUBLICLY in Court that Dr. J. COLLIS BROWNE WAS UNDOUBTEDLY THE INVENTOR OF CHLORODYNE, that the whole story of the defendant was deliberately untrue, and he regretted to say it had been sworn to.—See The Times, July 23th, 1864.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE is a LIQUID MEDICINE which ASSUAGES PAIN OF EVERY KIND, affords a calm, refreshing sleep WITHOUT HEADACHE, and INVIGORATES the NERVOUS SYSTEM when exhausted.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE is the GREAT SPECIFIC FOR CHOLERA, DYSENTERY, DIARRHŒA.

The GENERAL BOARD OF HEALTH, London, REPORT that it ACTS as a CHARM, one dose generally sufficient.

Dr. GIBSON, Army Medical Staff, Calcutta, states: "TWO DOSES COMPLETELY CURED ME OF DIARRHŒA."

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE rapidly cuts short all attacks of EPILEPSY, SPASMS, COLIC.

PALPITATION, HYSTERIA.

COUGHS, COLDS, &c.

From W. VESALIUS PETTIGREW, M.D., formerly Lecturer at St. George's Hospital, LONDON.

"I have no hesitation in stating that I have never met with any medicine so efficacious as an Anti-Spasmic and Sedative. I have used it in Consumption, Asthma, Diarrhœa, and other diseases, and am perfectly satisfied with the results."

From W. C. WILKINSON, Esq. F.R.C.S., Spalding.

"I consider it invaluable in Phthisis and Spasmodic Cough; the benefit is very marked indeed."

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE is the TRUE PALLIATIVE in NEURALGIA, GOUT, CANCER, TOOTHACHE, RHEUMATISM.

From Dr. B. J. BOULTON and Co., Hounslow.

"We have made pretty extensive use of Chlorodyne in our practice lately, and look upon it as an excellent direct Sedative and Anti-Spasmic. It seems to allay pain and irritation in whatever organ, and from whatever cause. It induces a feeling of comfort and quietude not obtainable by any other remedy, and it seems to possess this great advantage over all other Sedatives, that it leaves no unpleasant after effects."

IMPORTANT CAUTION.

The IMMENSE SALE of this REMEDY has given rise to many UNSCRUPULOUS IMITATIONS.

HOLLOWAY'S OINTMENT AND PILLS.—Diseases of the Skin.—No case of disease of the skin, be its nature what it may, has failed to be benefited when these potent remedies have been properly applied. In scrofulous and scorbatic affections they are especially serviceable. Scabby eruptions, and glandular swellings, which had resisted all other modes of treatment and gradually becoming worse from year to year, have been completely cured by Holloway's cooling Ointment and purifying Pills, which root out the disease from the blood itself, and leave the constitution free from every morbid taint. In the nursery Holloway's Ointment is simply invaluable; it will give ease in sprains, contusions, burns, scalds, and infantile eruptions, and may always safely be applied by any ordinary attendant.

THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

THE early criticisms as to the arrangements of the National Conference may well give place to more serious considerations on the amount of benefit it may confer upon religion. Whether or not it might have had a better name than the somewhat pretentious and undescriptive title it has received; whether or not a better place than Liverpool, and a better time than the week after Easter could have been chosen for its assembly; there is now no doubt that it will be an important gathering. In the Secretary's Address we printed a fortnight ago it was stated that a large number of our ministers had signified their intention of being present; that many congregations would send representatives; and that many other Societies were following the example of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and appointing delegates to attend the meeting. Manchester New College and the Home Missionary Board are also reported to have prolonged their Easter Vacation in its favour; and a general interest is excited throughout our denomination which will ensure a large attendance at Liverpool, and considerable curiosity as to its proceedings on the part of the stay-at-homes.

If we understand the programme of the Conference rightly, it seems to have been the hope of the promoters to attract other than Unitarians to the meeting. It appeals to Unitarian, Free Christian, Presbyterian and other Non-subscribing and kindred churches. One direction in which it appears to have sought outside sympathy is that of the Independent Religious Communion Association, since the Rev. JOSEPH WOOD is to conduct the devotions at the opening religious service. The subjects for consideration also imply that theology and dogmatic discussions are to be avoided. The principle of non-subscription, of unfettered intercourse between man and his Maker, is evidently regarded as anterior to, and more important than, the dogmatic results to which it has led. It seems to be supposed that Trinitarians and Unitarians and Free Religionists of other types, if agreed in asserting the right of private judgment, may meet and discuss subjects of common religious interest with mutual sympathies sufficient to produce a beneficial result. We honour the desire and effort; we wish it all success, and shall rejoice greatly in all signs of union and concord between men of different faiths which may result. It cannot, however, be expected that any large number from Orthodox Churches will attend. We can imagine the various bodies of Wesleyans being gathered in one Conference. The Independents and Baptists might assemble on a common platform. But the Trinitarians who will join in conference with Unitarians must needs be a few brave men who are prepared to incur considerable criticism, and even suspicion, in their own camp. Nor will the Conference attract many Agnostics and Secularists. Its religious character is too manifest from end to end of its programme to leave room for discussing the foundations of faith in GOD or the modes of His revelations. We anticipate that the Assembly will, therefore, consist of Unitarians and Free Christians, with some few liberal Trinitarians and religious Freethinkers, met to discuss their duties in the light of a free access to GOD and of inspiration direct from Him, apart from any dogmatic basis or merely sectarian activity.

We are informed that the Conference will assemble in the Philharmonic Hall at Liverpool, a building which affords every convenience for such a meeting. A reception-room will be fitted up, and supplied with papers, telegrams, and writing materials. There will be a refreshment-room within the building. The proceedings will be varied. A religious service the first evening and a soiree the second are staple constituents of such a gathering, and their success will depend upon their management. The speeches should be first-rate in quality; and in quantity as few and short as they can well be made. The addition of a little music would give the soiree the character of a conversazione, a very important thing when friends from great distances want to exchange kindly greetings. We are informed that the Communion Service will be held in the course of the Conference, and a devotional service early on Thursday morning.

Then come subjects for discussion, so comprehensive in their statement that much will depend on the readers of the papers and the speakers to secure a satisfactory effect. The internal development, the external activity of our Churches, and the ministers who officiate in them—these are weighty subjects, which must not be regarded as the transient amusements of a pleasant gathering, but as serious topics, whose wise treatment may have a large, an immediate, and a lasting influence on the history of the Free Churches in the United Kingdom. The aim of those assembled should not be to make, or to listen to, a few clever speeches from practised debaters; to pronounce it a good discussion, and then dismiss it from their minds; but those who attend should ponder the subjects beforehand, and speak, if moved to do so, with earnest conviction and wise thought; and then even such as come "not with excellency of speech or of wisdom," may yet, like one of old, "declare the testimony of God."

The discussions ought to lead to some definite practical result. Free Churches must aspire to no control over each other, and therefore the promoters are probably wise in suggesting no resolutions for adoption, and in leaving the Conference free to take its own course. The subject of "Ministers' Stipends and Augmentation Funds" does, indeed, suggest the possibility of a plan for establishing such a fund, and we think there is ample room for organising many existing Bursaries and supplementing their deficiencies, so that they may confer larger and less doubtful benefits than may now sometimes be the case.

The Conference has our hearty sympathy and best wishes. We trust that it will split on no rock of dissension; but that its promoters, even if they go forth in anxiety "bearing precious seed, may yet come again with rejoicing, bringing many sheaves with them."

TRANSLATION AND THE NEW VERSION.

THE new Translation of the Greek Testament has given rise to much animadversion, some of it in tones of rather faint praise, and some of it in growls of condemnation. We are not very much surprised at the angry form of comment; for bad temper has a natural tendency to infuse itself into bad theology. Anything that probes, however delicately and timidly, into the foundations of what was assumed to be settled and determined once and for all, naturally excites a little alarm and displeasure; and it must be confessed that this New Version, if generally used, is not unlikely to unsettle somewhat a few of the conclusions of Orthodoxy. But we do not live in a Bible-reading age. Even the Old Version, though it is found in every house, is generally more of a piece of furniture for a side-table or a mantelpiece than a book of reference, and we doubt if the New Version will ever obtain more attention and study. For our own parts, we never had any expectation that this great work of the Revisers would become generally acceptable. We felt quite sure that the scholarly men engaged in it were, every one of them, honest, honourable, learned, and conscientious; but it did not appear to us that they had exactly the right materials to work with, either in quality or quantity. Even if their translation had been faultless there would still have arisen in many minds the question, Could the Greek Text be relied on? or, if reliable as far as it goes, is it not insufficient as record? Does it not require to be supplemented by other documents or historical evidence of some kind at present unknown? or, on the other hand, may there not be something in the Greek text that ought to be taken away, something which has been interpolated, added afterwards for a purpose, and therefore not genuine? If so, would it not have been well to wait a while for the more thorough detection of the supposed spurious matter that has found its way in, and the discovery of the genuine matter that is still wanted in many parts to complete sense and coherency? The Revisers did not, of course, make a Greek Gospel where they did not find one, and whether the English they have made out of the Greek is in all cases correct and pure is a matter of opinion and taste. We are quite sure they always intended to do their best, but being fallible men, like the rest of us, they did not always realise their intentions.

Translation of the literature of antiquity is a very hard and somewhat hazardous undertaking. It is difficult to put old wine into new bottles without in some degree spoiling the wine. It is difficult to translate the ancient into the modern without deviating a little from correct drawing and true colour. The costume of the new does not readily adapt itself to the form of the old. Some suppose that to know grammatically the language of a remote and foreign people is equipment enough for a translator; but is it not necessary also to know something of the foreign life behind the foreign words—something of the religious tendencies, the natural aptitudes, the personal habits and tastes of a different nation, whether ancient or modern? In addition to mere linguistic accomplishment it is requisite to have wide survey of thought, broad sympathy, imaginative power, and a capacity of shifting the position of the mind so as to take into view new aspects and changes of scene. Difference of language, especially ancient language, means difference of temperament, difference of physical and social environment, difference of intellectual and moral atmosphere; and unless we are capable by sympathy of knowing something of the inward mind of a people we shall not rightly interpret their outward expression. There is a shelter and hospitality of the mind as well as of the person which we nations of the earth need one of another, but which it is not always easy to render. One race has often had occasion to complain to another, "I was a stranger, and ye took me not in." Why? Simply because of their being strangers. We knew not well their speech, their thoughts, their inward wants and cravings, nor how to "take them in," so that they might have shelter and comfort within the circle of our sympathies.

Some critics, erring a little on the generous side, have seemed to excuse rather questionable English in the revised translation on the apparent ground that the Greek of the original is equally questionable. But was it not the business of this very able Committee of Revisers to take especial care that their English should be pure, whatever might be the condition of the Greek before them? If they could not do this without deviations from literalness of rendering such deviations should, we think, have been allowed, provided, of course, that they did not substantially change the meaning. Awkward Greek in the original does not justify, though it may palliate, the use of awkward English in translation. We have to think of identity of spirit and intention rather than of similarity of form; and in cases where literal rendering does not convey the sense well, a translator is justified in resorting to paraphrase that will convey it better. It requires taste and care, but good translators are tasteful and careful men. Literalness is sometimes clearly impossible; for some of the fundamental rules of ancient grammar may be different from ours. In Greek, for example, neuter nouns in the plural form require the verb which they govern to be in the singular, because the Greeks, in their metaphysical subtleties of thought, seem to have regarded persons only, and not things, as having a real plurality, though they might have it formally. A Greek, therefore, would say "the cities has walls," not have—τα αστη τεχει εχει. But in English we know nothing about this inferiority of neuter plurals. Ancient languages, too, that rely on the inflexions of a noun to express its case rather than on its position in the sentence cannot be translated into English literally. Prepositions must be employed, and position attended to. Languages like the French, that have all their nouns and pronouns either masculine or feminine and none neuter, cannot be translated literally into our tongue, which has a neuter. In English the grammatical form of the "third person" is used in reference to the person spoken of; but in some dialects it is often used of the person spoken to. Literalness, therefore, is in a multitude of cases impossible, and even when possible is sometimes disagreeable and harsh. All this is so obvious that to repeat it here seems wearisome and impertinent. Nevertheless, there are people who insist upon ipsissima verba and literal renderings, and who seem to think that to copy the forms of a language is the honestest way of conveying its spirit.

In a few instances fault has been found with the translators for using now and then the singular of the English verb, where the nominatives have been coupled by the conjunction "and." But the translators in this were not wrong. It must be apparent to any one endowed with sufficient imaginative power to supply the unexpressed parts in elliptical sentences that there is often supplementary matter in the mind of a writer which he, in order to avoid expansion and diffusiveness, does not put into printed words, but leaves to be suggested by the context or inferred by the intelligence of his readers, and that there may be also sentences in which a number of singular nouns with an "and" between them, and therefore seeming to require a plural verb, are properly associated with the singular form of the tense because of the intention of the writer and the requirement of the sense that the verb shall apply to them individually and in succession rather than collectively.

The Revisers seem to have contented themselves with faithful translation. They probably did not think it any part of their duty to examine into the historical validity of the matter translated, nor to ascertain the true authorship of the writings or the dates of their appearance. We wish that more scope had been allowed and taken by these good and learned men. It seems to us that they have lost a grand opportunity of explaining many things that need to be explained, and of correcting many vulgar notions about the Bible. The dates of the Gospels and Epistles are known only approximately and not with precision, but even approximate dates would have been better than no dates at all. Order of time naturally suggests a corresponding order of arrangement of the events occurring in time, and hence, we think, that some of the writings of the New Testament should have had a place and position different (in relation to each other) from that which they now occupy. For instance, the Gospel of Matthew in its present form, consisting as it does of diverse elements, could not have been written, according to the opinion of many able critics, until after the production of the Gospel of Luke, though it is probable that the original Matthew was a very early writing. Luke is supposed to have been written early in the second century, perhaps about the year 115,—Matthew, in its present form, somewhat later—John at a still latter period, and Mark the latest of the four. If this be the correct order of succession why not have adopted it in the new version, with an approximate date at the head of each Gospel? Again, the writings of St. PAUL, the Book of Revelation, the Book of Acts belong to the first century, and therefore should have (so far as relates to mere succession and line of arrangement) a prior place to writings that belong to the second century. In the writings of PAUL, too, there are indications of a change of doctrinal view as he extended his studies or came under different influences. These later utterances of his mind should not be placed before the earlier ones, and yet this appears to have been inadvertently done. Some of the Epistles attributed to PAUL could not, in the judgment of many able students, have been written by him at all, although marked by traces of his spirit and resemblances to his style. Wherever there was reasonable doubt of the authorship, would it not have been well to state that doubt candidly at the head of the Epistle? It would not have deteriorated in the slightest degree the intrinsic moral or intellectual worth of the writing. We are not at all sure that the Revisers were at liberty to act as critics and commentators as well as translators; but if they had such power we are sorry they did not occasionally use it. They might have made the New Testament much more intelligible in parts than it now is to the ordinary reader. The mass of the people know nothing about the growth of theology; they go on blundering in the notion that the Bible is one book written at one epoch, and under one simultaneous inspiration. Scholars like the Revisers might have shown them that this one book is in reality many books, written at different times, by different men, in different places, and that it contains the most varied, mixed, dissimilar, heterogeneous thoughts, feelings, opinions, and fancies. Its valuable treasure is contained in earthly vessels,—some of them very earthy indeed. Its sentiment sometimes rises to the height of heavenly beauty and truth, and sometimes falls into the mire of ignorance and superstition. We have a sincere veneration for the Bible, and we observe with very deep regret that it is not now very generally used in private reading and as an object of study. The philosophies of our age want an impregnating influence from the religion of old. This western hemisphere of ours greatly needs from time to time a waft of spiritual air from the eastern hills. In the midst of the constant excitement of our trading and professional competition, our burning thirst for money, our feverish heat in politics, our foolish fashions, selfish ambitions and vulgar sensational pleasures, humanity needs to hear a voice rebuking the turmoil of life—"Peace! Be still!" Such voices have come to us from antiquity in the Oriental world, especially from Palestine in the early morn of Christianity. Ignorance, error, superstition, imperfection of all kinds mingled, no doubt, with these ancient utterances. Nevertheless, some of the tones of these distant voices were very sweet. Are they, in the tumult of modern life, to be utterly overwhelmed and heard no more? Is materialistic science entirely to obliterate the spirituality of the antique world? We hope not. Rather would we have a commingling of the old and new—an interfusion of humble piety with the bold energies of modern life, a yearning of the heart after holiness, with a striving of the intellect after knowledge. JESUS of Nazareth could have known nothing whatever of more than half of the various sciences and philosophies that absorb the attention of modern society. Nevertheless, there is something in the life and utterance of this man which is not likely to be superseded and made unnecessary by any science or philosophy at present known in the world. It will be a bright day for humanity when the Bible is read in the light of clearer science, historical, geographical, political, social, and medical; but it would be the reverse of a bright day if men should cease to read it at all.

MR. BRADLAUGH'S TRIUMPH.

MR. CHARLES BRADLAUGH, M.P., has not fought the question of principle on so high a ground as we could have wished. We have never concealed our regret that he did not resolutely refuse to take the oath in any form, and wait in patience as Jews and Non-conformists have waited through long years until the last remnant of religious disability is swept away, and becomes an extinct superstition which wise men in future ages will regard with a smile at the crass prejudices and short-sighted unwisdom of their fathers. But every man must stand acquitted or condemned by his own conscience, and Mr. BRADLAUGH no doubt honestly believes that he has a perfect right either to take, or to administer to himself, an oath which a very large number of honourable and right honourable gentlemen on both sides regard as nothing but an empty form. Mr. BRADLAUGH has unquestionably brought upon himself some of the difficulties of his position, by insulting the authority of the House and disregarding the religious feeling of the country, which is shocked by the apparent profanation of a religious ceremony. But no mistakes he has committed, or may yet commit, can blind our eyes to the fact that the elected of Northampton has been more sinned against than sinning, that the Tory party, with the aid of some few recreant Liberals, have practically introduced a new religious test, and that the majority of the House of Commons, biassed, we fear, more by ignoble prejudices than by sincere convictions, have violated the law in expelling a member duly elected.

For these reasons, although with somewhat mixed feelings, we regard with satisfaction Mr. BRADLAUGH'S third election for Northampton. We congratulate the Liberal party in that borough for their courage in withstanding immense obloquy, and subordinating all personal considerations to the vindication of great public principles. We Liberal Non-conformists, who have purchased our freedom with a great price, are as a body the very last to withhold just civil rights from those with whose dreary negations we have no sympathy whatever. We may have wished that a less unpopular, a less extreme man had fought out this battle, but there is no disguising the fact that it is after all a battle of religious principle, and that sooner or later all disabilities for conscience sake must be swept into the limbo of dead and buried superstitions. We go further in this matter than many of our friends. We say that the State has no right to institute an inquiry on any pretence whatever into a man's religious or non-religious opinions by requiring a profession of belief in God. It is not sufficient, therefore, to substitute an affirmation in the case of those objecting to the oath. On the highest ground of principle we say that the House of Commons ought not to impose on any man the invidious task of proclaiming his disbelief; and that, therefore, the oath should be abolished altogether. What more is really necessary or desirable than that newly-elected members should sign the roll and take their seats without further ceremony or profession?

A POSITIVIST RELIGIOUS SERVICE.

Our Positivist friends continue their meetings and religious services with quiet persevering effort. They are not able to say that all the world is coming over to them, or, indeed, that they are making many open converts to their cause, but they profess to have great hopes of the future, and are assured that their present efforts, small as they may appear to others, are not without useful results. Some persons, perhaps many, who do not openly join them, may occasionally attend their services, read their books, and be in some degree influenced by their teaching. We must not measure their influence by the number of their professed adherents. Their religious services appear to many strange and unmeaning, but that they have all the marks of sincerity and devoutness must be admitted even by those who are least in sympathy with them. Indeed, the tone of the service might be commended to many Christian congregations as far more reverent and becoming than the style of service to which they are accustomed. We read lately a printed prayer by one of the most noted ministers in London, and we must say it seemed to us hollow, pretentious and unbecoming. As it may be interesting to some of our readers we give a portion of the "Service for the Festival of Humanity," prefixed to the annual address by Dr. Congreve. After the lesson for the day, Isaiah ix., comes the following prayer:—

Great Power, whom we here acknowledge as the Highest, Humanity, whose children and servants we are; from whom we derive everything, and to whom we are bound to render everything; may we all seek to know thee better, that we may love and serve thee better; and to this end may our affections become more pure, true and deep, our thought larger and more vigorous, our action firmer and more energetic, that so, according to our measure, in our generation, we may hasten the time when thou shalt visibly to all take to thee thy great power and reign; when all kindreds and nations, all the members of the human family now so torn by discord, shall, by the power of the unity of thy past, place themselves under thy guidance, the living under the government of the dead, and, bound together by mutual understanding and affection, each take their due part in the work of human advancement, in peaceful union moving forward through the coming ages to a more and more perfect state, to thy glory and the common welfare of the countless generations of men and man's dependants, who shall in succession possess this thy beautiful planet, the earth, which is thy home. In communion with thee, in communion with thy Past, and with thy Future, may we keep this great aim ever in our sight to strengthen and ennoble our whole life and work.—Amen.

ADVENT COLLECT.

Thou Power Supreme who has hitherto guided thy children under other names, but in this generation hast come to thy own in thy own proper person, revealed for all ages to come by thy servant, Auguste Comte, we praise thee that under his teaching we are enabled to see the early dawn of thy glory brightening towards the perfect day; and we pray that, drawing inspiration from thy Past and Future, we may be strong to proclaim thy advent to the world around us, so that each successive year devoted to thy service may bring more and more disciples of thy faith, avowed adherents of thy Holy Church.—Amen.

Next comes the following invocation:—

Holy and Glorious Humanity, on this thy High Day, at the beginning of a new year, we are met in praise, in prayer, in thanksgiving, to celebrate thy coming, in the fulness of time, for the visible perfecting of thy as yet unseen work.

Priest.—We bow before thee in thankfulness.

People.—As children of thy past.

Priest.—We adore thee in hope.

People.—As thy ministers and stewards for the future.

Priest.—We would commune with thee humbly in prayer.

People.—As thy servants in the present.

All.—May our worship, as our lives, grow more and more worthy of thy great name.

After this comes the "sermon," which we understand to be "a passage from some poet, most frequently from one of the poets in the Positivist Library." The "concluding prayer" is as follows:—

Praising Thee, Holy Humanity, as is most meet, for all the blessings which thy past has accumulated for us; for the rich treasures of knowledge, beauty, and wisdom which it has handed down; for its long roll of great exemplars, our cloud of witnesses, which ministers comfort, support, and guidance in our need; lastly, as we are here more especially bound to do, for the full liberty to speak and act which we enjoy; we pray that we may not be found unworthy of such benefits, but that day by day, in all humility and singleness of purpose, with all boldness, and yet tenderness for others, we may magnify thee, and attain for ourselves, and help others to attain, the great blessings which only communion with thee can give: Union, Unity, Continuity.—Amen.

The Faith of Humanity, the Hope of Humanity, the Love of Humanity, bring you comfort and teach you sympathy, give you peace in yourselves and peace with others now and for ever.—Amen.

Such is the service; what it seems to us to lack is fervour, enthusiasm. It is cold, measured, formal. Every word seems as if it had been carefully weighed before uttering it. There is a want of spontaneity, and many would say a want of reality too. However, if it is sufficient for Positivists to meet their wants, then it is not for others to speak of it contemptuously. Different minds can be ministered to by different forms and different modes of thought. What to one is unmeaning may to another be full of significance and value. C. F. B.

"THE AUTHENTIC GOSPEL."*

GEORGE DAWSON'S NEW VOLUME.

We hardly know whether one would, properly speaking, call this a volume of sermons—because there is a very considerable difference between these discourses and those "Sermons on Special Occasions" and "Daily Duty and Daily Care," which were published earlier. Perhaps "discourses" is the most appropriate word. Nobody has polished them up. As they fell from his lips so a real benefactress has presented them to us. We desire to thank the lady who caught these discourses as they fell, and Mr. St. Clair, who has so faithfully edited the volume. We were grateful for those earlier volumes, but for this we are more thankful still, for no over careful hand has chastened them. Here is George Dawson not as in the earlier volumes in the spirit only—but in the spirit and in the letter too. This is fine. "He being dead, yet speaketh."

What a fine perception the Laureate had of those spiritual relationships which by their sublime and unquestionable reality give us a foretaste of "heaven."

Dear friend, far off, my lost desire,
So far, so near in woe and weal;
O loved the most, when most I feel
There is a lower and a higher.

Thy voice is on the rolling air,
I hear thee where the waters run,
Thou standest in the rising sun,
And in the setting thou art fair.

What art thou, then? I cannot guess;
But tho' I seem in star and flower
To feel the same diffusive power,
I do not, therefore, love thee less!

My love involves the love before;
My love is vaster passion now;
Tho' mixed with God's nature thou
I seem to love thee more and more.

* "The Authentic Gospel." Sermons, by George Dawson, M.A., edited by George St. Clair, F.G.S. London: Kegan Paul, Trench, and Co. 1892.

Far off, thou art, but ever nigh;
I have thee still, and I rejoice;
I prosper circled by thy voice,
I shall not lose thee though I die.

One cannot talk about such relations, but the reality of them is unquestionable; at least, they are to us both unquestionable and unspeakable, as we read "The Authentic Gospel." So we will not attempt to "review" this volume or speak of its author. We do not merely read George Dawson's words in this book. We hear his voice, we hear its scornful accent as he denounces the shams of this world so overhung with falsities from the zenith to the nadir of it. We hear its sweetness and its tenderness as he appeals to the boundless love of God for the lost sheep, that even at the eleventh hour it may be brought within the fold. For this volume reveals the man, tells of the clearness of his logic, the keenness of his satire, the largeness of his heart, the pureness of his thought, and the boldness and the breadth of it, and the richness of his culture.

The volume opens with a discourse entitled "Christ verifies Christ." The question is, How shall we say whether this or that is true of Christ? And this is the answer:—

Jesus Christ . . . shall verify for himself what things are true of him. So in vain are all Councils, Nicene or otherwise, all manuscripts, and revisionists and commentators; for to us this is the first law: "as the fining pot is to silver, and as the furnace is to gold, so is a wise man to his praise," or—so a man verifies what is said of him, whether it be true or false. And though Moses should write or God declare it to be otherwise, if the light that lighteth my soul declares that it is not, it passes by me as but the tradition of an older day. So whatsoever is said of Christ in any Gospel whatsoever, let him but be born in you, let the inward spiritual Christ be born in a man, then this spiritual Christ is the verifier of himself, he himself holds a sublime council and determines the canon. So whilst we are thankful for the services of all scholars, yet, just as by that instinct which, when somebody tells you something of your mother which the sweet image of her life that is woven into your heart makes it impossible for you to believe, you believe it not; so there are things said about Christ, which from my conception of him I cannot accept as true. And no Pope infallible, no spirit from another world, no prophets—not one of them can persuade me of it.

Now we come to understand what true Rationalism is—verifying God by himself. And he who is duly exercised by devout study and by the perpetual endeavour to receive this light of God into himself; he it is who becomes a visible Council of Nice, he it is who determines what is true and what is not true, what is canonical and what is uncanonical.

And what did this Christ that verified himself do?

"Here in Bethlehem, there in Jerusalem, held in the loving Father-Mother's hand, he groped about a world sunk by crime into stainfulness, that he might bring forth the last piece of silver, the strayed sheep; that he might hold it up and show it to the Father and say, Lo! see what I have done. The sheep that have gone astray—these I bring with me.

"This is the glorious gospel of the Glad Tidings of God; the marvellous fascination God feels for sinners, put even to a length which it is almost impossible to follow:—There is more joy in the presence of the angels over one sinner that repenteth than over ninety and nine just persons that never went astray! It is hardly believable. Just fancy, now, ninety and nine just persons, all in a row! What a sight! Ninety-nine saints! Members of Churches! Ninety-nine righteous people all saved; all ready to-morrow to do any amount of thanking God that they are not like us! But is there any attraction in them? Not to me. But then possibly I have got dusty, having rolled away so far from them."

And actually in the place where he had been brought up he told the people that though there were many widows in Israel, yet was Elias sent to the woman of Sarepta, and then in matchless fashion we are told of how the master was hooted from the town. He had questioned the "election" of the chosen people. And thus George Dawson comments upon the narrative:—

I will admit if you please that God made a very peculiar covenant with Abraham. If it please you to say so we will admit that the Almighty finger delivered it unto Abraham as a Jew. But watch the prophet break the seal, tear the charter to pieces, and throw the thing to the winds! And what did Christ do? He spent nine-tenths of his teaching over the one point, the meaning of which was—down with the chosen people; call in the ragamuffins, the pagans, the unabrahamitic. This is the man who came out of the streets into the wedding-feast. Everywhere the cry is, Bring in the unelect. If your theology is based upon election—that God has favourites—hear this proclamation, that no longer has God any exclusive love for the children of Abraham. That doctrine you are foolish enough to spend thought upon, the doctrine of election, is exploded. I have known a good deal about covenants and elect people in my youth [G.D. was a student of Glasgow University]. The more north you get, the more you hear of covenants. But what is it all? If God himself tear the covenant (if he ever did elect the Jews) and if the Jew himself revoked it and called it in, who are you to set up a doctrine of election? Of course I believe in election. You cannot call six children together but one is elected to be king or queen. All through life there is election; all through life there is reprobation. But as for any special doctrine of election, such as the Jews believed in, all that was torn up at Nazareth.

It all comes of want of charity. Is not this a bit of real experience:—

The bitterest disappointments of a teacher's life are to see how very little of this love there is in the Christianity of our times. Is it not notorious that Christians are no better than anybody else if you offend against them? You have no more chance of getting a tolerant judgment from them for your first sin than from the publican. I would rather trust myself with persons who are not professors of religion than with those who are. There is no more security from the tongue of a woman who has "received Jesus" than from any other. I have known "holy" talebearers! I have seen hives of scandal among Christians. I have found them to be as deeply dipped in scandal as any of us poor worldlings. The best companions that I have met with on life's dusty road have been the lowly, the true hearted, the tender; those who, like that poor publican, have smote upon their breasts, and uttered but one sentence, and that sentence this: God be merciful to me a sinner. My experience has rather made me incline to walk with the sinners, for I have found them better company than the saints—fuller of long-suffering, charity, and mercy.

As we turn these pages we hear the teacher's voice casting scorn upon revivalism and all such nonsense, yet never omitting to speak the true word. As we close, the words that ring most loudly in our ears are those which preach the true doctrine of Communism and proclaim the Authentic Gospel.

Let every man judge his own heart to what degree the love of God has entered it, for it is to that degree that he will be willing that all things should be common, especially the highest and greatest things. Some men smile at this doctrine and think that we mean the dividing of money. Who asked them to divide their money with the community? And yet the moment you say anything about Pentecost they exclaim, What, am I to share my property with everybody? Their property perish with them! Is that all you want to share? Is that all you dream about? No! keep your soul-damning riches to yourself. I no more ask a man to share his money with me than I ask him to share his body with me. No! keep it yourself. Give me the free sunshine of God, and keep your gold-shine; I don't want it. The free spirit of God is mine, and no man can take that from me. Free libraries; free picture galleries; free roads; free churches; free speech; cheap books,—all these we have won, and we shall win more yet. So you may keep your old purse, I don't want it. The words of the wise; the songs of the poets; the paintings of the great artists; the daisy by the roadside; the lily of the valley; the song of the cuckoo; the voice of the thrush; the logic of St. Paul; the sweet heart of the Lord Christ—let these be common; and you may keep your gold to yourself.

Christianity is the death blow of privilege; the scorner of pedigree; the mocker of kings; the ridiculer of fine linen. It turns its back upon all these things, and says when thou makest a feast call the poor, the maimed, the lame, the halt, the blind; for they cannot recompense thee. So to some of you who, like myself, once had dreams—dreams born too much of man's impatience, and too little of the patience of God—I say, the dream is not a fool's dream; be not impatient, it will come true. For, remember the Christian religion means this; the opening of the gate of heaven to all men, to whomsoever will seek it. "Come unto me; yea come buy wine and milk without money and without price." It is the religion (whose first miracle was to turn water into wine, for humble people; it gave back the father to the prodigal and the prodigal unto the father. So slowly, but surely, it will bring back the pentecostal spirit; not with a mighty rushing wind, or with useless tongues, but with the sweetness of charity and loving kindness.

You would do well to get it into your plans of daily life, that the day will come, when all the nations of Europe shall be pentecostal, and shall be together; for they shall have passed from feudalism to federalism, and Pentecost shall come. And the Custom-house shall be abolished; for all these things shall pass away. And all the nations shall be "together," and the spirit of the Lord shall be upon them, and they shall "have all things common"; and they shall "sell their possessions and goods" that there may be enough and for all. So dream on, my brother, if these be your dreams, for God is with them. Drop no phantasy of youth, except this—to think that every blossom must bear fruit. Some blossoms must fall, for the tree could not bear all the fruit. The blooms that came out of the pentecostal love were a prophecy of that Spirit of God which is given without measure to those who seek it, and a prophecy also of the ultimate destiny of mankind.

But we must labour for the fulfilment of this prophecy—therefore, having held sweet converse with the master Spirit, and being renewed in the spirit of our minds, let us work while it is day.

SUNDAY OPENING OF MUSEUMS, ART GALLERIES, &c.

On Sunday afternoon last the Rev. H. R. Haweis delivered an address on the above subject, in St. George's Hall, Langham-place, to a large and appreciative audience. He commenced by saying that what the ratepayers paid for they ought to have. These National Institutions are supported by everybody's money, and as working men cannot conveniently visit them on week days, they ought to be open on Sundays. Some people say that by opening them you deprive the working man of his church, or his beer, or his day of rest. These objections, however, are like soap bubbles—there is nothing in them. You cannot get the working man away from church in large numbers, for the Clergy so far have not been successful in getting them in.

The lecturer expressed his deep sense of the value of Sunday as a day of rest, of worship, and of innocent recreation and enjoyment. Various ideas, however, were entertained as to the best way of observing Sunday. Many Englishmen think that foreigners make it too much a day of pleasure; and on the other hand foreigners visiting England, and especially Scotland, think that with us it is too much a day of dullness and drunkenness. Some time ago a meeting of ministers and philanthropists was held at Geneva, and one subject of discussion was the better observance of Sunday. To secure this object, however, no one was bold enough to suggest the closing of Museums and Picture Galleries on that day.

The Sabbatarians make two objections to the opening of museums on Sundays. First, there is the indifference argument. They say the working people do not want them opened. But many people do not want what is good for them. Many poor people do not like to live in model lodging or dwelling houses. They would rather live in slums, where they could quarrel and drink, without being subject to supervision, or a code of regulations. Many children do not like their books, and they strongly object to being washed. Nevertheless we teach them to read and write, and accustom them to habits of cleanliness. At present, a minority only of working men may appreciate museums and picture galleries; but by education and training this minority may grow into a majority. Some time ago a petition against the opening of museums on Sundays was said to be signed by 625,000 working people. On examination, however, it was found that 150,000 of these were school children, and that in many cases the teachers had signed the names en masse. It is ascertained that, as a rule, representative bodies of organised working men are in favour of opening museums, free libraries, &c., on Sunday. In any part of London a free, open, well advertised meeting of all classes can be got together, and resolutions passed in favour of Sunday opening. In a variable climate like ours, when on a large proportion of Sundays in the year it is unsafe to venture into the parks, it would be a great boon to many to be able to go into a picture gallery, a museum, concert room, free library, or other place of instruction and innocent recreation. As a clergyman, he was in favour of utilising the churches, at other hours than those of Divine Service, as centres of an educational and refining influence to all comers. At his own church he had first-class pictures on view, and after the evening service up to ten o'clock a performance of sacred music, to which all are welcome. Some of the newspaper writers had compared him to Barnum, and called him a show-man, because he used his church in this way; but he did not mind being called a show-man as long as he could make his church the centre of an intellectual, moral, spiritual, and refining influence to the neighbourhood in which it was situated.

The other argument against the Sunday opening of museums may be called the labour scare. It is said there will be a great increase of Sunday labour. This, however, the lecturer thought was much exaggerated. The Sunday Society had one free public exhibition at which 3,330 people were present, and only two attendants were required. Altogether they have had eleven public exhibitions on Sundays, attended by 17,800 persons. When people frequent the museums and picture galleries we hope the public-houses will not be so full, and that eventually fewer policemen will be required to take up the drunken and disorderly.

The lecturer said there had been a great advance in public opinion on the subject of Sunday opening during his recollection. In 1854 a motion on this subject in the House of Commons was only supported by forty-eight votes; in 1874 it gained eighty-nine votes. In 1880 Lord Dunraven's motion for a similar object was only lost by seven votes. On that occasion Mr. W. E. Forster said that after a very careful study of the whole subject in all its bearing he would vote for Sunday opening.

The lecturer read an extract from a letter of Mr. Chamberlain, in which he stated that the opening of the Free Library and Art Gallery at Birmingham was very successful, and that their benefits were fully appreciated by the public. In Manchester and all the other towns of England, large and small, where the experiment had been tried, the result was satisfactory. In London the Kew Gardens and the two museums, Hampton Court, and the Painted Hall at Greenwich Hospital are open on Sunday; and he hoped when Mr. Howard brought on his motion in the House of Commons, of which he had given notice, for the opening of all museums and galleries supported by national funds on the day of rest—that the friends of this movement would be present in strong array, and carry the motion with a triumphant majority. J. S.

WANDSWORTH.—We are glad to find that an addition to the number of our Unitarian chapels in London has just been made. On Sunday last, Feb. 26, as announced in our advertisement columns, a small chapel for Unitarian worship was opened at Tonsley-hill, under the auspices of the London District Unitarian Society, by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, M.A. The attendance was large, completely filling the building. There were several friends from the Brixton and Stamford-street congregation, and a good many strangers. Miss Humphreys, late of the Notting-hill congregation, presided at the harmonium with excellent taste. After the service a number of friends interested in the movement remained, and gave in their names as willing to give it their personal support. The opening services at eleven A.M. will be continued with a collection after each for the next four Sundays. We congratulate the District Society on having made so favourable a commencement.

MR. W. E. BARKER, Mortimer Memorial Board School Scholar, Carpenter and Beaufoy Scholar of the City of London School, Foundation Scholar of Trinity College, Cambridge (who, it will be remembered, was senior classic last year), has obtained a University Scholarship at Cambridge, a distinction never before gained by any pupil of the City of London School.

Occasional Notes.

HER gracious Majesty the Queen has deserved so well of her subjects during her long reign by a life of remarkable purity and simplicity that not even the sternest Republican or the bitterest Socialist could wish her any harm. It is a foregone conclusion, therefore, that the contemptible miscreant who on Thursday last fired his revolver at her must be a lunatic. No man has any excuse for crime of any kind in this country on the plea that he is suffering from hunger, and it will probably turn out that a crazy thirst for notoriety is at the bottom of this attempt, as in the case of most of its predecessors. The whole country is filled with admiration at the coolness and self-possession of the Queen and her daughter Princess Beatrice, and the dastardly outrage will serve to strengthen the prevailing sentiment of loyalty, and to deepen—if that indeed were possible—the personal attachment felt for her Majesty and the Royal Family.

A DIVINE, well-known to and highly respected by all our readers, has just received an accession of academical rank. With great pleasure we record that the degree of LL.D. has been conferred by the University of Dublin upon our friend the Rev. James Drummond, B.A., T.C.D., Professor of Ecclesiastical History, &c., in Manchester New College. We heartily congratulate Dr. Drummond on his well-deserved honour, which reminds us that the honorary degree of D.D. was conferred by the University of Aberdeen upon his revered father, the late Dr. Drummond, of Dublin. Since the time of the late Dr. Hutton, who was also the son of a Dublin minister, we cannot call to mind any instance of a father and son in the Unitarian ministry both possessing this designation. We also read with pleasure the following announcement of academical honours conferred on other well-known friends:—At the final meeting of the Senatus of the Queen's University, held on the 1st of February, the honorary degree of M.A. and LL.D. were conferred upon A. M. Porter, Esq., B.A., Q.C., M.P., her Majesty's Solicitor-General. The honorary degree of LL.D. was at that time conferred upon Edward Gardner, Esq., LL.B., and Hugh Hyndman, Esq., LL.B., both of whom had been members of the Committee of Convocation.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Daily News calls attention to the excessive clerical fees charged in some of the Metropolitan cemeteries. Recently a friend of his selected a grave in the consecrated portion of a cemetery, and being a Nonconformist his own minister performed the burial rites, and notwithstanding that the services of the incumbent were not required, a demand was made on his behalf for £8. He adds that where a Nonconformist minister performs the ceremony on the interment of a Nonconformist in the consecrated portion of a parochial cemetery, such cemetery not being for the parish from which the body was removed, it is evident from the language of the 32nd sec. of 11 and 16 Vict., c. 85, that no ecclesiastical fees can lawfully be demanded in such a case. Recently the Oldham Burial Board asked counsel's opinion on precisely the same question. Mr. L. M. Aspland, of the Temple, whose opinion was given, says, "The clergy of the Established Church are not entitled to the burial fees where the funeral rites are performed by Nonconformist ministers on the interment of non-parishioners in the consecrated portion of the cemeteries."

OUR eminently absurd and often very funny spiritualistic contemporary Light announces that as a result of the conferences held in London at the invitation of Professor Barrett, of Dublin, in January last, a new association has been established, under the designation of "The Society for Psychical Research." The president, according to the same authority, is Mr. Henry Sidgwick, of Trinity College, Cambridge; the vice-presidents Mr. A. J. Balfour, M.P., Mr. J. R. Holland, M.P., and Professors Barrett and Balfour Stewart, the Rev. Stainton Moses, and Mr.

Hensleigh Wedgwood. On the council, besides some of these gentlemen, are Mr. Edmund Gurney and Mr. F. W. H. Myers, of Trinity College, Cambridge; Mr. Charles C. Massey, Mr. Walter R. Browne, Mr. E. Dawson Rogers, Mrs. Boole, Dr. Wyld, Dr. C. Lockhart Robertson, and several others. The main object of the association is stated to be "to unite students and inquirers in an organised body, with the view of promoting the investigation of certain obscure phenomena, including those commonly known as psychical, mesmeric, or spiritualistic." Mr. Henry Sidgwick was the President of the "late lamented" Free Christian Union, which, it may be remembered, expired of inanition just one year after an untimely birth.

LAST week a committee of Cardinals belonging to the congregations of the Apostolic Penitentiary and the Inquisition met at the Vatican, under the presidency of the Pope, to discuss whether the Catholics in Italy may compatibly with their religious duty take part in political elections. After manifesting considerable difference of opinion, the Cardinals finally replied negatively on all the heads of the formula drawn up and submitted to them by his Holiness. The Cardinals could hardly do otherwise, seeing that the whole political current of the country is running strongly against "Vaticanism."

In an article on the ecclesiastical Bills in Parliament the Liberator says:—"There are two Bills which require the prompt and serious attention of Londoners. One is the Parochial Charities (London) Bill, and the other the London Parochial Charities Bill. The latter is a private Bill, but both are referred to a Select Committee. In one respect they are alike; inasmuch as they provide that, while the secular charities which are now wasted shall be applied to unobjectionable secular purposes, all the ecclesiastical charities of the like kind shall be applied to various Church of England purposes. The Bills are, in fact, Church Extension Bills, and if the inhabitants of the metropolis are alive to their own interests they will make the introduction of these Bills an occasion for a thorough overhauling of their own ecclesiastical affairs."

THE REV. JOHN GLASSE, of Old Greyfriars, has just delivered in Glasgow, under the auspices of the Sunday Society, the lecture on "Spinoza." he was prohibited from giving in his own church in Edinburgh. Professor Nichol, who on a recent Sunday delivered from the same platform an apology for the moral character of Burns, presided, and expressed the hope that no harm would come to the rev. gentleman from his boldness.

At the meeting held on Tuesday at St. James' Palace, to promote the establishment of a Royal College of Music, there were some interesting references to the progress of Church Music. The Duke of Edinburgh said:—"Sacred music is at present the one class of music which, owing to the careful training of the Church and other religious denominations and the religious instinct of the people, has obtained in this country a far wider influence than that of any other class. There is hardly a village in the United Kingdom in which the religious services do not testify to the innate love of music to be found in the English people, and to the excellence which might be attained by a better and more complete instruction. This is one of the first wants I trust the college will supply. Our free foundation will encourage the love of music by holding out to every able choir the expectation that some one or more of its members may obtain a scholarship conferring on the student the advantages of a free education and in some cases of free maintenance." The Archbishop of Canterbury dwelt upon the fact that amid those great diversities of opinion which exist among religious men in this free country there is a wonderful power to unite us together in this particular department of our worship to which the Duke of Edinburgh alluded. We could not, he added, very safely borrow each others' sermons, for we might become very unorthodox; nay, it would hardly do to use our forms of worship without any discrimination alike in all our places of worship; but this, thank God! we are able to do—to use the same hymns and to join in the same tunes, and thus music is really harmonious in uniting us together in the highest acts of our religious worship. Mr. Gladstone said his Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh has said, and truly said, that you can now hardly go to a village church in this country without discerning in the service of that church signs of the appreciation of the people for music. But how stood the matter fifty years ago? I must bear this testimony to our Nonconforming brethren, that I believe music has always been with them a powerful instrument for cherishing the religious life. But with respect to music among the congregations of the Church of England fifty years ago, setting apart a very few and setting apart the services of the cathedrals, which still remained as a witness in behalf of better things, I cannot use any epithet weaker than any which may, perhaps, shock the meeting, when I say that the music in the ordinary churches of the Church of England fifty years ago was a disgrace to the people and to the country. I remember one particular case, not of an obscure village, but of a village church hard by one of the ancestral mansions of this country, and where the benefice was held by a member of the family inhabiting that mansion, who, in utter despair of redeeming the music of the parish from its disgrace, adopted the alternative of extinguishing it altogether, so that the Sunday morning service proceeded from beginning to end without a note of music, and, bad as this was, I do not hesitate to say that it was better than to be doomed to listen to some of the grotesque performances which usually characterised the attempts of that period; and, finally, Sir Stafford Northcote said he came from a county where, at least in parts of it, there had been singular and even ludicrous illustrations of the depth of ignorance into which the people had fallen. In one parish in Devonshire, a member of his family, an old lady highly respected, was always spoken of in the village as "Madam," and when the hymn was given out by the clerk, the simple words were used, "Let Madam and I sing to the praise and glory of God." In another place the advice given by the clerk to the choir was to "bide by the words and let the tune take its course." But even in these dark places in the country evidences remained that music had at one time been more widely diffused than it seemed to be at present. Great advances were, however, being made, and there was a growing feeling that the time was ripe for gathering together the scattered agencies for the musical education of the people.

THE following interesting bits of academical news are taken from the Christian Register of Boston, U.S.:—"The Harvard Divinity School has made another step in the direction of non-sectarian theological education by inviting the Rev. Alexander Mackenzie, D.D., of Cambridge, to give a course of lectures on 'The Theology of the New Testament' from the orthodox standpoint. The lectures will be given on Thursdays in Divinity Hall at three P.M."

MR. EPHRAIM EMERTON, of Cambridge, has been appointed to the Winn Professorship of Ecclesiastical History at Harvard University. Mr. Emerton has been for six years past in the service of the College. He is an ardent student and a skilful teacher, and has a wide acquaintance with German scholarship.

MR. HOLMAN HUNT, the distinguished artist, is to preside at the meeting at Exeter Hall in favour of the Deceased Wife's Sister Bill. We believe that this is the first occasion that he has appeared on a public platform in a public capacity.

M. VICTOR HUGO completed his eightieth year on Sunday. He was born a weakly infant when the century was a year old early on a February morning at Besançon. His villa in the avenue called after him was on Sunday in a flutter of joyous animation. From all parts of France, Europe, and from beyond the seas and oceans telegrams of congratulation came pouring in. Bouquets and birthday gifts were innumerable. Deputations and visitors were passing in and out in rapid succession during the greater part of the day. The Government, the late and the present, were represented by MM. Gambetta, Proust, Spuller, and Ferry. At the Théâtre Français, by order of the Minister of Public Instruction, a gratis representation of Hernani was given, and M. Coppée's poem on Hugo recited. At the Gaiété there was the drama of Ninety-three. By way of prologue Madame Marie Laurent declaimed Manuel's verses on Les Misérables. Jeanne and Georges Hugo in the evening did the honours of their grandfather's villa, at which after a family dinner there was in the greenhouse the inauguration of his bust by Vilain. It stands opposite the bust by David d'Angers, which was executed fifty-five years ago. There have been also public recitations of poems selected from "L'Art d'Etre Grandpère," by Madame Ernst, professor of declamation at the Sorbonne.

MR. TENNYSON's poem in Macmillan's Magazine for this month, on "The Charge of the Heavy Brigade at Balaklava," can hardly be said to rival the remarkable poem of which it is really a counterpart. It has the ring of the Master in it, but is not so intense and powerful as "The Charge of the Light Brigade." The gallant three hundred of the Heavy Brigade were the Scotch Greys and the 2nd squadron of the Inniskillings. Four of the number, Scarlett, the commander; Elliot, his aide-de-camp, a trumpeter, and an orderly—the commander far on ahead—and the three others mentioned following with force,

Fought for their lives in the narrow gap they had made,

Four amid thousands; and up the hill, up the hill

Galloped the gallant three hundred, the Heavy Brigade.

They were the masters—the "Victors and Lords" of the hour and the difficulty. Upon those Russian hordes they Fell like a cannon-shot,

Burst like a thunder-bolt,
Crash'd like a hurricane,
Broke thro' the mass from below,
Drove thro' the midst of the foe,
Plunged up and down, to and fro,
Rode flashing blow upon blow,
Brave Inniskillens and Greys
Whirling their sabres in circles of light!

Until

The Russian surged and waver'd, and reel'd

Up the hill, up the hill, up the hill, out of the field

Over the brow and away.

Fine as these lines are, we cannot but regret that the Poet Laureate is again casting the glamour of his genius over one of the least glorious and most needless wars of modern times.

In the Christian Recorder (Philadelphia) the organ of the "African Methodist Episcopal Church," we find the following editorial tribute to Dr. Bellows:—

In the years immediately following the surrender at Appomattox, and when our church was considerably aided by the Unitarians of the East, in company with others we had occasion to meet him quite often in council. If our recollection serves us aright, first in the church presided over by Dr. Os-good, and lastly in his own beautiful edifice. We can never forget the thoughtful kindness with which we were received. A thorough gentleman, he left nothing undone to make us feel that we were at home. He conversed with you, and not at you; nor was there any necessity to raise the eye to catch the kindly smile of his.

We last saw Dr. Bellows at Wilberforce in the summer of 1878, at the dedicatory of services. He was accompanied by his companion in arms, Dr. Edward Everett Hale, a man of singularly similar disposition. Seated around the large table in the dining-room of the University, where were seated these, with scores of our first men, Bishop Payne at the head of the table, and President Lee at the foot, we can never forget the wise words and goodly which fell from their lips, especially from the lips of the eminent dead, who there made, as it were, confession for the sins of all the white people in the land against the coloured. Upon his heart they seemed to rest, and by their sheer weight force out the most penitential words we ever heard uttered. The impression made was scarcely less than marvellous. All on our side the house were attracted by them. It was as though a king had uncrowned himself.

It is stated that Mr. Herbert Spencer intends to pay a visit to the United States early in the autumn.

Reviews.

Life, Letters, and Journal of Sir Charles Lyell, Bart., Author of "Principles of Geology," &c. Edited by his Sister-in-Law, Mrs. Lyell. In Two Volumes. With Portraits. London: J. Murray. 1881.

[FIRST NOTICE.]

The eminent men who asked Dean Stanley, in 1875, that Sir Charles Lyell should be buried in Westminster Abbey, stated that "for upwards of half a century he has exercised a most important influence on the progress of geological science, and for the last twenty-five years he has been the most prominent geologist in the world, equally eminent for the extent of his labours and the breadth of his philosophical views." These volumes will be specially interesting to those who share his love of science; but we can testify that they will reward the general reader. "His cultivated mind and classical taste, his keen interest in the world of politics, and in the social progress and education of his country, and the many opportunities he enjoyed of friendly intercourse with the most leading characters of his age, make the letters abound in lively anecdotes and pictures of society, constantly interspersed with his enthusiastic devotion to Natural History." (Preface.) The editor does not attempt any narrative of his life, but before some of the chapters (which are composed of letters and journals) she gives a concise statement of its leading events.

"Charles Lyell was born Nov. 14, 1797, at Kinnordy, the family estate in Forfarshire;" but when he was only a few months old his father removed to Hampshire. Mr. Lyell, sen., was a man of cultivated tastes, and published a work on the Cryptogamia, which, as his son found, was well known by Humboldt, De Candolle, &c. In later life he devoted himself to Dante, and published several works on that great poet. Mrs. Lyell, a woman of superior sense, was of a Yorkshire family. In 1834 Charles Lyell married the daughter of Mr. Leonard Horner, F.R.S., and at her request he wrote an account of his boyhood, which abounds in amusing details. He was at three schools. "Of all the dreaded penances which we had to undergo (at the first of them) we thought going to church, sitting whole hours doing nothing, incomparably the worst; far more intolerable than lessons, in which I had always some mixture of pleasure. We took marbles in our pockets to play at 'odd or even' to relieve the tedium, and many other devices, for which we often got punished." At Midhurst, to which he was sent when he was twelve, because there was no vacancy at Winchester, there were about seventy boys; and it had the characteristics of the public schools of those days. He unwillingly learnt to fight: from one of his battles he was "black and blue all over," and suffered for many days; and his remembrance of the brutalities he witnessed was not agreeable. He also learnt gambling and petty larcenies—to procure food when he had lost his breakfast in bets with schoolfellows! A friend of his father's, Lady Ramsay, frequently asked him and his brother to visit her on Sundays—"a great treat, principally because we got off one of the churches, which all boys abhor, and then we got liberty to walk where we liked. We employed the time chiefly in hunting for the eggs of partridges and pheasants. It was a great game country. . . . A vague notion that, if detected, we might be transported to Botany Bay for this kind of poaching added much in our estimation to the superior flavour of these eggs over those of a barn-door hen." We are reminded of what Shakespeare says:—

"That in the captain's but a choleric word, Which in the soldier is rank blasphemy."

A labourer's son, who had been guilty of these freaks, might not have had reason to look back on them with amusement!

In his eleventh year his lungs were affected, and he was kept at home for some months. He was fond of a country life, and soon acquired a taste for watching and collecting insects—especially butterflies. As he was often ridiculed for his taste as unmanly, it was a consolation to him to find a number of expensive books on the subject in his father's library; the Latin works, full of hard terms, showed that learned men had been devoted to these studies! Although he did not, in after life, pay special attention to entomology, we find many references to it in his letters, especially to his sisters, who were collectors.

He entered Exeter College, Oxford, at the age of seventeen; and when he took his B.A. degree, in 1819, he obtained a second class in classical honours. In his father's library he had found Bakewell's Geology; and this prepared him to take an interest in the course of lectures by Dr. Buckland, professor of Geology at Oxford, who was then at the height of his popularity. He formed many acquaintances among those who were fond of natural history, and took several tours, in which his powers of observation were exercised. As a boy he had been fond of writing verses, and some "Lines on Staffa" (p. 55) show how his imagination was excited by natural phenomena. In 1818 he made a tour as far as Italy, with his father, mother, and two sisters; branching off from them to visit the remarkable devastations caused by the river Dranse (which joins the Rhone near Martigny): it had been blocked up by a glacier, and formed a lake, which had burst a few weeks before. His father, who was a man of property, seems to have encouraged his taste for travelling, which naturally aided his geological acquirements. When he was twenty-two years of age he became a fellow of the Linnean Society, and also of the Geological Society, of which (in 1823) he was elected Secretary. In 1826 he became F.R.S.

After leaving Oxford he was entered at Lincoln's-inn, and studied law in a special pleader's office; but, owing to the weakness of his sight, he was recommended to desist for a time from reading. He was called to the Bar in 1825, and went the Western Circuit for two years. He had lost so much time from interruptions, when he was regarded as a man of leisure, that he found a great advantage in ostensibly following a profession. He was intimate with Lockhart, the editor of the Quarterly; and in 1827 he contributed a review of Scrope's "Geology of Central France." He wrote to his father, "Leonard Horner [whose daughter he married five years after] is in town from Edinburgh, very apropos to keeping me right in my article, as he is a great education man as well as geologist. His gratitude to me for having got into the Quarterly Review an article on the liberal side of geology is very agreeable. He is eager to serve me." "In 1828, when he had already planned and made notes for the 'Principles of Geology,' Mr. Lyell set out on a tour to Auvergne and Northern Italy, with Mr. Murchison; and after parting from him in Lombardy, he continued his journey alone to Rome, Naples, and Sicily. The results of this tour appear partly in scientific memoirs, jointly by his fellow-traveller and himself, and partly in the 'Principles of Geology.'" Mrs. Murchison accompanied them, and was very diligent—sketching, labelling specimens, and making out shells. Lyell gave an interesting description of the scenery around Mont Dore, and was pleased with the peasantry, who seemed the happiest he had ever seen. "In the mountains a large portion do not believe that Napoleon is dead—especially the old soldiers."

In 1830 the first volume was published of the "Principles of Geology;" the second volume followed in 1832, and the third in 1833. In it he maintains the position that the former changes on the earth's surface have been produced by existing causes. He was aware that his views might give great offence to the religious world, as well as to many geologists; and was naturally very anxious as to the reception they might meet. He resolved, however, not to waste his time and temper in controversies. It was a great satisfaction to him that Mr. Scrope, whom he had previously defended in the Quarterly, was to review his book there; and he wrote to him several letters, while engaged in that work. The review, though it found some objections to parts of the book, proved a most valuable support; and Mr. Murray, who was the publisher both of the "Geology" and the Quarterly, gave Mr. Scrope £100. Geological science received a great stimulus, and Mr. Lyell's work was followed by many others. It was a proof that religious bigotry was disarmed, that he was elected professor of geology at King's College; and notwithstanding the Reform agitation, his lectures were talked of all over the town. Just as his book was published, June, 1830, he took a geological journey with Captain Cooke, R.N., through Western France to the Pyrenees, and thence, alone, to Spain. The elections were then going forward in Vendée, Bordeaux, Toulouse, &c. There were then only twenty thousand electors out of the thirty millions of French. "Never were people in a greater state of excitement on political grounds than the French at this moment, yet never in our country towns were Assizes conducted with more seriousness and quiet. There is no occasion to make the rabble drunk." He re-entered France, Aug. 7, and found that in his absence the great revolution had taken place, of which he had heard nothing in Spain, though he had observed much darkness and mystery. He was in Paris in October, when great excitement was caused by a proposal to abolish the punishment of death, which was regarded as a ruse to protect the ex-Ministers:—

The lower class, who suffered most in the fight, look on the ex-ministers as their prisoners of war, and are exasperated at the notion of their escaping scot free. So they came, as they say, to serenade "Le citoyen Philippe, propriétaire, No. 200, Rue St. Honoré." Several thousand of them sung the "Marseillaise" and "Parisienne" alternately, with such energy, that when two diligences came down our narrow street, and when we should hardly have heard a musket under the window, we heard every note. Anything but cannon would have been drowned. It was like the roar of several tempests, bellowing in correct time. There was a ferocity in it that was more horrid than anything I ever could have conceived, yet we were six times the distance of the king's rooms. After keeping up this for three or four hours, there was a call of "Vincennes," the prison where the ex-ministers are. . . . Luckily the General at Vincennes was prepared for them, and they could do nothing. . . . The king was a good deal alarmed, but acted with spirit and prudence, and no one fears now, and a reaction in favour of the king has been produced. A small mob last night, who collected there, went away cheering him, upon his coming out on foot, and saying "that they should have justice but not vengeance."—Vol. I. p. 309.

Lyell thought that science suffered when Cuvier and other philosophers engaged in politics or place-hunting, but he found in Deshayes "the first fossil conchologist in Europe," a man who had given up his profession and worldly prospects to devote himself to books and shells. His bearing was so independent that Lyell had not thought of paying him for his time; but when he knew his circumstances he felt at liberty to engage him for three months, to teach him conchology. He had no idea that the study could be so interesting; and Deshayes well-arranged collection of thirty-five thousand individuals and eight thousand five hundred species, showed him how much was to be known.* He got him to name those he had himself collected. As Lyell advanced in his studies, he found how other branches of natural history bore upon geology, and when he was nearly seventy (1866) he "had to go to school in astronomy."

In 1835 he was elected President of the Geological Society; but he resigned the post as soon as he decorously could. He wrote to Mr. C. Darwin, Dec. 30, 1836:—

Don't accept any official scientific place if you can avoid it, and tell no one that I gave you this advice, as they would all cry out against me as the preacher of anti-patriotic principles. I fought against the calamity of being President as long as I could. All has gone on smoothly, and it has not cost me more time than I anticipated; but my question is, whether the time annihilated by learned bodies ("par les affaires administratives") is balanced by any good they can do. Fancy exchanging Herschel at the Cape for Herschel as President of the Royal Society, which he so narrowly escaped being; and I voting for him too! I hope to be forgiven for that.—Vol. I. p. 475.

At that period the habits of the upper class were less temperate than they afterwards became. More than once he complains of loss of work, from the wine he had to drink ("I was as temperate as the rest, but that is not saying much"). After an anniversary dinner of the Geological Society (1838), at which there was very eloquent speaking ("Sedgwick was uncommonly splendid"), "Lord Cole pressed me so hard to go and eat pterodactyl (alias woodcock) pie at his rooms, that I went with . . . and there we were till two o'clock, fines inflicted of bumpers of cognac on all who talked any 'ology. Cigar smoke so strong as half to turn one's stomach. I lost the enjoyment of Murchison's dinner next day, and for five days did only half-a-day's work or less. It is a serious warning to me how careful I must be." Despite these drawbacks he greatly enjoyed congenial intercourse; and his letters contain many pleasant records of the sayings of his eminent acquaintances. His social position probably helped him to promote a taste for science among the upper classes. He had known by experience the narrowing influence of the old system of education at our public schools and universities, and he attributed to it the indifference to science shown by the nobility. Although the Royal Society had many titled fellows, and was fond of having a titled President, he recognised very few as having attained any rank as philosophers. The late Prince Consort, however, won his admiration by his range of knowledge and his enlightened views. Sir Charles Lyell's descriptions of his visits to Osborne and Balmoral will be read with pleasure. The late Princess Alice asked him to dedicate his "Antiquity of Man" to her.—Vol. II. p. 375.

* In 1856 he visited M. Barrande, a Frenchman, at Prague, who in twenty-four years had spent a fortune in quarrying the older rocks for fossils. "In order to explain the eighteen metamorphoses of a trilobite called Sao hirsuta, he collected twenty thousand specimens, and they cost £200."—Vol. II. p. 224.

We hope next week to return to these interesting volumes. R. L. C.

Ecce Spiritus: a Statement of the Spiritual Principles of Jesus as the Law of Life. Boston, U.S.: George H. Ellis. 1882.

There seems to be a propensity to imitation among authors as well as among more ordinary mortals. If they follow one another in nothing else they often echo one another in their titles. Some eighteen years ago Professor Seely published "Ecce Homo," which, as a work of rare genius, appealed to the mind of the time with such power that a host of pens, both hostile and friendly, were stirred into operation. It presented Jesus to the reader as a human being, and possessed the qualities of clear thinking and devout emotion to such an extent that it evoked the sympathy of the powerful mind of W. E. Gladstone, High Churchman though he is, who entered the lists as a defender against its assailants. Then began the imitators to play on its title. Even its antagonists have done so, and first and foremost appeared Dr. Parker's pretentious book, "Ecce Deus," which defends the Deity of Jesus. It received a passing notice from those who are attracted by noise, but is now fast hastening to the oblivion to which its doctrine is destined. Next came Mr. Higginson's "Ecce Messias,"—the production of industrious and conscientious scholarship, but founded on principles of exposition, which a larger and deeper knowledge of New Testament times is showing to be untenable. How many sermons have been preached and published with the title "Ecce" This or "Ecce" That, or how many essays have been written with "Ecce" something on their first page no man can number. And now from across the Atlantic there comes the book before us, "Ecce Spiritus," which purports to be a study of the spirituality, or the inmost and essential life of the man Jesus, and the discovery of the law of his inspiration, and so of that of mankind generally.

The introductory chapter is entitled "The Negative Work and Positive Want of the Nineteenth Century." It is a picture of the wild and whirling tumult of soul in which it is at present wrapped. Yet the writer seems to perceive certain well-defined tendencies in the time which is being "led up of life through nature and the scientist's richest stores and ripest methods to the heart and certainty of divine things." This idea is worked out in his way more fully in his closing chapter, "The Faith of the Future," in which he insists that the Christian Church will "integrate," on the grounds of personality and spirituality rather than as the past has done, build on opinion and creed, or on discipline and ceremony. For Christianity is to keep its hold on mankind, and fulfil its aim in the development and realisation of the spiritual element in man's nature. The first chapter, which we have been led away from for a moment, is an attempt to show that the best minds of the time accept all the facts which science discovers, and yet demand something more, and we presume something different. The revelations of the physical organisation and movements of the stars, the disclosures of the strata of the earth, and its chemical combinations; the wonderful findings of the New Physiology, are not enough for the soul, whatever they may be for the intellect. The soul of the age asks for spiritual bread, in addition to the stone of law concerning rock, muscle, nerve and brain. On page 54 our author asserts that all the faculties and powers a man possesses to make him really religious. These are his words: "It takes all there is of a man to be spiritual—head, heart, limbs, and life; all thought, all emotion, all love; while spirituality is their co-ordination and control." He defines spirituality to be a special sense, akin to the sense of music, and the faculty of apprehending beauty; and as there are persons who are colour-blind, so there are persons who are spirit-blind. He further tries to illustrate his thought by the fact that a great many people have imperfect vision, who are not totally oblivious of the shades and hues of colours. So it is, he contends, in spiritual things. Later on in his pages he changes his figures, and describes spirituality to be "an aim, an attitude, an atmosphere, a dominance of sphere," whatever that may be.

The author, speaking of the Gospels and their writers, and of what they reveal, tells us that they must be read with a prepared mind, that those who peruse them must be able to catch their light by reading between the lines. For "though the writers erred occasionally in their interpretation they never failed in the man. His message and meaning always shine out clearly through the partialness of their comprehension. The true science of God is in the processions of the soul. Experience knows Him, while our intellectual statements only hint at Him. Spirituality alone reveals and commands the spiritual; and for this reason Jesus came a man of few words" (p. 129). So to him who goes to the Gospels with fully prepared mind they will be full of light, even though the authors tripped in their statements sometimes. Thus has our author drunk at the wells of George Fox and his earlier followers, men of eminent piety and great sagacity of their kind, but apt, we think, to read in first what they proceed to extract from the pages of the New Testament. A mind imbued with right principles, it seems to us, wishes to gain nothing from the Gospels but what the writers put there—to get at what they intended to honestly convey—whether he will agree with all the opinions he finds there, or accept all as fact, furnished as such, is, of course, another matter altogether. For to find out what is meant is one thing, and to accept it in the bulk is another; in other words, interpretation and credence are two very different matters. As for spiritual light and life he will rejoice to find them anywhere, but he must have them in his own soul first or he will be able to discern them nowhere else. For light is only for the seeing eye, as love is for the affectionate heart; so spiritual life is only for the spiritual nature.

However, we cannot help thinking that some such preparation is needed for the reader of this book, as the writer indicates is needed in the reader of the New Testament in order to understand it. Ninety-nine out of every hundred of his readers will complain of the vagueness of his utterances. They will find themselves floated along on an extremely pleasant style of its kind, but they will be apt to ask, "What do all these assertions amount to? What do they mean? The author is right in his statement that behind all symbols, whether verbal or physical, there is real power; but his assertions seem to float about in a haze of obscure light—the haze may be golden, but it is none the less haze." And who that has had to try and master the contents could blame the majority of readers for these statements? There is a great deal too much atmosphere in the book. Spirituality may be the Christian's source of power, and certainly is so; but though a poetic haze may be very pleasing to those who are fond of it, or to those whose vision are focused to its demand, yet to the generality of men, a little clear definition would bring more profit. The bulk of the book is assertive; assertion is piled on assertion as if it was intended for explanation or proof or both. The author seems a little at variance with himself on this matter. On p. 63, at the opening of his fifth chapter, he has these words:—

If it were possible to remove at once the idea of vagueness which surrounds the common conception of this word spirituality, it would be seen how much of the difficulty connected with the subject would disappear. Unconsciously our modern thought separates it immediately from everything definite and certain, considering it as lawless and capricious, in some sort a part of the mystic's reverie and the poet's dream. So long as this is so the difficulty is increased of making progress, between superstition on the one hand, and materialism on the other, out into inclusive light and life. It must be taken from the realm of vagaries and shown to be something capable of definite and scientific statement, not as a dogma, but as a law and a principle, before it can accomplish the full work for which our time is hungering. In other words, it must in some degree as far as is possible in the nature of things, and yet always far enough for the comprehension of those spiritually inclined, be stated in the terms of the understanding.

But on p. 119 he seems to think this is impossible, for he says:—"Comte's religion of humanity, or Confucius's worship of ancestors, or the Moslem's faith of Mahomet, will find a statement far more readily than this spirituality, utterly unsensuous of Jesus. . . . Hence it was that Jesus absolutely ignored systematic statement." But to leave this. The whole aim of the book, as we understand it, is to show that while Jesus was a teacher, his chief merit consisted in his being an inspirer. And we take it that this is the real merit of the book, and that it is needful to press this fact upon the mind of Christendom more and more. For in the case of the Gospels more specially referred to in its pages, allegory has so frequently been literalised into history, poetic illustrations hardened into statements of fact, parables turned into dogmas, and words relating to special and temporary circumstances, whose meaning expired with the occasion which called them forth into universal principles, that the Inspirer has been lost in the Authoritative Dogmatist; and Jesus, instead of a soul kindler, has been made the master of thought, the determiner of the creed. Our author, yearning after a loftier ideal, and seeing it burning brightly above him, indeed beyond his reach though not beyond his vision, points to it with such intensity of purpose that clearness of articulation, so far as the understanding is concerned, is not what it ought to be. Here and there are passages of wonderful suggestiveness that light up its pages with clearness and beauty; but we think if the writer had imitated the Master more fully, and been a little more concrete, he would have written every bit as good a book, and one that would have been far more interesting to a majority of readers.

The best part of the book is found in the two chapters on the Immortal Life, though even here we cannot go with him in lamenting that so glorious a fact is embodied in the negative word "Immortal." For, in the first place, some of the grandest realities are indicated by negative terms. The word infinite, for instance, is negative in its form, but the most positive in its meaning. Finite means bounded, confined as to capacity; but prefix the negative in, and the bounds and confines disappear, and all space is opened to us, or the absolute perfection of God Himself, so far as the idea is concerned. In other words, a positive idea, instead of a negative one, is presented by the negative form of the word. So in Immortal, it is death that is the negation, life is the positive; the negative is negated, and we get at the most positive of all the conceptions of man. Our author's idea of the proof of man's immortality is, that the spiritual man rises into such a full realisation of his soul-life of his union with the eternal God that he becomes conscious of immortality. This he works out beautifully and forcibly. In a previous chapter, the tenth, he had shown how like to God man is becoming in these later days in his mode of working; as God thinks creation and it is done, man is more and more operating on the material world, and producing the results of labour by thought, through his inventive powers. So that in mind and soul being like God, the child man is like his father, spirit and immortal.

To those who like a poetic style, and who care to linger and ponder until a book yields its secret, we recommend this work. But to those who wish to snatch a meaning as they fly through the pages they are reading, we say, get it if you like, after reading what we have written.

The Contemporary Review. Strahan and Co.
The Nineteenth Century. Kegan Paul, Trench and Co.

It will be seen that, contrary to our usual practice, we have placed the Contemporary Review first this month. It deserves the preference, for it is decidedly the more interesting number of the two. The first article, on "The Revised Version and its Assailants," by Canon Farrar, is one of the best vindications of the too-often disparaged work of the Revisers that we have yet seen, and the contents on the whole are more varied and attractive than those of its powerful competitor.

Canon Farrar's article is an almost unqualified expression of his deep sense of gratitude to the Revisers. He dismisses almost in a tone of badinage the ponderous indictment of the Quarterly Review, and points out that very much the same objections were urged in 1811 against "our matchless, our incomparable" Authorised Version by Hugh Broughton, Thomas Ward, and other scholarly but impracticable men, of violent prejudice and eccentric erudition, "who were piqued because they had not been placed among the translators"—a pretty direct retort courteous upon Dean Burgon. The scholarly canon then examines in detail the criticisms of Sir Edmund Beckett, who has evidently little critical knowledge of the original, and concludes as follows:—

If I have been right in what I have here advanced, I ask the reader to feel assured that on nearly, if not quite, every other point which has been selected for animadversion there is a very strong, if not an absolutely conclusive answer; and that besides the corrections which have been impugned, but which, in every instance, admit of strong defence, there are passages on every page from which, by universal admission, errors and inaccuracies have, for the first time, been swept away. I do not, of course, pretend to say that I agree with the Revisers in every instance, and that there are not some things in their revision—and some of great importance, though few in number—which I regret. But even where I differ from them in judgment I do so with the extremest deference, and with the feeling that, after all, they—being so many and so competent—may be in the right. But here I will add this only; that from all who know the fatal force and fascination of words—who have learnt to realise the immense and inconceivable mistakes which are made by the ignorant (ay, and by the learned also) in reading Scripture—who wish to know what the Evangelists and Apostles really said, and as nearly as possible the manner in which they said it—who are aware of the manifold deficiencies of the Received Text, owing to the meagreness of the Apparatus Criticus, which was alone at the disposal of the former translators—the members of the Revision Committee deserve the deepest gratitude. In spite of the bitter attacks which have been made upon their Version, it will come to be regarded by ever-increasing numbers as one of the best boons which has been bestowed upon them by the learning, and the fearlessness, and the faithfulness of the ripest scholars and divines whom the nineteenth century can boast.

The only other article bearing on religion is the article on "Disestablishment in Scotland," by Principal Rainy, who, while arguing the question on the principle of justice to all and the diminished influence of the Established Church, expresses the deepest conviction that Disestablishment will not hinder any useful work now done by the Established Church, and that it is of great importance to the religious well-being of Scotland that its Church life should be disentangled from complications and debates created by the State.

In the Nineteenth Century the only article bearing upon Religion is that entitled "An Englishman's Protest," by Cardinal Manning, who reviews the arguments for and against Mr. Bradlaugh's claim to sit as member for Northampton, of course with a decided bias against. The Cardinal thinks it shocking to say that religious liberty is the liberty to have no religion. But certainly it does not exist unless there is liberty to deny as well as to affirm. "To deny the existence of God, then, is a religious creed, and one among the religions of the world." A clear non-sequitur, if ever there was one. Religious Liberty does not necessarily imply that all liberty is religious, but simply that there is absolute freedom of thought in matters pertaining to religion. And so the denial of the existence of God is not a religious creed, but simply a negation in matters pertaining to religion.

The nine remaining articles in the Nineteenth Century may be dismissed in a few words. There are three articles on the well-worn question of "Vivisection: its Pains and its Uses," in which Sir William Gull, discussing the "ethics of vivisection," condemns the anti-scientific agitation; Mr. George Fleming, President of the Royal College of Veterinary Surgeons, while expressing his abhorrence of cruelty, defends experiments on living animals for purposes of science as absolutely necessary for their own interests no less than for those of mankind; and Dr. T. Lauder Brunton, in an article on "Vivisection and the Use of Remedies," maintains that "the great majority of those who denounce vivisection do so simply from ignorance, and only require to become acquainted with the good that is obtained through it, in order to join with the medical profession in recognising its necessity." There are also four articles under the common heading "The Channel Tunnel," discussing from opposite points of view this exciting subject of the day. Colonel Beaumont, in reply to Admiral Lord Dunsany's article in the previous number, maintains from a military point of view that our insular security cannot be affected by the tunnel. Lord Dunsany, in a rejoinder, maintains his previous positions, and quotes at great length in support of them an anonymous military authority, who is now well known to be Sir Garnet Wolseley. The "civilian's view" is stated by the omniscient Professor Goldwin Smith, who is ready at any moment to take command of the Channel Fleet or the fortification of Dover, and who, in pursuance of his new rôle of civilian adviser to the Government on military matters, insists, somewhat dogmatically, that as the war spirit is not yet dying out, and "the State Churches still worship the God of Battles," and as military security is indispensable, commerce must make the necessary sacrifices for it, and the project must be laid aside. "An Alternative" is lastly presented by Mr. Fowler, the eminent civil engineer, and simply amounts to this, that a Channel ferry should be established by the construction of steamers capable of carrying a whole train, and the widening and deepening of the harbours on both sides. These objects could be obtained at a fraction of the probable cost of the tunnel. This seems perfectly practicable, and there are few, we imagine, who would not prefer crossing the Channel on ferry-boats of the Calais-Douvres kind to going through a tunnel of thirty miles long. The remaining articles are "Landowning as a Business," by that particularly unpopular Irish landlord Mr. Bence Jones; "The Yellowstone Geysers," a lively account, by Mr. Francis, of one of the great natural phenomena of the Far West; "The Spirit of Party," a vindication, by Mr. T. E. Kebbel, of Government on the old party lines; "The Names of the Greeks," a classical excursus, by the Rev. E. L. Hicks; "The Opium Controversy," in which Sir A. J. Arbutnot, K.C.S.I., vindicates an odious traffic on the immoral ground of the financial interests of India; "Amye Robsart," an interesting archaeological paper, by the Rev. Canon Jackson, who tries to show that Leicester was innocent of the crime of causing the death of his wife, that she was probably insane and destroyed herself, and that Varney was by no means so black as he is painted, but was in fact the highly respectable High Sheriff of Warwickshire, the year after Amye's death; and, finally, "Annexation and South Africa," in which Lord Colin Campbell, M.P., gives in considerable detail the history of our dealings with our Colonies in that part of the world.

Returning to the Contemporary, the remaining articles may be briefly characterised. "The Channel Tunnel" is here also discussed, but the writer of the article, Lord Brabourne, is so closely connected with the scheme that his testimony can hardly be considered quite disinterested. His lordship dismisses the military and political objection as "the hobgoblin argument." Lord Brabourne is rather oversanguine in his expectations that the tunnel would secure a sure and permanent peace, and has forgotten for the moment that the war spirit is still dominant all over Europe, and that England and its free institutions are not regarded with over warm feelings of friendship by the Absolutist Powers.

There are two articles bearing on Politics. "Are Irish Landlords Entitled to Compensation?" a question answered in the affirmative by Professor H. Brougham Leech, writing from the Irish Conservative, that is, the narrowest and most prejudiced point of view; and "The Procedure of the House of Commons," in which Professor Thorold Rogers, M.P., after an elaborate historical review, advocates various measures respecting the closing of debates, and the reference of Bills to Grand Committees. There are also two articles relating to the Land question—"Agricultural Depression"—by the Duke of Argyll, who criticises Mr. Proust's recent detail of his experience in his essay on Profitable Clay Farming, and expresses his "perfect confidence in the prospects of British Agriculture, provided those who conduct it are left to do so in that perfect freedom which is the fundamental condition of improvement and of success in all industrial occupations," and "Some Popular Prejudices concerning Land and Labour," in which we regret to see that the Rev. W. L. Blackley, who has written so well on Thrift, is opposed to small holdings in land.

Science and Philosophy are represented by R. A. Proctor's "Vistas of the Past," in which it is shown that the moon is gradually receding from the earth, with the result that our day will grow longer; and "Professor Goldwin Smith as a Critic," in which Herbert Spencer very briefly exposes some misquotations from his "Data of Ethics." The three remaining articles are "The Government of London," being the substance of the address recently delivered by Sir Arthur Hobhouse at the Liberal Science Union, advocating one great municipality of which all Londoners will be proud; "Monkeys," describing the different races according to the countries they inhabit; and "The Financial Crisis in France," a striking account by M. Auguste Vitu of the rise, short history and total collapse of that ambitious institution, the Union Générale. It is satisfactory to be assured by M. Vitu that the evil is less extensive and less serious than was to be feared. Rash speculators have received a hard lesson, and many innocent persons will greatly suffer, but "the coulisse has manifested an astonishing power of resistance, and an admirable probity in the fulfilment of its engagements," and "the fortunes of France are safe."

It will be seen from these brief notices that this month's Contemporary is a number of universal interest and variety.

The Magazines.

Good Words continues the two serial stories, Mr. Gibbon's "Golden Shaft," and Mrs. Oliphant's "Lady Jane," which latter sorely tries our patience. Mrs. Charles Garnett continues her graphic sketch, with illustrations of "The Mountain Homes of the Vaudois," and Mr. A. J. C. Hare also continues his pleasantly-written account of Syracuse and the neighbouring ruins, under the heading "Sicilian Days." Dr. George Smith gives a biographical sketch of General Colin Mackenzie, "one of the Indian heroes and Puritan soldiers. The ubiquitous Dr. B. W. Richardson discourses on "Tricycling in relation to Health," and gives a gracious sanction to that favourite amusement, under certain conditions. Among other articles are "The Story of a Block of Coal," a popular scientific article by Professor A. H. Green; "Some Sins of Almsgiving," a valuable protest against a popular form of sham charity by the Rev. Brooke Lambert; "The Death of Huss," a poem by Alfred Austin, illustrated by A. S. Boyd; and "Artemus Ward," a sketch from life, by the Rev. H. R. Haweis.

From Mr. Lambert's paper we give the following extract on some questionable methods of obtaining money for a good object:—"I shall never forget the effect produced on my mind when, at a grand service in St. Paul's, the congregation had been appealed to 'to celebrate the auspicious event of the presence of the Prince of Wales as a steward among them by more than usually large contributions'—I shall never forget how the preacher, then Dean of Ely, now Bishop of Carlisle, raised his voice, and said, 'I have heard it suggested that you should'—then follow the words of the circular—'I can appeal to no such unworthy motive; rather would I say, give because the Prince of Peace is among you.' If the method to which I have referred was rare enough to be considered exceptional, I should not mention it. The principle is everywhere. We have bazaars for building a church, grand patronesses, grand stall-holders, gorgeous objects, and great display of goods. The bazaar is to promote a work for the honour and glory of God. But what does this paraphernalia mean when translated into the vernacular? It means: I do not care much for the honour of God, but I do care for having my purchase handed to me by a smiling duchess. I don't care to give half-a-crown to the church, but I don't mind doing it if I have a pen-wiper thrown in. What the whole system of charity means nowadays is: we must have money—from honourable and high motives if we can, but if not, any way money—and that is so like a very ordinary business maxim that I do not hesitate to call it a sin of almsgiving."

The numerous admirers both in American and England of that inimitable humourist Artemus Ward will read with interest the following passages from Mr. Haweis's "Life-sketch":—

"The humour of Artemus was delicate, evanescent and personal to an irritating degree. 'I have bin troying,' said the impetuous Irishman, after hearing Macready, 'for an hour to spake it out, loike that man, but, be-gohrra! I cannot at all—at all!' And no one ever yet succeeded in 'spaking it out' like Artemus Ward. People rushed to hear Dickens read; for my part I always preferred reading Dickens. But much of Artemus Ward is simply flat without Artemus. And yet the dullest man cannot spoil some of his jokes—there is no mistake about them. Artemus arrived here in 1866, he was a dying man. I can see him now as he came on the narrow platform in front of his inferior panorama, and stole a glance at the densely-packed room and then at his panorama. His tall, gaunt, though slender figure, his curly light hair and large aquiline nose, which always reminded me of a macaw, his thin face flushed with consumption, his little cough, which seemed to shake him to pieces, and which he said was 'wearing him out,' at which we all laughed irresistibly, and then felt ashamed of ourselves, as well we might; but he himself seemed to enjoy his cough. It was all part of that odd topsy-turvy mind in which everything appeared most natural upside down!

"On first entering he would seem profoundly unconscious that anything was expected of him, but after looking at the audience, then at his own clothes, and then apologetically at his panorama, he began to explain its merits. The fact was that Artemus intended having the finest scenes that could be painted, but he gave that up on account of the expense, and then determined to get the worst as the next best thing for his purpose. When anything very bad came up he would pause and gaze admiringly at the canvas, and then look round a little reproachfully at the company. 'This picture,' he would say, 'is a great work of art, it is an oil painting done in petroleum. It is by the old masters. It was the last thing they did before dying. They did this and then they expired. I wish you were nearer to it so you could see it better. I wish I could take it to your residences and let you see it by daylight. Some of the greatest artists in London come here every morning before daylight with lanterns to look at it. They say they never saw anything like it before, and they hope they never shall again!'

"Nothing could be more impromptu, and therefore riveting, than his manner throughout from the moment he entered; he seemed to be doing everything for the first time and without the least preparation, and indeed he was most unlike such mechanical artists as Albert Smith, who used to say he could go through his 'Mont Blanc' half asleep. Artemus was always in reality at high pressure. He was never twice the same; he poured out new jokes with prodigal invention, and every gesture was original and arose out of the immediate occasion. His finger was ever on the pulse of the people; they were always absolutely in his power, whilst he flattered them by appearing to be entirely in theirs. He would conciliate them, inspire pity, claim indulgence, throw himself upon their generosity, pretend to exert himself, to labour under a depressing sense of failure, even make capital out of his poor cough; and then he was so deeply wounded, if some very mild joke failed to elicit applause, that he would stop and look reproachfully at the people until they shook with a new sense of the absurd situation. At other times, when interrupted by laughter, he would look round with surprise and say 'I did not expect you to laugh at that. I can throw off numbers of those little things, but I assure you I can do better than that.'"

Fraser's Magazine has the beginning of a new story, "Lady Maud," which looks interesting and promising, as far as we can judge from the first three chapters. Miss Betham-Edwards also con-finies her pleasant story of German life, entitled "Exchange no Robbery; or, Fated by a Jest." Mr. J. A. Symonds, the essayist of the Italian Renaissance, gives an interesting account of "Montepulciano," the lordliest of Tuscan hill-towns. Mr. Alfred Aylward, in a paper on "Basuto," proves once more the mischievous results of Sir Bartle Frere's ambitious policy in South Africa. The other contributions are "The Poety of Dante Gabriel Rossetti," a very favourable criticism by Thomas Bayne; "The French Privateers," a stirring narrative of the deeds of Jean Bart during the last quarter of the seventeenth century; "Tenant Right," a politico-economical paper by I. S. Leadam, and "How Gilbert Sherard Fared in the Flood," a story of the North Midlands, by Lady Verney.

The Expositor opens with the continuation of the Rev. Canon Evans's "Critical Remarks on the Translation of the Revised Version," in the course of which the writer does full justice to the admirable work of the Revisers, while he criticises several of their renderings of the aorists and participial tenses. Another paper relating to the same subject is the Rev. J. R. Lumby's, on "Shortcomings of Translation," in which he points out that there must be many a passage to which no translation can do full justice, and which must be left for the expositor to make lucid by commentary and paraphrase. Among these are James I. 17, 2 Peter i. 4, and Romans viii. 18. Dr. E. A. Abbott continues his remarkable articles on "The Second Epistle of St. Peter," and shows good evidence for the conclusion that "the memory of St. Peter ought to be formally delivered from the suspicion of having composed" this unworthy production, this pedantical and ignoble collection of plagiarisms commonly attributed to him. The document, he adds, is "probably a forgery for polemical purposes in order to prove on the authority of the Apostle facts which could not be proved without his authority," and is "a compilation altogether below the level of the First Epistle of St. Peter, and wholly unworthy of being considered, in any sense, inspired." Pretty strong this for a Churchman, but not at all new to Unitarian scholars. The other papers, which call for no special remark, are "The Fourth Psalm," a very interesting exposition by the editor of what is often called "The Evening Psalm;" "Studies in the Minor Prophets—Joel," by the Rev. Dr. Matheson; and "Dan and Dan-Laish," a note on Biblical Geography, by the Rev. Walter Wood.

The Sunday Magazine has for its frontispiece a fine portrait of "A. K. H. B.," one of "Our Principal Contributors." George Macdonald continues his serial story, "Weighed and Wanting," and Olive Birrell also continues her story of New England life in the old Puritan times, entitled "Justice Warren's Daughter." Mrs. Charles Garnett also contributes a story of invention under the name of "At his Wits' End," in which we have a good deal of the Northern dialect. Among the graver papers are three popular scientific articles—"Is Mars Habitable?" by E. W. Maunder, who answers the question in the negative, both with regard to Mars and the other planets; "The Northern Lights," with an illustration by W. C. Proctor; and "Homes Under the Sea," an illustrated sketch of Starfishes, by the Rev. J. G. Wood; "Ramblings Among Obscure Charities," in which J. Ewing Ritchie gives an interesting account of the Cat and Dog Hospital, and "Christmas Evans," a striking sketch of the popular Welsh preacher of the last century, by the Rev. W. Dorling.

The Day of Rest contains papers of a more decidedly religious character than the other magazines, together with an attractive department of "Children's Pages," with several coloured illustrations. Among the papers are "The Lord's Pursuebearer," a serial story by Hesba Stretton; "The Stockwell Orphanage," by William Gilbert; "A Summer Holiday in Switzerland," by Mrs. May; and "The Prodigal Son's Elder Brother," by the Vicar of Lowmeads.

The Journal of the National Indian Association has the continuation of the graphic tale of Indian life entitled "The Second Daughter-in-Law." Among other articles are "Oral Instruction," "Mass Education in India," "A Plea for the Nose-ring"—which it appears is the exclusive ornament of married ladies—all by native writers.

The Magazine of Art has for its frontispiece this month an engraving of Mr. Watts's fine picture, "The Mid-day Rest," which is followed by an article in "The Watts Exhibition," by W. Cosmo Monkhouse, with engravings of the artist's pictures, "To all Churches," "Portrait of Mrs. F. Myers," and "Diana and Endymion." We know not how they may look with all the effects of colouring, but to our minds the first of these is simply absurd and almost disgusting, and the last is ridiculous. Mr. Watts is greater in portraits than in imaginative pictures of this kind. There is a delightful illustrated description of "Mr. Alma Tadema's House," by W. Meynell, and a pleasant biographical account, with portrait and engravings, of "Joseph Flüggen," the German artist. The Rev. M. Creighton continues his illustrated sketch of "Alnwick Castle." Mr. T. A. Trollope writes on "Benvenuto Cellini," with illustrations of four of his principal works. Basil Champneys, the well-known architect, describes "The Towers of Sir Christopher Wren," with engravings of some of his principal London churches; and Professor Sydney Colvin reviews, also with illustrations, the new work on "Raphael, his Life, Works, and Times," by Eugène Muntz.

Cassell's Family Magazine, besides the two serial stories, "No Proof" and "Ralph Raeburn's Trusteeship," has short and instructive papers covering such varied ground as "A Bird of Few Friends" (the Rook), by the Rev. A. H. Mañan; "Some Hints on Lustra-painting;" "The Benefits of Turkish Bathing," by a Family Doctor; "Lunatic Asylums as a Labour Field"—that is for nurses, stewards, &c., by Dr. J. A. Campbell, "In and About Bangor," a pleasant holiday sketch; "The Life of a Private Soldier in Times of Peace," by "One who has Served in the Ranks;" and "The Tyneside Collier," a valuable sketch of life "under the crust," by Thomas Burt, M.P. The new and interesting feature, "The Family Parliament," has continuations of the two discussions on "Home Life versus Public Life for Girls," and "Are Public Examinations Beneficial to Young People?" the answers to both of which obviously depend upon varying circumstances. But decidedly the most interesting paper is the Rev. F. Wagstaffe's biographical sketch of "The Father of Teetotalism," the venerable and venerated Joseph Livesey, of Preston, a self-made man, who may well be enrolled among the benefactors of his kind.

We have also received from Messrs. Cassell:—New Testament Commentary for English Readers, edited by Bishop Ellicott, Part XXIV.

Illustrated Universal History, Part VI.
The Family Physician, Part XXVI.

Also the first part of two new and promising serials:—

Our Homes, and How to Make them Healthy. Edited by Shirley F. Murphy, aided by some of the foremost architects, physiologists, and art decorators of the day; and Cassell's Concise Cyclopædia, a wonderfully cheap publication, with numerous attractive illustrations.

Short Notices.

Atheism and Suicide; a Reply to Alfred Tennyson. By G. W. Foote. London: Freethought Publishing Company.

The remarkable poem by Mr. Tennyson which appeared recently in the Nineteenth Century appears to have pleased very few persons, or, at least, to have given great offence in quite opposite quarters. The orthodox denounce it as a direct attack on some of the cherished doctrines of the Evangelical faith; the Secularists condemn it because it connects Atheism and suicide. The protest of one of the latter, Mr. G. W. Foote, is given in the eight-page tract now before us. The writer begins by speaking in disparaging terms of Mr. Tennyson as a poet. His unfavourable criticism is quite uncalled for; it is altogether beside the mark. Tennyson's merits as a poet do not affect the question whether Atheism leads to despair, and despair leads to suicide. The truth or falseness of this charge is independent of the person who makes it. Mr. Foote, as one accustomed to talk a good deal about reason, ought to know this. "The question," he says, "Does Atheism, as such, incline men to self-destruction? is not touched" in the poem. "The Atheist husband of 'Despair' loses more than belief in God and hope of a life to come. His wife suffers from a malady only curable, if at all, by the surgeon's knife. His eldest son has forged his name and ruined him, while it is hinted that another son has sunk to a still worse depth of vice." And he describes himself as "a life without sun, without health, without hope, without any delight." Yes, but—and this is the point which the secularist critic overlooks—his atheism aggravated his other misfortunes. It made his life still more unendurable. It added to his "burden of trouble;" it was the proverbial last straw which breaks the camel's back. The poet does not represent the man's loss of belief in God as the sole cause of his distress of mind, but as one important element in it. It was the last drop in his cup of bitterness, the crowning calamity which precipitated the bitter end. Mr. Foote says, "All this is very inartistic." We do not agree with him. It is a terrible and fitting climax to a list of troubles. While he believed in God his mental desolation was not complete; but when, because as presented to him by his orthodox teacher, it revolted his moral sense, he surrendered that faith, then every remnant of peace and hope was gone, and he was thrown back utterly on himself. The eclipse of soul which before had been only partial became total, and in the darkness and desolation that ensued he attempted self-destruction. This is how we would understand the poem, and thus understood more than one valuable lesson is taught by it. We see the effects of orthodox teaching when a sensitive mind endeavours to realise the horrible doctrines taught as Christianity. We see, too, what a wreck poor human nature becomes when to other troubles is added the loss of faith in a righteous Governor of the universe, and in a future world where every present wrong shall be redressed. That the loss of this faith takes an element of joy, of strength, of trust and hope out of the present life seems to us beyond question. Such loss may not "prompt men to suicide," but that it must be saddening and depressing to the ordinary mind seems to us a natural consequence. We say the ordinary mind; there may be those with whom Atheism has not this effect. But we should regard their case as exceptional. "It is a noteworthy fact," says Mr. Foote, "that the chief pessimists of our century have not courted death themselves except in verse." We can only reply, it would be a condemnation indeed of atheistic and pessimistic thought if the leaders themselves began to show the white feather! C. F. B.

The Blessed Hope. Williams and Norgate. 1882. —We opened this very pretty little book with some hope, but regret that we have not been "blessed." We first looked at the "Dedication," which is as follows:—"To a Venerated Friend, in whom the Power and the Cause that Is, and therefore is in all,—whose transubstantiation and activity are, if possible, more unutterable, omnipresent, and fatal, in the moral than in the physical universe—hath raised up unto the bereaved as it were a Second Father;—whose adoration almost rather than admiration of Shakespeare (and the Shakespeare of Music) in the effluence of whose sonnets, mysterious in their Godlike elegance, power and pathos, there are a disciple's endeavours—vies with that of the author:—" but here we stopped, finding that our ideas were getting mixed, and that the sentence extended over more than another page, profusely scattered over with such grand phrases as "tones, overtones, and undertones." We looked at the first poem; it began at one of the last it began

The bed-ridden prostitute Pessimism I abhor.

We hardly felt inclined to look further. Yet in common justice we must say that while these poems are much too utterly metaphysical for our taste, some of them show thought and culture, and they are redeemed from too sweeping a condemnation by the strong faith in the Immortal Life which pervades the book.

Fancy and Other Rhymes. By John Sibree, M.A., Trubner. 1882.—Mr. Sibree's elegant and graceful verses do not approach the highest rank, but they are pleasing and correct, although we detect now and then an inharmonious line, and a doubtful rhyme. The poem from which the volume is named is a fine poetic celebration of the highest achievements of Fancy, from Dante's "Beatrice" down to Coleridge's "Ancient Mariner." "How Lord Archibald Sought the Grail," is a pathetic adaptation of the old mediæval legend to modern thought. In most of these "rhymes" there is a fine religious tone, and one of them, "Ebrietas Victa," is a poetical glorification of one of the greatest of social reforms.

We have received from Messrs. Cassell the two latest volumes of their Popular Shilling Library The Wit and Wisdom of the Bench and Bar, by the Hon. F. A. Moncrieff, and English Journalism and the Men who have Made it, by Charles Pebody. The first volume is not so good as it might have been with so fruitful a subject. Some of the stories are rather poor specimens of wit, and the best of them are already familiar to the readers of that invaluable storehouse of anecdotes, Lord Campbell's "Lives of the Chancellors." The two chapters on "Legal and Judicial Wisdom" serve at least to show that great lawyers have often been as wanting in wisdom as in wit.

The second volume is a well-written and very interesting popular account of the rise of English journalism. Mr. Pebody is, we believe, connected with the Bristol press, and is the same writer who won the first prize a few years ago in the competition for Mr. Heywood's prizes offered for the two best essays on "The Athanasian Creed," with especial reference to a motion in Parliament for its removal from its present place in the Prayer-book. The history of English journalism, as Mr. Pebody says, is yet to be written, but his little manual is a valuable contribution towards such a work, and is full of interest and information, giving as it does a clear outline of the origin of the newspaper press, its gradual development, and its present position, together with some account of the men by whom it is carried on—the special correspondents, reporters, contributors, and proprietors. The history is brought down to so recent a period as Mr. O'Donovan's letters from Merv, which show that the newspaper press has its romantic side, and can boast of feats of courage and adventure no less renowned than those of war.

Our Contemporaries.

THE PUBLIC WORSHIP PROBLEM.

The Christian World writes:—The problem brought into prominence by the public worship statistics of England and Scotland alike deserves the most careful and, we should add, the most candid investigation. Thirty years ago Mr. Horace Mann revealed the unexpected fact that throughout England and Wales five and a quarter millions of the entire population held aloof from public worship. Nevertheless, it was estimated that about forty-one per cent. did go to church or chapel. Since then a prodigious impetus has been given to church building, both in connection with the Church of England and outside of it. Many millions have been expended—all the freewill offerings of spiritual zeal and self-sacrifice—in extending our religious machinery, with the result, so far as information extends, that not more than 29·2, as our contemporary, the Non-conformist and Independent liberally estimates, or, according to the Rev. A. Mearns, 25·44 per cent. of the population (about three and a half millions), in seventy-eight cities, towns, and districts, were to be found on a given Sunday in places of worship. Now if the attendance at the most numerously-attended service was equal to no more than one-half of the accommodation provided, we have evidence not only that church-going, as compared with 1851, is declining, but that church building, though necessary under certain conditions, is no adequate remedy for such a state of things. Why is there this increasing objection to attend Divine service on the Sunday? Why do the masses of the population refrain from entering our places of worship? How is it that this indifference to a high religious aspiration and social custom is so seriously increasing? Whether attendance at the House of God be regarded as a sacred duty or a cherished privilege, so portentous a phenomenon must be fairly faced and accounted for. It is a complex problem that will bear looking at in many aspects, and needs essentially to be placed in the light of common sense, having regard to the apostolic maxim that Christians should be all things to all men; or as it may be interpreted in modern phraseology, that the means should be adapted to the end.

So far as the Church of England is concerned, the palpable decline of its influence upon the community is due, in a large measure, to its stereotyped creed, and perhaps still more, to its formal ritual and its want of flexibility. To a great extent its ceremonial and its liturgy, however suited to the age when they were prescribed by law, are ill-adapted as a means of expressing modern thought and aspirations. Are the Free Churches of this country exempt from this grave defect? Is the machinery of their religious institutions altogether suited to the needs of the times? Do they study to present the vital truths of the Gospel in such a light, and so to vary their methods and adapt their places of worship and public services, as to win people to their side? Why is there this enormous disparity between their self-denying zeal of Nonconformists in erecting new places of worship, and their lack of success in filling them? Why is the pulpit losing much of its power, while the standard of intellectual capacity and culture is every year becoming more elevated? Is the maintenance of traditional religious habits that are losing their efficacy—the rigid adherence to professional views of the ministry—of more consequence than such changes as will give fresh development to spiritual life and activity? Is there no safe and happy medium in our ecclesiastical economy between the one-man system in its cast-iron inflexibility, and the evils that are inherent in Plymouth Brethrenism? It is only by a few brief questions that we are able, in the space at our command, to indicate the direction in which, in our opinion, fitting remedies for the neglect of public worship might be sought. Diligently sought and vigorously applied they must be unless the Gospel of Christ, so far as it is reflected in our church organisations, is to lose its aggressive, or rather its persuasive and attractive influence. The Free Churches in particular want more freedom, more elasticity, more boldness, more worldly wisdom, more vital energy. They cannot thrive on expiring traditions, or subsist on antiquated claims, and they must not die of dignity. The divine mission of the Church in the world is, after all, committed to human agency, and surely it is as much the duty of Christians to study how they can adapt the machinery of their religious institutions to the object they have in view—the evangelisation of the community—as it is to promote corporate and individual spiritual culture. In this age the last-named desideratum may often be best secured by a zealous devotion to the first.

THE BRADLAUGH QUESTION.

The Spectator, while not doubting that Mr. Bradlaugh was deliberately ill-treated by the House of Commons, writes:—

Mr. Bradlaugh has not fought the question of principle from anything like the best or highest ground. If he wished, as he professed to wish, to establish the right of one who does not believe in God, and to whom, therefore, an affirmation must be necessarily more acceptable than an oath,—since it asserts all that the oath asserts, and does not encumber itself with what to such an one must be an unmeaning and therefore insincere sanction,—to affirm, he should from the first have steadily refused to take the oath; and on the decision of the Law Court that he was not entitled to affirm, he should have quietly awaited the passing of an Act enabling him to affirm. His reiterated offers to take the oath obviously diminished, and very greatly diminished, the moral case for such an Act. A man whose conscience is so pliant, that if he cannot say what he wishes to say in the truest form, he is quite willing to say it in a half-true and half-false form, is not the sort of person for whom public opinion urgently demands a relieving Act. Mr. Bradlaugh's conscience took objection to the oath, it was true, but was so easy in the matter that it was quite willing to swallow the objection, directly the difficulty seemed to be serious. Well, that is not the kind of man whom the public earnestly care to relieve from an unfair position. We do not say that they ought not to have cared. But we do say that the very easy conscience of Mr. Bradlaugh in the matter, immensely discredited the otherwise unanswerable case for relief which a man of more unbending conscience in his position would have been able to present. It would be far better, in the interests of the abolition of all indirect theological tests, to return a Liberal to the House of Commons pledged to get rid of those tests, but not burdened with the more or less discrediting consequences of Mr. Bradlaugh's unfortunate laxities of conviction.

KESHUB CHUNDER SEN ON THE TRINITY.

Keshub Chunder Sen delivered an address on the Trinity in the Town Hall of Calcutta on Jan. 21st, which attracted an immense multitude. The whole of that great hall from end to end presented a compact crowd of eager faces, which could not number less than three thousand, and were perhaps more. His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief and some of the great officials came. The appearance of the speaker, who looked somewhat pale and worn, drew forth repeated applause:—

Mr. Sen began by a rapt expression of wonder at the marvellous mystery of his subject. But as he approached it closer the wonder melted into a tender humility which freely confessed his want of theological culture, and uttered a doubt of his competence to deal with the supreme importance of the theme. But the humility took the shape of an assurance from within, the voice which commanded him to "proceed." Where had he studied the awful subject of Trinity? In the glowing regions of Asiatic faith, in the divinity school of his domestic sanctuary, at the sacred altar of his daily prayers. His opening exposition was that of the eternal Logos, the uncreate, all-producing, initial word of the Fourth Gospel, the Shabda Brahma of the Rig Veda. He exhorted his audience to give wings to their thoughts, and soar across the quarrels and clamours of the ages to that region of everlasting silence which pervaded the expanse of space before creation sprang forth from the bosom of the Infinite. There in unsearchable eternity, and in a state of unutterable being, dwelt the Absolute Spirit of the Father. Their was neither life, nor death, nor deathlessness, but above, beyond, and beneath stretched His supreme essence in viewless sea. There from the depths of His nature was uttered the creative cry of "Let there be light!" It vibrated through the unpeopled spheres of endless space, and broke forth into forms of shape, symmetry, beauty, intelligence, and life whose joint name is the visible universe. The universe, therefore, is the offspring and word of God, and creation has, from its primitive origin, gone on through successive epochs in the ascending evolution of continually higher orders of being. Hindu avatarism proceeding from fish to tortoise on to the form of man, and the Darwinian development equally point to the theory of creation from the eternal Logos to the everlasting Son. The Jehovah of the Hebrew Scriptures whom Moses declared and David sang, was the Brahma of the Hindu Scriptures whom the Rig Veda declared and the Sam Veda sang. It was in both cases the Heavenly Father of the ancient ages. But if that was the Father, where was the Son? The whole universe which was the offspring of the Father waited for the development of the Son. The world and all mankind were a preparation for him. Christ Jesus came to the world to reveal that Sonship, that the process of creation might culminate in that love, faith, and obedience, in that character, nay, in that humanity which was begotten in him and which he has bequeathed to mankind. That character, that humanity being now assimilated in our hearts, that sonship being now our example and ideal, Jesus reigneth from the Himalayas to Cape Comorin, and we Hindus are all Christians. The difference between the God-man and the Man-God was strongly pointed out. Jesus was divine humanity, and therefore God-man; and the idea of a Man-God was scouted as idolatrous and shameful. The habit of claiming for Jesus the same honour and place as for the Father was denounced as "offensive nonsense." The Son of God, the King of Calvary, came, it was said, not to preach a system of morality, or even to establish a form of religion, but to complete a humanity which includes all ethics and all faith. If the worship of Jesus means the worship of humanity, the speaker said he was not against such worship, but he added it must be only the worship or the adoring love of the brother, and not of the Father. In giving unto us the spirit of sonship or adoption and teaching us to call ourselves the children of God, Christ has established between himself and us the relation of everlasting brotherhood. And we again remembered the words of St. Paul, "For whom he did foreknow, he also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of his son, that he might be the first born among many brethren."

A new development in the speaker's estimate of Christ's character was the ascription of feminine nature to Jesus. The tenderness of Christ's utterance over Jerusalem on the occasion of his last visit to that devoted city, in which he likened himself to the hen gathering chickens under her wings, proves that he had the woman's nature in him. This idea subsequently germinated into the dignity which is accorded by Roman Catholicism to Mary as the mother of the Lord. And hence Keshub spoke of Mary as the feminine side of humanity, which Christ came to preach and establish. This corresponds well with the idea of divine motherhood which Hinduism so vividly sets forth. Christians of the Protestant school may feel offended at the apparent honour and devotion accorded to Mary, but the name Mary was used simply to represent feminine humanity. This exalts our whole view of woman's nature, and sanctifies our relations with the other sex. In short, the idea of the Divine Son indicates all goodness, love, truth and faith in human character wherever, whenever, and however it existed. The idea culminated in Jesus who bequeathed his flesh and blood to all mankind, so that Christ may reign in every heart. But there is no Christ in the world now, he is risen. Whom has He left behind him? He has left the Holy Spirit in every heart as the Comforter, the enlightener, the guide, the inspirer of every good thought, motive, impulse, and act. From without, Christ has entered into the soul with the Holy Ghost. The Kingdom of Heaven then is in the form of a triangle, the apex of which is the Logos Father, and the other two angles of which are represented by the Son and the Holy Spirit. All humanity moves through the three sides and angles, travelling from the one to the other in successive dispensations, and finding out at last the threefold synthesis of the mysterious Trinity. The Father pointing to the Son, the Son pointing to the Spirit of truth and holiness, and all drawing us upwards from earth to heaven. The Hebrew Testament was the dispensation about the Father, in which Jehovah was revealed as ruling in the heavens with the earth as his footstool. This, by the fulfilment of prophecy and divine purpose, ushered in the New Testament or the Dispensation of the Son, in which ideal humanity is revealed as incarnating the Eternal Reason, and making all men who believe the children of God. And at the present moment the Church of spiritual Theism points to another dispensation—the dispensation of the Holy spirit who reveals new relations by which every man that comes to the world shall behold God face to face as enbroned in His spiritual kingdom in the heart.—The [Indian] Liberal.

THE REV. DR. BELLOWES.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—The death of this eloquent and accomplished Unitarian minister is naturally felt most deeply by those who belong to the denomination of which he was so valiant a leader. But it will be felt far beyond the limits of his Church. He was, in some sense, an institution, and represented a development of liberal religion in its relation to the general world such as cannot be associated with any other man. His Unitarianism was in him organic; the thought, spirit, and aim of its fathers were in his blood and bone; and thus liberated from the merely negative, sceptical, or controversial phase, he was able to take what Americans call a new departure. This was in the direction of the general world. There had still remained in most of the Liberal leaders who preceded him a certain deference to Puritan conceptions of religious life and character. The lady who confided to Margaret Fuller her vague regret at Channing's marriage suggests that there may have been a tendency towards even more ascetic ideas than those of Calvinism among some repudiators of the old creeds. The almost severe simplicity of Theodore Parker's life, the so-called "unworldliness" of other religious heretics, was, indeed, an important force in the earlier and more theological phase of the Liberal movement. But it was impossible for the new idea of human nature to reproduce the old ideal of character, or to preserve the fictitious partition between religious and human society. The next leader who arose in the Unitarian movement was to be a man of the world. Dr. Bellows was such in a fine sense. He was a man of character, of even unusual virtues, by no means content with the mere conventional moral métier; but he was a man of the world in his sympathy with its fair varieties of life and thought, its social interests, its arts and institutions. This almost unique position of his among American clergymen grew, as I think, directly from his liberal religious culture. Among the many instances in which it was illustrated may be mentioned his defence of the dramatic profession. Some casual remarks favourable to the theatre, spoken from his pulpit, having found their way into the press, the orthodox preachers poured angry thunders upon him and the stage. This led the actors to express to him their gratitude, formally, and to offer him (as I remember) a banquet and other testimonial. With the good sense and tact which were characteristic of him as his chivalry, Dr. Bellows declined these offers, but said he would be glad if the members of the dramatic profession should give him an opportunity of addressing them. This was promptly done, and in the largest theatre in New York the orator delivered to the assembled actors and actresses, and others—the house being crowded—an address of the highest importance. His defence of the Stage and criticism of its faults became the theme of pulpit discussion throughout the country, with advantage alike to morality and to a beautiful art.

Dr. Bellows was a devout Christian, and during the great part of his career as a controversialist might almost be described as a Unitarian High Churchman; yet he was a warm and faithful friend of many a freethinker. He was able, with his fine flexibility of nature, to put himself in another's place personally, if not intellectually. Sometimes he appeared as one who had found the fountain of perpetual youth, so warm and eager was his love for every lover of anything deemed true, and his appreciation of enthusiasm apart from its mistakes. He preferred a passionate conviction to a bloodless belief, though the latter might be his own. He seems to have left upon the minds of some the impression of a vacillating thinker, probably because keen criticisms and gallant praises of the 'radical' movement in religion may be equally quoted from him. But it has always seemed to me that this was due to the higher value which his generous mind set upon real and productive life as compared with definiteness of doctrine. He certainly believed that the 'free religious' movement in America was a fruitful branch of Unitarianism, and while using his pruning knife on it was likely to turn that knife against any who proposed to sever the branch altogether.

I remember, when listening to a sermon given by him before the Unitarian body in Dr. Martineau's chapel, to have experienced a regret that Dr. Bellows should have then chosen a theme which led to his appearing at least advantage. No one who should judge his powers by that disquisition on Church organisation would have any true idea of them. He was a genuine pulpit artist, he loved his task, trained himself to it, concentrated his powers in it, and the result was a remarkably equal flow of copious thought and expression, whose cessation must prove a heavy calamity to the hearts and homes which have so long enjoyed his bounty. There was in him a true vein of poetry, and also a rich vein of humour, both of these being felt in his sermons, though rather latent than salient. He was often impassioned in his eloquence—sometimes again, it might be, a little too ingenious in his arguments—and he was never dull.

Farewell, old friend! I have seen and known many an antagonist in the fields of controversy, but never one more keen and kindly, never knight more valiant for his cause, fair to his foe, loyal to his friend, than you. MONCURE D. CONWAY.

FREE SUNDAYS AT THE GROSVENOR GALLERY.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—Through the praiseworthy liberality of Sir Coutts Lindsay, the proprietor of the Grosvenor Gallery, we are again able to announce on behalf of the Sunday Society that the winter exhibition now on view at the Gallery will be open on the under-mentioned Sundays from six o'clock to 8.30 p.m. :—

On Sunday, March 5, to the members and subscribers of the Sunday Society, and on March 12th to the public by free tickets, which will be issued to those who apply by letter and send a stamped and addressed envelope (for reply) to the Honorary Secretary, 8, Park-place-villas, W.

This exhibition is of more than usual interest to the friends of the Society, from the fact that for the most part it consists of the works of Mr. G. F. Watts, R.A., Vice-President of the Society. In order that these Sunday visits may be as instructing and interesting as possible the committee have published a cheap edition of the catalogue.

In view of Mr. George Howard's motion for extending to London the principle of Sunday opening which has been so successful in connection with the National Museums and Galleries at Kew, Hampton Court, Greenwich, and Dublin, special invitations to visit the Grosvenor Gallery on the above Sundays are being issued to members of Parliament, that they may have an opportunity of witnessing the result in London of Sunday opening on a large scale before being called upon to vote on Mr. Howard's resolution. It is expected that upwards of 2,000 people will visit the Gallery on the two Sundays.

THOMAS BURT, M.P., President.

W. H. CORFIELD, M.D., M.A., Chairman of Committee.

TROWBRIDGE.—A crowded audience assembled in the Congre School-room on Tuesday evening, February 21, to hear a lecture on "Switzerland," by the Rev. J. Collins Odgers, B.A. The lecture was illustrated by the magic lantern, with a splendid oxy-hydrogen light. The views were very admirable, and were commented upon in genial, happy style by the lecturer, his residence in Switzerland enabling him to give reality to his descriptions by personal reminiscence and anecdote. A delightful evening was spent, and at the close an enthusiastic vote of thanks was accorded to Mr. Odgers. The Rev. J. Felstead presided.

REVISION OF THE WELSH NEW TESTAMENT.—It has been decided by the Welsh Bishops not to proceed for the present with the revision of the Welsh New Testament. The committee appointed in May last, consisting of three representatives from each of the four Welsh dioceses, met at Shrewsbury in the following month to consider the subject, and were all but unanimously in favour of the revision being proceeded with. The committee subsequently met their lordships and reported to them their reasons for recommending the revision, which reasons have, however, failed to influence the Bishops in proceeding with the work.

LEICESTER.—At Wycliffe Church (Rev. J. Wood's), the treasurer having announced that the accumulated deficiency on three years' accounts amounted to £205, a collection was made on Sunday morning, Feb. 19, when the large amount of £218 15s. was placed in the boxes.

DR. RICHARDSON'S LECTURE ON PRIESTLEY.

Little Portland-street Chapel was crowded last Sunday evening to hear an admirable and most interesting lecture by Dr. B. W. Richardson, F.R.S., on "Joseph Priestley." The Rev. P. H. Wicksteed read the devotional part of the service; Mr. O'Dwyer presided at the organ; and the hymns were beautifully rendered by the large voluntary choir.

The lecturer began with a description of Priestley as he was in America in 1800. In the peaceful village of Northumberland, on the banks of the Susquehanna, the traveller would have found a man living a quiet primitive life—a man full of information, and master of every subject on which conversation turned; rising early, passing the morning in hard study, the afternoon in exercise, and the evening in innocent recreation with his family and neighbours. This was Joseph Priestley, the discoverer of oxygen, driven from his own country by bigotry, intolerance, and persecution. The lecturer then detailed the story of the life of Priestley (the story which should be, but is not, well known amongst Unitarians); his education at the Daventry Academy; his ministry at Needham Market and at Nantwich; his tutorship at the Warrington Academy; his settlement at the Mill-hill Chapel, Leeds; his election as LL.D. (Edin.) and F.R.S. for his works on electricity and his researches on gases; his movement from his charge at Leeds to become the companion and nominally the librarian of Lord Shelbourne at Bowood; his discovery of oxygen gas in 1774; his subsequent acceptance of the pulpit of the New Meeting at Birmingham; his forced exodus from Birmingham, caused by the disgraceful riots in 1791, when his chapel and the Old Meeting as well were demolished, and his books, papers, and scientific instruments were destroyed; his fortunate escape with his life; his subsequent uncomfortable residence in London; and his journey to America with all his family; these, as parts of the history of Priestley's life, were all briefly but succinctly related.

This biographical sketch contained many allusions to Mrs. Barbauld, Theophilus Lindsey, Benjamin Franklin, Dr. Price, and others of Priestley's friends, and especially one episode which the lecturer had heard from Mrs. Galton, the daughter of Erasmus Darwin, of a meeting of the "Lunar Society" at Darwin's house, from which Priestley drove home in the same gig with James Watt, the inventor of the locomotive steam engine. Dr. Richardson, after a brief reference to the gradual development of Priestley's religious views from Arminianism and Arianism through Necessitarianism to what we now call Unitarianism, proceeded to give an admirably clear and interesting account of the four great scientific discoveries of Priestley. First, the collection and examination of gases, the foundation of pneumatic chemistry; secondly, the grand discovery of oxygen; thirdly, the absorption of gases by some substances such as carbon; fourthly, the relationship between the respiration of plants and animals. The methods by which the gases were liberated, collected, and tested by Priestley were carefully described, and several curious facts were narrated. It was shown that aerated waters were first made by Priestley, and that he discovered nitrous oxide or "laughing gas," the gas which, under the genius of Sir Humphry Davy, suggested the beneficent art of anæsthesia, or removal of pain in surgical operations. Thus Priestley unintentionally laid the foundation of the modern anæsthetic treatment.

In conclusion, the lecturer summed up the character of Priestley. He combined strong religious feeling with strict scientific method in a manner for which there is no parallel. Paul no doubt had both; but his science was rather the ideal and metaphysical philosophy of Plato, not the matter of fact science of Aristotle. In Servetus and Pascal and Paley religion and science no doubt combined; but in them the science was crude, the prevailing bent of their minds was religious. Hales was a clergyman great in science, but only in science. One man in this century, the Rev. J. B. Reade, was the nearest approach to Priestley with which the lecturer was acquainted; but in him, again, science was predominant; he was only a divine, ex officio. Priestley completely reconciled to himself scientific method and religious contemplation; he treated religion scientifically, and imperceptibly made science illustrate and explain religion. He carried on both studies with equal industry side by side throughout his life, and never found them to conflict. He had the deep and genial piety of Channing, the calm indomitable courage of Washington, and to a large degree the clear and commanding intellect of Newton. In another place the lecturer had said that a fitting epitaph might be found for Priestley in the words uttered by Fichte when Napoleon's cannon were thundering at the gates of Jena:—

"To this am I called; to bear witness to the truth. My life, my fortunes are of little moment. The results of my life are of infinite moment. I am a priest of truth; I am in her pay. I have learned myself to do all things, to venture all things, to suffer all things for her. If I should be persecuted for her sake; if I should ever have to meet death in her service, shall I have done any great thing? No. I shall have merely done that which it was clearly my duty to do."

Standing here before the representatives of a religious communion to which Priestley belonged, he preferred now to apply to him the words of Paul:—"In him abideth Faith, Hope, and Charity—these three; but the greatest of these was charity."

A SERVICE OF SONG.

On Wednesday last the venerable old chapel at Essex-street was filled with a mixed audience of children, young people and adults, all displaying an eager interest in a service that was new to our branch of the Christian Church, so terribly afraid are we of departing from the standard of superior eclecticism which many of us so much affect.

It seems that the Committee for the London Auxiliary Sunday School Association determined to try how far these musical services, which have been so successful in other Churches, would be acceptably received by any number of members of our own. They found a willing and able leader in Mr. Callow, one of the superintendents of the Stamford-street Schools, whose efforts have been zealously seconded by the Rev. F. Summers, the Rev. A. W. Pope, and others, and the result of this first outcome of their exertions must have amply repaid them for the great care and labour they have evidently taken to achieve such a decided success.

The service selected embraced the main features in the history of the prophet Elijah. The Rev. J. Pantom Ham read the narrative, and the united choirs of the several schools present, illustrated the chief incidents at frequent intervals by chorus, solo, or concerted song. These were all selected with great care and judgment, and carried with them well-known and sweetly-flowing melodies. Books of the words and music were distributed amongst the audience, and not a few felt themselves sufficiently carried away by the melodies as to be unable to resist joining in the song. When it is remembered that the choir consisted almost, if not entirely, of children and teachers in the Sunday schools, who could only have been practised in detachments, the choruses, which were the principal features of the musical illustration, were really wonderfully well done, and went with a steadiness and precision and clear harmonious expression that fairly took the numerous audience by surprise.

Mr. Ham read the highly dramatic incidents of the narrative in an admirably impressive way, giving an earnest religious tone to the whole service that was well taken up by the organist and choir, and made it feel more completely one of a devotional character than might have been thought possible by a casual glance at the popular and familiar nature of much of the music. There was no want of reverence expressed or felt from beginning to end, and the thread of interest continued unbroken throughout, and when the service finished with the well-known "Vital Spark," there was no one in the audience but might well have wished for a little more.

Mr. F. W. Noakes most efficiently presided at the organ, and from seven till eight o'clock gave a series of organ recitals from music, by Handel and other great masters.

The galleries of the chapel were well filled with the singers, and the audience sat below.

At the close of the service Mr. Wade briefly expressed what appeared to be the unanimous feeling of the meeting, that the success of this night's proceeding might only prove the first of a series of such gatherings, and, after announcing that the next religious service and conference of teachers, similar to the one held at Hampstead last autumn, would take place at Little Portland-street Chapel, not on the 18th, as was thought likely, but on Saturday, the 25th inst., of which due notice would be given, he invited such of the audience as might desire to do so to contribute any small sum they might have loose in their pockets towards the expenses of the printing and other incidentals.

The ready response to this appeal was £2 9s. 6d., nearly all contributed in halfpence and small silver coin. As one looked round the old chapel, calling to mind its famous history, and seeing it now filled with such animated and crowded young life, it was impossible not to feel what a centre of usefulness might be established here for the promotion of the best interests of our church and schools. Not only might facilities for keeping up the religious services of the chapel be continued, but there is space enough to provide, with a comparatively small outlay one would think, accommodation such as is now secured by every other religious body in London, and which might be made available for the purposes of our largest gatherings, and the promotion of the onward progress of our church life.

With a little public spirit and some determined effort in this direction it surely is not impracticable to effect such an object—the constantly increasing wants of such a place, even for business purposes alone, rendering some such a step as necessary as it is desirable.

DERBY.—The Rev. Barnard Gisby has resigned the pulpit of Friar Gate Chapel, which will be vacant at the end of September next.

FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCH, BRIGHTON.—The annual soirée in connection with this church was held at the Royal Pavilion on Wednesday evening, Feb. 22. The attendance was not quite so good as on some former occasions. There was, however, a good company present, including visitors from Hastings, Lewes, &c. Soon after eight o'clock the chair was taken by the Rev. T. R. Dobson, who after a few opening remarks proceeded to read the "annual report," in which the history and work of the church and its connected institutions during the past year were reviewed, &c. Mr. Dobson spoke in his report of the kindly feeling which had existed between himself and the members of the church during the seven years he had been with them, but for which (he said) the work of various kinds which they had been enabled to do (and there had been no small amount of it) would certainly not have been done. This report (the reading of which elicited much applause) was published almost entire in some of the local papers. Speeches were then given by the Rev. J. Ruddle, of Hastings, P. W. Clayden, of London, A. Macdonald, of Lewes, &c. Mr. Clayden spoke on "Unitarianism in the United States," and referred to the conference of Liberal Churches to be held in Liverpool next April, and hoped that delegates from the Brighton church would attend it. Mr. Macdonald's subject was "Unitarianism at Home." Mr. Ruddle, who was warmly welcomed as a newly settled minister in the district, spoke feelingly and earnestly of the responsibility attaching to the minister's position, a sense of which pressed heavily upon himself as a young minister when he thought of his own insufficiency for the work which he was called to do, and desired to do. The speaking all through was good and was much applauded. The usual votes of thanks followed; after which an excellent selection of music was given by the "Brighton Quartette Party," the pianists being Miss Lacey—the chapel organist—and Madame Eidersheim, the latter lady's performance of Thalberg's "Sweet Home," &c., was loudly applauded. The party separated about eleven o'clock, all present feeling that they had spent a most profitable as well as a pleasant evening, and that they were deeply indebted not only to those gentlemen who had come from their own homes to speak to them, but also to those friends who had given their time and thought to the arrangements necessary for the successful carrying through of such a meeting.

SHEFFIELD: THE CHANNING HALL.—Our friends at Sheffield have this week been holding their "Grande Fantesie Fayre and Old English Market." An antique programme, much in the same style as the one published by the Manchester District Unitarian Association for their grand bazaar in the Free Trade Hall last year, has been issued. It states that the "Fayre schal be holden in ye Alberte Halle, situate in ye merrie (and smokie) town of Sheld, on ye 1st, 2nd, and 3rd daies of ye moneth of Marche, m,d,lxxx,ii." Several objects are sought to be accomplished by the "fayre." Our readers are already familiar with the fact that the Upperthorpe Chapel congregation have erected the Channing Hall at a cost of nearly £5,000, the hall being devoted to educational, religious, and social purposes. The larger portion of the money required has already been subscribed by the members of the congregation, but a further sum was required with which to properly furnish the hall. During the progress of erecting the new structure it was discovered that the roof of the chapel itself was insecure, and that the placing of a new roof was absolutely necessary. A desire was expressed by the leading members that the body of the chapel should be re-seated; and that in a short time the whole edifice should be brought more in accord with modern views of religious comfort. The total sum required for all the objects sought to be attained is about £1,500, and it is to raise that sum "ye fayre" is being held. Precisely at two o'clock on Wednesday the Mayor (Mr. M. Hunter) ascended the platform to perform the pleasing ceremony of opening "ye fayre." There was then a large number of the promoters and friends of the movement present. Amongst those attending were Mrs. Fay (the Rev. Eli Fay being unable to attend owing to indisposition), the Rev. C. H. Osler, the Rev. W. Blazebey, B.A. (Rotherham), Alderman Beal, Messrs. T. Jessop, J. Hobson, J. B. Wostinholm, C. Woollen, Dr. Webster (American Consul), Mr. C. Wardlow, Major Lomas, Messrs. C. R. Webster, H. Bramley, J. Armitage, J. Laycock, H. Fisher, H. J. Morton (Scarbro), J. H. Hunter, S. Charlesworth, and J. Ryalls. The Mayor delivered a suitable address, and on the motion of Mr. J. Hobson, seconded by Mr. Fisher, a vote of thanks to him was carried by acclamation. There was a considerable attendance during the afternoon, and this was largely increased at night, when the attractions of the "fayre" were added to by a capital little concert. The total receipts for the day amounted to £426, and there seems every probability that the whole amount required will be raised.

NORWICH.—Mr. Perris has concluded a course of Winter Lectures, seven in number, on "Some Notable Books of the Period"—beginning with Mr. Darwin's "Origin of Species," and concluding with Dr. Martineau's "Hours of Thought." They have been attended by large congregations, and the growing appreciation of this style of religious teaching is very apparent. Before commencing an extended series of "Studies in Christianity—Mediæval and Modern," Mr. Perris is devoting four Sunday evenings to estimates of "Materialism," "Secularism," "Agnosticism," and "Christian Theism."

THE FRENCH PROTESTANTS AT CANTERBURY.—Within the past few days an inspector under the Charity Commissioners held an inquiry, at Canterbury, into the foundations, endowments, and objects of the charities and endowments connected with the French Walloon Church. The Walloons, or Protestants of France, on being expelled from that country towards the latter part of the sixteenth century, fled to England, and many of them found refuge in Canterbury, importing with them their native industry of weaving, which subsequently became the staple trade of the city. They were allowed the privilege of attending public worship in the crypt of the Cathedral, and the service has continued since that period, the expenses being met by trifling legacies and property left from time to time by members of the church. There is now only one person living in Canterbury, an old lady, who can claim direct descent from the Walloons, and she is at present residing in a cottage which forms part of the charity property of the church, the total income of which is about £160 per annum, derived principally from land in the county of Kent. The salary of £120 a year has been recently paid to the pastor, some doles in charity have been dispensed, and the remainder of the money has been expended in connection with the services in the church. The inquiry has resulted in a scheme for maintaining in the crypt "a pacific and uncontroversial form of Protestant service." The Times remarks that the desirability of granting, in a similar manner, the use of at least a portion of our large churches to Christians who are not members of the Church of England, instead of compelling them to raise new edifices will occur to not a few.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE, LONDON.—At the annual general meeting last week the following persons were admitted as life governors:—Sir Thomas Brassey, M.P., Mr. Arthur Cohen, Q.C., M.P., the Right Hon. Lord Justice Sir Nathaniel Lindley, Mr. John William Mellon, Q.C., M.P., Mr. John Morley, M.A., Mr. Philip Henry Pye-Smith, M.D., Mr. George Scharf, F.S.A., Miss Emily Sharpe. The following were admitted as Fellows:—Dugald Sutherland MacColl, M.A., London; John Ambrose Fleming, D.Sc. London, B.A. Cambridge; Nathaniel Micklem, B.A., L.C.B. London, B.C.L. Oxford; Angel Moncy, M.D., B.S. London; Thomas Edward Scrutton, M.A. London, B.A., L.C.B. Cambridge; Dawson Williams, M.D., B.S. London.

Obituary.

R. W. MACKAY.

Robert William Mackay, whose death was recently recorded in the journals, deserves the recognition due to scholarship and independent thought. Mr. Mackay was born in London, May 27, 1803, and educated at Winchester and Oxford. After graduating in honours he was called to the Bar, but never practised. In 1851 he married Frances, a daughter of Dr. Fellowes, the author of the "Religion of the Universe," a third edition of which was edited by his son-in-law in 1864, and whose sincere devotion to what he deemed the cause of truth was attested by the practical sacrifices which illustrated it. A life of thoughtful leisure and literary activity was closed by Mr. Mackay, after some years of patient suffering, in a death which came like a sudden sleep, at his residence in Hamilton-terrace. In early life Mr. Mackay turned his attention to the study of Political Economy. The science of Chemistry had also a fascination for him. Philosophy, however, was his chief attraction. In particular the works of Plato and Aristotle, the speculations of the German metaphysicians and the profound criticisms of the German theologians preoccupied and stimulated his reflective and logical mind. The result of prolonged reading and careful inquiry, his most important work "The Progress of the Intellect as exemplified in the Religious Development of the Greeks and Hebrews," was given to the world in 1851. The book is in the main an attempt to interpret the myths of the classical world, but it is also an essay on Jewish symbolism, Alexandrian theosophy, and speculative Christianity. If reason presides over the process of interpretation, the "free fancy that wove the web of Mythos," is not unrecognised by the philosophical critic, nor is the poetry of the symbol obscured by the erudition which explains it.

In 1854 Mr. Mackay published "A Sketch of the Rise and Progress of Christianity," defining that religion as originally a reform of the narrow ceremonial Judaism of the time, and tracing the various phases of its historical development from the Catholic concentration of the second century to the rise of the Papacy and the scholastic philosophy of the Middle Ages. In "The Tübingen School and its Antecedents" (1863) he reviews the history and the present condition of modern theology with a general acceptance of the critical results of the labours of Dr. F. C. Baur and his followers. In "The Eternal Gospel" (1867) he identifies Christianity with ideal morality, absolute harmony of will or the free perfection affirmed by St. Paul. To a translation of the "Sophistes" of Plato (1868) he prefixed an introductory essay on ancient and modern sophistry, containing strictures which will not command universal assent. Divergence, indeed, from some of his conclusions, here as elsewhere, in his writings, is inevitable. In theology Mr. Mackay was a Pantheist of a refined type. His rational Christianity repudiated all supernatural intervention. His idealism was that of an independent Platonist. With his passion for all philosophical studies he united a strong predilection for poetry and painting. He was himself no mean amateur artist. The chief moral traits which impressed his friends were his truthfulness and fidelity to conviction and his simplicity of character.

MISS PAGET, of IBSTOCK.—"On the 17th inst., at her residence at Istock, in this county, Miss Paget, in the ninety-eighth year of her age." Such is the modest announcement of the deeply-regretted death of a lady who for nearly a century had resided in the neighbourhood of Leicester. Miss Clare Paget was born at Istock on the 19th Dec., 1784. She was one of the daughters of Thomas Paget, Esq., whose ancestors had resided in Istock for many generations. She was a younger sister of Thomas Paget, Esq., of Humberstone, who was a member for Leicestershire in 1831, before the passing of the Reform Bill, and who died in 1862 at the age of eighty-four. The mother of Miss Paget died in 1838 at the age of ninety-two, and of the sisters of Miss Paget none of them died under the age of eighty, and one of them, the wife of the Rev. Chas. Berry, lived to be nearly ninety. When Miss Paget was born, in 1784, the independence of America had just been declared. General Washington was made the first President of the Republic in 1789, and Miss Paget lived to survive twenty of the Presidents of the United States. She was born prior to the first French Revolution, and survived to witness two subsequent revolutions—the expulsion of the Bourbon dynasty, and the downfall of the Napoleon family—and in her declining years witnessed the re-introduction of a republic in France. George III. had reigned twenty-four years at the time of Miss Paget's birth. She was familiar with the incidents of a great part of his reign. Her life covered all the great discoveries and inventions of the century, the introduction of gas, the improved speed of the old stage coach, and the introduction and rapid increase of railways all over the world. Miss Paget was a lady of rare intelligence, full of energy, and remarkable for the extent of her sympathy with all that was good and true in the world. She was liberal in her religious and political views, and formed her own opinions on those important subjects. She made herself thoroughly acquainted with every kind of general knowledge. Endowed with a sound mind and a tenacious memory, she was enabled to profit largely by her keen observation and her extensive reading. In her later years, when her sight somewhat failed, she was regularly read to, and continued her interest in all the passing events of the time up to the present month. Her energy, the bright and winning charm of her manners, her devotion to her family and her friends under all circumstances of joy and sorrow, won from all who knew her their esteem and admiration. No distance was too far to travel, no fatigue too great to endure if any friend or relation needed her assistance or attention. Having a large family connection, for many years of her life she visited from one family to another, carrying with her, wherever she went, brightness, and joy, assistance, and consolation. The remains of Miss Paget were interred on the 22nd ult. in the family vault in Istock churchyard. The coffin was followed to the grave by her nephews, T. T. Paget, Esq., M.P., and Robert Brevin, Esq., and a large number of grand nephews and nieces. A large concourse had assembled to witness the funeral.

THE FUNERAL OF DR. BELLOWES.

Dr. Robert Collyer gives in the Christian Register the following pathetic account of the funeral of Dr. Bellows:—

The account of the funeral of Dr. Bellows ought to be written in tears; and yet, if the pictorial art could be employed to depict it, there would be strong and vivid gleams of light falling as if from the open heavens. It was a most impressive scene. The vast audience was thrilled and hushed by a common sentiment of love and grief. There did not appear to be an indifferent or a dry-eyed person present. The drops fell fast down the rugged faces of men unaccustomed to shed tears. It was a mute tribute beyond the eloquence of a Paul or an Apollon.

To one who was a part of that scene, feeling with it and sharing the deep grief of the time, it is impossible to put the strongest impressions into words. Perhaps no other congregation, as Mr. Hale so truly said, was ever bound to a pastor with such a vital and organic tie. Every one felt personally maimed and hurt by the great blow. The shell was there,—the church so familiar, which he had long animated by his presence. Every look, tone, and gesture came back so vividly, it was impossible to believe that he was lying in that black casket. He must presently step into his accustomed place, and begin to speak to us. The congregation was all present, every face in the place where it had always greeted him from Sunday to Sunday. You will hear from other hands of the distinguished and great of the land who were present. There were many eminent clergymen of his own denomination there, and a large number of the orthodox ministers of the city. But the poor and humble were there also. I saw poor men passing his coffin with a look of profound reverence. The clubs, the Union League and Century, of which he was a member, sent committees; and scores of his associates in reform work and great public measures were there to take leave of one who had been their leader for the last thirty or forty years. It would have been a fine thing if some of the soldiers for whom he did so much while engaged in the Sanitary Commission could have been present to testify their gratitude for his priceless labours.

Mr. Hale's words were fitly chosen, but, if perfect silence had been observed, it would have seemed an eloquent sermon. The funeral was very simple, and this [was] doubtless in consonance with the dead pastor's own wish. The casket was covered with black cloth, and bore silver handles and mountings. There were a few flowers and palms upon it. On either side were placed the floral offerings of friends, but they were not showy or costly. They were genuine tributes of affection. Dr. Bellows's well-known dislike of funeral pomp and the good taste of his people made the funeral memorable in

A TYPICAL MEETING.

A LITTLE while ago the writer was present at a meeting where a paper was read on "The Conservation of Force." The paper was well written, and not badly read, and it seemed to give great satisfaction to the assembly to which it was delivered. The reader recapitulated the well known experiments and discoveries of JOULE and others with respect to the correlation and equivalence of the various forces of the physical universe. In all this there was nothing to be remarked upon except the evident fact that a number of tradesmen of active mental habits showed a praiseworthy interest in something beyond the bounds and means by which they made profits. But what was noticeable was that the writer, in concluding his paper, insisted with strong emphasis that he knew, and could know nothing but physical force, all beyond—if there was anything beyond—was altogether unknowable to human beings; and that there is an inevitable tendency to an equilibrium of forces throughout the universe, which in the process of time will lead not only to the extinction of all life on the earth, but in all other worlds of space. Thus there will be an end to all organised beings as well as to all the grand projects of human progress, and growth in what is better towards the best. Our mental exclamation was, whoever heard of such a monster of a Saturn as this before, which not only devours its own offspring but also itself! And this is Nature in which the poet and the scientist alike rejoice? Well, let us hear what further may be said.

After a pause a gentleman rose, who said that he was sorry to hear the conclusion of the paper, for if it was true, the outlook of humanity was, indeed, a dismal one. There was nothing comforting or inspiring in such a prospect, but it was depressing in the extreme, and he thought such views were rather calculated to do harm morally than to do any good. When he sat down speaker after speaker rose, and rebuked this gentleman for his "pusillanimity"—it was not comfort or inspiration that men ought to seek but facts, and the man of superior intellectual powers was satisfied with facts, while the Christian of meaner mental faculty was generally too weak to face the facts. We must make up our minds to live our little round of life, and then cease to be like other creatures. The meeting was closed by a few sensible remarks by the Chairman; for the essayist made no attempt to comment on what had been said; and we left the place with curious thoughts fast thronging through our minds.

First, we asked ourselves why men should not seek "comfort" and "inspiration" in the views they take of life, death, and the tendency of things? Even though man be but a product of physical nature, there is no denying that hope is an essential and original faculty of his mind, and therefore he cannot help looking forward to the future, and anticipating good. But if there is nothing better for man to look forward to than the prospect of utter extinction, not only of the individual unit, but of the whole race, where is there any chance for hope to kindle in the mind of the philanthropist, who is labouring to raise the low and redeem the bad? Or where is the inspiration of the wise, far-seeing statesman to come from who labours for the attainment of projects that need many generations to bring out the real good? Where is the sustaining power of the reformer to come from who toils to remove evils, and worn-out institutions, and to substitute better ones in their place. Let men generally come to the conclusion that only time belongs to the race, and that this is limited, and every generous impulse to action, every effort at improvement will be chilled and restrained by the all-pervading sense of "Vain, vain, it is all vain!" What is near at hand, what is immediate and temporary, might still be worked for; but the vision of the mind would be shortened, and nothing like the aims of the prophets, or the ends sought by the saviour of men, would or could be looked forward to and striven for. The mental outlook of the best men of the world would be vastly shortened, the noblest enthusiasms of the soul damped; and, as it seems to us, over most minds there would creep the cowardly question when any high project was mooted: "What's the use? it will be all the same in the long run!" Whatever its advocates may think, it seems to us the inevitable result of believing that nothing but physical forces exists, and that humanity is fast hastening to extinction. In fact, we are not sure whether with the large part of mankind there would not come the moral callousness, "Things will last our time, and maybe a few generations more, but in the long run it will be all the same; let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die!" Even the Positivist, who says that he is willing to forego his individual immortality for the sake of living as an influence in the race, would lose his impulse to work for the good of mankind in despair of the vanity of toiling for aims that should end in extinction, for hope is essential to all noble effort.

Another thing struck forcibly on our mind, in reference to the persons who composed the meeting—or at least those who spoke, and seemed to express its convictions. They were Utilitarians in their philosophy as well as Materialists; and we asked ourselves why they felt bound to condemn the speaker who contended for that which would tend to the welfare of the race while it lasted, even though he might be wrong as a matter of fact? For, surely, it is not to the interest of mankind that they should have an outlook which ends in the utter dissolution of everything but the atoms which make up this mighty and glorious cosmos—to the extinction of all organised and conscious being? And yet they contended for this in a fierce, dogmatic spirit—asserting with as much positiveness that nothing but matter and its various modes existed as ever the Calvinist declared his awful doctrines. We gathered that most of them had belonged at some time in their lives to one Orthodox Church or another; and it was evident that while they had left their old opinions behind they had not changed their principles in the least. Though it may be lamented, it can hardly, perhaps, be wondered at that they were so bitter against whatever smacked in any way of their old faith.

We should like to ask why these people are so fond of using the term "Unknowable"? For by this they measure the possibilities of the future as well as those of the past. Many things that were once unknown, and which seemed to be beyond the reach of man's mind, have in these later days become known. SOCRATES in his time warned his fellow-citizens against the study of Nature, whose secrets the gods had reserved for themselves, and urged them to study themselves, by which something like knowledge might be gained. The advice in our day seems reversed, and men's attention is called exclusively to material nature, where something may be achieved, while it is impossible to know anything beyond physical phenomena. It seems to us the sheerest dogmatism to go on reiterating the term "Unknowable." But the fact is, that the same class of mind which, under the "old dispensation," was theologically superstitious, under the "new dispensation" is scientifically superstitious. As formerly they would have superstitiously accepted anything slavishly that "the Church" or "Scripture" declared, so in these later times they, with equal slavishness, receive anything declared in the name of science. The Scientist has simply taken the place of the priest or the preacher; and we are now almost in as much danger from the cant of science as were our fathers from theological cant—for we cannot bring our pen to write the term religious in such a connection. What does anyone know of matter beyond the effects which force, or combination of forces called by that name, produce? And at the worst we know equally as much of mind, which is at least altogether different in its operations and effects from any matter we know anything about. We know, if we are to trust the results of recent experiments, that so much physical force will produce an equivalent material result, and nothing more. Concentrate its action on one object, and its effect is seen in equal proportion to the force expended; diffuse it on many, and you only weaken it in the same proportion on each. But with mind force it is altogether different. A speaker shall pour forth his thoughts to one individual, and he has a certain effect upon him; let another be admitted, the effect on the first is not lessened, while equal energy is exerted on the second; and so on with a third, or a fourth, up to any number who can hear the words of the speaker. So it is with the thoughts of a book; that thousands read it does not detract from the amount of mind force it exerts on any one reader. Thus the glowing suggestiveness of a great poem, the word-pictures of a great history, the strong reasonings of a great philosopher, are not weakened in their effects on any one mind by being diffused through many other minds. No mother loves the rest of her children less by her love for any one of them. Such is the difference between mind force and physical force; and surely some attention ought to be paid to these facts; and the acknowledgment made—if an inference is to be drawn—that existence is dual: mind is real, and so is matter. For our own part we should incline to the induction that matter is a mode of force, and that force is ultimately resolvable into the operations of will—that this grand Universe, with its fertile earth and its revolving stars and blazing suns, are, but the thoughts of GOD projected into space; and we have little doubt that when the present transition period of science has been passed through it will ultimately bring us to that conclusion.

DISSOLVING VIEWS OF ORTHODOXY.

II.—THE DIVINITY OF CHRIST.

PERHAPS no doctrine of Orthodoxy has been more variously held and interpreted than that of the Divinity of CHRIST. By some it has been understood in a sense which, with little change of verbal expression, Unitarians might accept. By others it has been held in various forms, culminating at last in the grossest possible hero-worship, superstition, and idolatry. The Rev. JOHN HUNTER, of York, devotes his third lecture to this subject. In what he says regarding its importance and deeply interesting character we fully agree. We are quite in accord with him when he says that “no other question so strongly interested Christian believers, for CHRIST was Christianity.” And no doubt it is true also that “the controversies of Christendom concentrate themselves about the person of CHRIST.” How is it that these controversies have arisen? We think this fact is largely owing to the circumstance of legendary unhistorical elements being blended so freely with the historical portions of the Gospel narratives. These legendary marvels appear to lift CHRIST above the plane of actual humanity, and invest him with an enigmatical character. They have been the chief source of the controversies about him from the first. They have made the CHRIST a puzzle to many sober rational thinkers. We firmly believe that if we had only strictly historical materials to deal with in the Gospels, if the legendary portions could be entirely eliminated, there would be no difficulty in regard to the person of CHRIST. His true humanity—that he was in person simply man and nothing more—would be established beyond all controversy. The theories of Orthodoxy regarding the person of CHRIST derive countenance and support almost exclusively from the unhistorical portions of the New Testament. The accretions of fiction and legend in the New Testament literature form chiefly the basis of the popular Christology. We draw attention to this point because we believe it affords the true solution of the difficulty. “That mystery,” says Mr. HUNTER, “in which all other mysteries met, may never be fully solved.” We reply, it is not reasonable to expect it can be solved while all the varied contents of the New Testament are indiscriminately accepted as history.

Plunging into his subject, Mr. HUNTER first reviews existing theories of the person of CHRIST, as “preparatory to a truer and better statement of his essential divinity.”

1. The humanitarian, or “more man” conception. 2. The theory held by the Channing School of Unitarians. 3. The Arian theory. These are all dismissed on various grounds as unsatisfactory. We must pass his objections by, for if we examined them, we should have no space left for considering the lecturer’s own exposition of the doctrine. The prevailing theory is well known. It is that of “two distinct natures in one person—a human and a Divine nature dwelling, like two tangent circles, in the third circumference of CHRIST’s person.” This theory Mr. HUNTER rejects. It “reduces the life the Gospels record to a moral and spiritual dualism that is inconceivable. No such distinction exists in the Gospels. We do not find in them that one part of CHRIST did this, and another part of CHRIST did that, but that the whole undivided CHRIST was present in every act.”

Now this is a very important admission; it is precisely what Unitarians have said again and again, when objecting to the doctrine of two natures in the person of CHRIST—a divine and a human nature. In rejecting this theory Mr. HUNTER not only throws aside the view held by the vast majority of Christians, but he surrenders the only intelligible hypothesis of a personal divinity and personal humanity together in CHRIST. The theory of two distinct natures, however objectionable on other grounds, does really set forth JESUS as at once both GOD and man—GOD in virtue of his divine nature, and man in virtue of his human nature. To give up this hypothesis is, it seems to us, really to give up the doctrine of the personal Deity of JESUS CHRIST. We should like to know, too, how Mr. HUNTER explains certain sayings of CHRIST which believers in his divinity have hitherto ascribed to him in his human nature, such as that he knew not the day or hour of a certain future event, and that it was not his to give a certain place of honour in his kingdom. The usual reply when Unitarians have instanced these and other similar sayings of JESUS has been that he spoke then only in his human nature—that he said these things as man only. The reply was utterly worthless and evasive, but it had the appearance of meeting the difficulty.

The conception, which we are told Mr. HUNTER “expounded at great length,” is given in the report before us in a few lines. It may therefore do some injustice to his exposition. His doctrine is that of “the essential identity of the Divine and the Human in the person of CHRIST the Divine humanity. The Incarnation of JESUS CHRIST was the manifestation in visible and temporal form of the humanity of GOD. It is the Divine humanity, not a humanity originating in time, or humanity in its actual and imperfect aspect, which we behold in the son of man and the son of GOD of the Christian Gospel. A humanity free from sin, from all local and national peculiarities, from characteristics of age and sex, and temperament, which united in majestic and delicate proportion qualities found elsewhere incongruous and in separation, was not derived from the race, but brought into it from above, the fulness of the Godhead bodily, subject, that is, to temporal limitations.”

Let the reader read these sentences over carefully, and we expect him to ask, What becomes of the true humanity of CHRIST—where is “the man CHRIST JESUS?” It is perfectly idle to talk of a humanity not originating in time, not representing man in his actual and imperfect state—a humanity free from all local and national peculiarities, free from characteristics of age, sex, and temperament, uniting qualities not found united in the human race elsewhere, and brought into existence from above. The being of whom all this can be said is in no true sense man, belongs not to humanity. It is utter trifling to talk of the humanity of such a one. Mankind is humanity, and what is not of mankind is not humanity. In Mr. HUNTER’s exposition the humanity of CHRIST is lost in a fog of mysticism. A being is presented to us who is neither GOD nor man, but who blends together, in some mysterious fashion, attributes divine and human. The manhood is lost in the divinity, and the divinity is absorbed in the humanity, and what remains is a fancy of human speculation. Have we not here, then, another dissolving view of Orthodoxy?

Further, Mr. HUNTER ascribes a Divine humanity to Christians identical with the Divine humanity of CHRIST. He says, “The whole of revelation is based on the truth that man is kindred to GOD in his moral and spiritual attributes, in fundamental nature essentially identical. In CHRIST we behold the actual realisation, symbol, and prophecy of the perfect communion of man with GOD—the one far-off divine event to which the whole creation moves. We are partakers of the Divine nature, called to realise in our measure the glory of the Divine humanity, to sit with CHRIST on his throne, and to be perfect as GOD is perfect.”

What is this but to surrender everything special or exclusive in CHRIST’s divinity and to make it a divinity common to all Christians—might we not say to all mankind? CHRIST’s divinity is only “the actual realisation, the prophecy, the symbol” of a divinity possible to all men. He is a representative character, his divinity is typical of ours. His Incarnation is only the most striking instance of the incarnation of divinity in mankind at large. If this be so, JESUS CHRIST is not GOD any more than any spiritual man is GOD. The exposition just given is not Orthodoxy according to the creeds and other standards of orthodox belief; it is spiritual Unitarianism; and is in true accord with the ordinary teaching given in Unitarian pulpits at the present day. According to the Orthodox theory, the divinity of CHRIST resulted from his miraculous birth—of which Mr. HUNTER says nothing. The Almighty and Eternal GOD, we are told, assumed human nature, and was born of a virgin. GOD himself tabernacled with men in outward human form. CHRIST’s divinity, according to this idea, was special, exclusive, unique, altogether without parallel in the history of the world. It was essentially unlike the merely Godlike in man. But Mr. HUNTER identifies it with this latter, and so doing surrenders in reality the doctrine he undertakes to illustrate and defend. He refines and refines until it fades away like a dissolving view.

LORD REDESDALE'S LITTLE JOKE.

As the Government will not introduce a measure dealing with the oath question Lord REDESDALE is determined to supply the deficiency—only Lord REDESDALE has a way of settling the matter which is scarcely likely to commend itself to the Government or to the House of Commons, if it ever gets so far, when probably Mr. SAMUEL MORLEY, Mr. NEWDEGATE, and Mr. O'DONNELL will combine to support it. Lord REDESDALE'S way of dealing with the vexed subject is simple, and has the merit of carrying out to a logical conclusion the views of the hybrid majority in the House of Commons, which has been formed to keep Mr. BRADLAUGH out of the House. The Chairman of Committees in the House of Lords has introduced a little Bill, short as to length and sweet in its simplicity. Its preamble states its purpose:—"Whereas it is expedient that provision should be made against Atheists taking part in the legislation of this country," and to carry out this design he proposes that it should be enacted that "from and after the passing of this Act every peer and every member of the House of Commons in taking his seat, shall, before taking the oath of allegiance, or swearing the same in accordance with the provisions of the Parliamentary Oaths Act of 1866 make and subscribe the following declaration—"I do solemnly and sincerely and truly declare and affirm that I believe in Almighty God." In Lord REDESDALE'S opinion his proposal would relieve the whole of the present difficulty, and would offend only one man. Whether his lordship supposes that there is only one atheist in England seems rather doubtful; if he does, he is probably mistaken. If he supposes that there is only one atheist who would object to make the declaration, we think his lordship again grievously errs. Whether the proposal will ever get beyond a second reading in the House of Lords remains to be seen. What its fate will be in the House of Commons we do not pretend to say. When the present Parliament was elected we should have had no hesitation in saying that such a measure had not a ghost of a chance of being carried, but recent events, and the conduct of certain pseudo-Liberals make us less incline to confident assertion. The vote of Monday last in the House of Commons makes it abundantly clear that a measure for the abolition of the Parliamentary oath would meet with hardly any success, and in view of the lawless spirit animating the majority of that assembly there is little object in attempting fresh legislation, unless it were in the line of giving to courts of law the power of punishing members, who under the shelter of their Parliamentary privileges set themselves above the law. That is the legislation which is really wanted; but we know there is no chance of its being carried, and so shall not ery for the moon. If Lord REDESDALE were not far too serious minded a peer we should be inclined to regard his proposal as a little joke. Let us hope it will not be carried too far.

PROFESSOR W. A. HUNTER has resigned the Chair of Jurisprudence in the University College, London.

We are glad to hear that Professor Blackie is better.

A VOICE FROM INDIA.

We have read with regret an article in the Liberal—the organ of the Brahma Somaj of India—commenting in strong terms on "the attitude of the English towards the native population." We know not how far the statement is correct, but it is not conceivable that a Calcutta journal would make it if it were without foundation. The people of this country have a deep interest in India and all that concerns its welfare, and as the writer states his case in clear and forcible terms, and takes what we cannot but regard as a very just and thoughtful view of the situation, we place before our readers that portion of his article bearing on this question:—

"The fact," he says, "is to be confessed that the natives of India are looked down upon by the conquerors, and what is more painful, that a European who mixes freely with natives actually loses caste, and what is most painful still is, that such a state of things is found reconcilable with the doctrines of Christianity. It may be guessed that the intense loss of self respect which follows from this contemptuous treatment brings a corresponding rebound of hatred in the native mind. As it is a sin to mix freely with the natives, they are, as a matter of course, kept back from cultivating cordial relations with the English. Europeans may suppose that this brings no loss to themselves, that, on the contrary, it saves them from a deal of personal annoyance and inconvenience. Let us say, however, that they are mistaken. To alienate the feelings of the conquered is not only a crime, but a blunder of the first magnitude. A prudent and far-seeing statesman would certainly find in the loyalty of a people the only permanent guarantee of peace and security. He would not only make good laws, administer justice, save people from oppression and injury, but himself assume the role of a social leader, if not reformer, and direct the better instincts of the people under his charge. The British Government has so far only touched the surface of India. It has conquered the country, changed the laws, introduced a new code of etiquette, given a new polish to the surface and manners of things, in a word, made the map of India red, almost every part of it. But it has not touched the hearts of the people. The judge administers laws, and has to deal with thousands of pleaders, advocates, solicitors, clients, &c., but his relation ends there. Whenever the plot of a household tragedy or comedy becomes complicated enough, he descends upon the court like a Deus ex machina, and having solved the intricacy vanishes into space. The magistrate has to govern a district and deal with all the magnates of the land; but whenever they come to see him he keeps them at arm's length from him, and so his dignity never has time to resolve itself into mutual love or esteem. The educationist considers his business ended with Latin roots and conjugations, but he probably does not know the names of above half-a-dozen of those that hear him with respect in the class-room. Even the doctor that has the right of entry into a household thinks that his complaisance and condescension are sufficiently shown in the smile (often a secret one), which the usual sixteen rupees is sure to produce. Everyone takes care to extort our admiration, respect, awe and worship; but not one commands our love. No wonder that the really independent portion of the native community keep themselves studiously aloof from European society. We do not believe that one in a thousand Europeans knows what a native really thinks. The case being so peculiar native gentlemen have been obliged to fall back upon themselves. They have their own societies, their own clubs, their own parties, their own social, educational and religious leaders, their own institutions; and, except in a few cases, they do not feel the need of resorting to the European community. European gentlemen are in high requisition whenever public occasions demand their presence, or whenever situations in offices are required, or whenever money transactions are in question. Even these may be dispensed with in time. The day is not distant when our entire energies, aspirations, needs and desires will find their scope in the native community itself, when native scholars, native statesmen, native doctors, engineers and merchants will come forward to take the direction of their society. Is such a result desirable? Probably it is, so far as the natives are concerned, but not certainly if the political future of the country is to be considered.

For is it not possible that the political and social sentiments of the people will take a wrong direction, and a little element of European culture and fellowship may rectify misguided action? The greatest danger to British rule will arise when the natives grow self-sufficient, when they find in their own community the promise and potency of life; and when, in all their relations, they will learn to dispense with European help. And such a process has begun, and we think the fact ought to be known. An educated native feels no need of resorting to European society so much as he did only a decade ago. He finds, perhaps, his spiritual needs fully satisfied in the Brahma Mandir, and does not feel the necessity of going to an English Church. He finds good doctors, scholars and politicians around him, and so has no pressing need of going elsewhere for them. Religion ought to prompt a great many to undertake the task of bringing about more cordial relations. But if the truth is to be confessed, Christianity has done almost nothing to solve this great social problem of India."

This article needs no comment. It speaks for itself, and if the facts are as alleged, a changed state of feeling is eminently desirable.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE.—The Rev. W. Gaskell, M.A., has consented to conduct the Communion of the Lord's Supper at the Conference at Liverpool. This service will be held in Hope-street Church at six o'clock in the evening, when the Conference assembles, Tuesday, 18th April.

POLITICAL OATHS AND AFFIRMATIONS.—A Parliamentary paper has been issued containing reports upon the political oaths or affirmations required from the members of Foreign Legislative Assemblies, as well as upon the mode of taking votes on divisions. The circular asking for information on these subjects was sent out on the 20th of last August. Replies in answer to it have been received from her Majesty's representatives in Austria, Bavaria, Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Hesse-Darmstadt, Italy, Montenegro, the Netherlands, Portugal, Roumania, Saxo-Coburg and Gotha, Saxony, Servia, Spain, Sweden and Norway, Switzerland, the United States, and Wurtemberg. In most of these countries some form of oath or affirmation is required. The exceptions are as follows:—In Austria no oath is taken by the members of the Legislative Assemblies, but they are obliged to make an affirmation. In France no oaths or affirmations are required from the members of either Legislative Assembly. In Germany neither oath nor affirmation of any kind whatever is required from the members of the Reichstag or Imperial Representative Chamber. A similar rule holds good with regard to the Bundesrath, or Federal Council. The members of the Federal Council must, however, as State officials, have previously taken the oath of allegiance to their respective Sovereigns. In the local parliaments the oath of allegiance is obligatory. Should a duly elected member refuse to take it, he cannot, under any pretence whatever, be admitted to the Chamber for which he has been returned. In Roumania no oath or affirmation whatever is required from a member of either the Senate or the Chamber of Deputies to enable him to take his seat as such. In Sweden only the Presidents and Vice-Presidents of the two Chambers are required to take the oath. In Norway no oath is required of the members of the Storting. In the United States the senators and members of the House of Representatives bind themselves by oath or affirmation to support the Constitution. In Wurtemberg the rules governing the proceedings in the two Chambers make no reference to any form of oath or affirmation being in force.

CHURCH AND STATE IN FRANCE.—An association called the National League for the Separation of the Churches from the State has been founded in Paris. The expression "Churches" includes the Protestant and other creeds which in common with the Roman Catholic Church receive aid out of the national Treasury in France. Among the members of the association are M. Boyssset, Vice-President of the Chamber of Deputies, M. Camille Farcy, and many other well-known politicians and litterateurs.

LIVERPOOL.—A general meeting of the Association of Science and Arts was held in the Free Library, on Thursday week, Mr. Councillor S. Leigh-Gregson, F.R.G.S., in the chair. The Rev. S. Fletcher Williams read an interesting paper, entitled "Charles Kingsley; Poet, Novelist, and Social Reformer," which was listened to with great interest, and elicited frequent applause.

Occasional Notes.

THE Rev. John Hunter's long letter on "Dissolving Views of Orthodoxy," which we print in another page, requires at present no further direct reply than we are giving in the series of articles under that head. He must forgive us for saying that we are amused at the opening declaration that he has "no wish to be dragged into any controversy on the points at issue between Unitarianism and Orthodoxy." Why, his own lectures, on which we have commented with all due respect, are full of controversial matter, and are a direct challenge to Unitarians, which we could do no otherwise than accept. Mr. Hunter surely can hardly mean that he is at liberty to criticise us and that we are not at liberty to criticise him. There is no need for his protest against "insinuation." We have simply stated facts, and drawn what appear to us the logical conclusions. We have only a single remark to add at present in reply to one of Mr. Hunter's multifarious questions. "Where is Unitarianism to be found?" Surely, according to every recognised canon of controversy, in the writings of those who are generally recognised as its foremost thinkers and theologians, and not in "the teachings of lesser lights," who represent no one but themselves. If Mr. Hunter and any others of his school will accept this canon and address themselves to the task of replying to the writings of Channing, Dewey, Furness, Martineau, and Thom, he will probably meet with as much success as Dr. Allon in his recent criticism of one of "the latest of these revered writers. Will Mr. Hunter be surprised to hear that the four facts which he states at the close of his letter as expressing "the pure constituents of Christianity" according to "the old faith," precisely represent our own strongest and deepest convictions, except that we should give the third with some slight modification, rather in the form of expression than in the essential idea?

THE "Letters of Bishop Thirlwall, Literary and Theological," which we have only just had the opportunity of reading, are full of interest and value; the second volume in particular, edited by Dean Stanley, and addressed to "a young friend in whom the Bishop took great interest," giving a delightful picture of the writer in his private relations, in all the play of affection and humour, and even the peculiarities and little weakness which show his human sympathies. Dean Stanley speaks most happily of "the kindly, genial, human heart which lay underneath that massive intellect," marked by the stern gravity and reserve of manner which chiefly impressed the outward observer, and society generally. We can see from these volumes that his mind was liberal to the extreme, in the true sense of the word—that is, a mind believing infinitely in the value of freedom in thought and action; it was, as one of his best reviewers writes, eminently reasonable and critical, distinguishing clearly between known truth and probable speculation or respectable tradition; accordingly inclined to lay stress only on main principles of faith, leaving a large room for variety of opinion on secondary matters, and resolute in all cases to come to some sure and distinct basis of certainty, wherever certainty might be had—yet it was the very reverse of what is commonly called a "sceptical" mind, holding all things to be open questions, dwelling in a cloud-land of hazy, loose conceptions, and perfectly content with these, provided only that they are tinged with some bright hues of imagination and glow of fervour. Whatever he held, he held with the most complete firmness and definiteness, and with the strongest belief in the value of truth, as truth; and while his limits of Christian faith were wide, he fully understood that there were limits, and that these could not be overstepped.

THERE is an interesting passage in these Letters on the true cause of the secession of Dr. Newman to Rome, which shows what we have long believed, that there is an essential similarity in the mental character of the Cardinal and his brother, Professor F. W. Newman:—

It is necessary to be cautious in speculating on the character of another man's mind, especially for those who know nothing of him from personal acquaintance, which is my case as to Newman. But although it may be true that there was a want of balance and harmony in his nature, I doubt very much whether his secession was owing to the predominance of the imaginative element or to his proneness to the sensuous in religion. I see no reason for thinking that this was the attraction by which he was carried to Rome. My view of his character and internal history is, that his mind was essentially sceptical and sophistical, endowed with various talents in an eminent degree, but not with the power of taking firm hold on either speculative or historical truth. Yet his craving for truth was strong in proportion to the purity of his life and conscience. He felt that he was entirely unable to satisfy this craving by any mental operations of his own, and that if he was to depend on his own ability to arrive at any settled conclusion he should be for ever floating in a sea of doubt; therefore he was irresistibly impelled to take refuge under the wings of an infallible authority. No doubt this was an act of pure self-will. He bowed to an image which he had first himself set up. There was at once his strength and his weakness. He could deceive himself, and could not help letting himself be deceived.

THERE is a letter dealing in the Bishop's thorough style of treatment with the important subject of the personal recognition of friends in a future life. He writes as follows to his young friend in the hour of sorrow over a recent bereavement:—

The belief in a personal reunion of friends in a future state is, no doubt, only a belief, incapable of a strict demonstration, and not explicitly revealed. It may therefore be consistently rejected by those who withhold their assent from whatever is not so demonstrated or revealed, as of course it must be by those who altogether deny the existence of a world of spirits. But for those who admit the reality of a spiritual world, the affirmation of the negative doctrine is an utterly unwarranted dogmatism on the mere ground of ignorance. The belief in personal reunion and recognition has been held by the wisest and best religious thinkers of all ages. If it is not explicitly taught in the New Testament—that is, if passages which seem to express it admit of a different interpretation—it is at least apparently implied and assumed throughout.

It is, I am aware, hazardous to reason from physical to spiritual laws of being; but I am struck by an analogy which seems to favour the belief which cheers so many bereaved hearts. The great physical doctrine on which men of science appear to be either quite agreed or rapidly coming to an agreement is that of the conservation or (as it has been proposed to call it, persistency of forces, or force. No force is ever lost, but only passes into a new form. Motion becomes heat. When the fall of the hammer is arrested by the anvil, there is a sudden cessation of a more or less rapid motion; but it is invisibly prolonged by an inward vibration, which changes the temperature of the anvil, and which, if iron was sensitive, would be accompanied by acute pain. . . . Then, I would ask, are not love and friendship forces? Very real, spiritual forces, which in the present state subsist (persist) through all the changes—outward and inward—of our mortal life? Is it to be thought that they are more liable to perish than those which are employed in making a horse-shoe? And if they are indestructible, can it be conceived that they are to remain for ever without an appropriate object?

THE Bishop's words on a kindred subject—the comparison of the acceptance of death by the philosopher and the Christian—show how entirely in his mind, thoroughly philosophic as it was, and thoroughly prepared to recognise in truth and righteousness everywhere, the voice of God in the soul, Christian faith held a calm and unquestioned supremacy:—

But what seems to me strangest of all is that the heathen philosophers of any sect should be supposed to have an advantage in this respect over a Christian. Socrates himself believed that he had no reason to fear death, because for him it could not be a positive evil, and might be relatively a good. That was the utmost extent of the 'welcome' he would give to it. Who, then, shall represent the Christian view? St. Paul. His language is "To me to live is Christ, and to die is gain."

"I am in a strait betwixt two, having a desire to depart and to be with Christ, which is far better. Nevertheless, to abide in the flesh is more needful for you."

That seems to go a long way beyond Socrates in the "welcoming" of death.

The instinctive dread of death, when apparently near at hand, has, I believe, been always equally strong among all members of the human race. I showed you how it haunted cultivated minds in the heathen world, even when viewed from a distance. If it casts a deeper shade over any Christian life, it is only in connection with the doctrine of future retribution. But when you compare a philosopher with a Christian you ought to consider them both as such, and not to contrast a philosopher who is true to his principles with a bad, inconsistent Christian. You seem quite to have forgotten that if there were philosophers—who, I believe, might be counted on the fingers of one hand—"who courted death even to suicide," there were hundreds and thousands of Christians who courted it even to martyrdom.

The ordinary complaint of divines is, that the certainty of death and the uncertainty of life make so little practical impression on the minds of their hearers. But if the question is whether the ancient philosophy (of any sect) or the Christian faith (common to all Churches) has been the more potent to raise men above the fear of death, I should like to know where is the ancient philosopher who ever broke out into such a pæan as "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory!" When you say, "Yet the hereafter was equally obscure to each," you confuse two entirely different things. To the philosopher the hereafter was indeed obscure, as he was himself conscious of its obscurity. But to the Christian it was no otherwise obscure than as others might doubt that which he believed. To himself, so far as concerned his "acceptance of death," it was not in the least obscure. It was a fact as clear and certain—rather more so—as any of his present existence.

In another letter, referring to that popular American work "Gates Ajar," the Bishop writes:—

The defect seems to be that it is too purely epicurean, and that it offers little more than a continuation of earthly enjoyment without action or progress. There is a larger and higher view of the subject in Stopford Brooke's first sermon on Immortality. Do you know them? He seems to me the best of all the London preachers to read, but I never heard him.

MANY of our readers have probably heard of the Metaphysical Society, which was founded, we believe, by the late Dean Stanley and Cardinal Manning, and of which Dr. Martineau, Frederick Harrison, Herbert Spencer, and other notable thinkers are members. In a passing reference to this famous Society the Bishop alludes to another well-known friend:—

If it was once resolved to admit ladies into the Metaphysical Society, I am sure that Miss Cobbe would be elected by acclamation. But I do not know whether she would like to be the only lady, or how many could be found like her.

THAT ancient and venerable "body of ministers in and about the cities of London and Westminster," which dates from about 1665, assembled at Dr. Williams's Library on Tuesday last, Professor Drummond, D.D., in the chair, and unanimously adopted an address of sympathy with the Queen on her escape from her recent peril. We shall give the address next week, and report the circumstances attending its presentation, the date of which has not yet been announced. To avoid misconception, it may be well to state that this is not the small body of Scotch Presbyterian ministers in London which has allied itself with "the Three Denominations," and is conspicuous for its Orthodoxy, but the historical body of English Presbyterian ministers which has steadily opposed all imposition of creeds and tests, and has, therefore, become—well, not exactly conspicuous for its Orthodoxy, as may be judged from the fact that the Professors of Manchester New College are among its members, and that Dr. Sadler has been its secretary for more than thirty years. This body had the right of access to the Throne conferred upon it after the separation of the "Three Denominations."

Most English Unitarians feel an interest in the Unitarian congregation of Philadelphia on account of the deserved eminence of its former venerated minister, Dr. Furness, a man second only to Channing in the singular purity of his character and the depth of his spirituality. We read therefore with pleasure that "The First Unitarian Church of this city is to have a new church building, a structure, the promised cost of which is not to exceed $50,000, $20,000 of which has been subscribed before the canvass begins. The society is very anxious to be able to lay the corner-stone on the approaching eightieth birthday of Dr. Furness, and hopes that the first voice heard within its completed walls will be his who was their minister for fifty years."

FRENCH Protestants, writes the Paris correspondent of the Daily News, are averse to any encouragement being given to the branch of the Salvation Army which has opened a campaign in Paris. They fear that it will have the effect of removing the working classes still further away from Christianity, which will not be received in France unless in an attractive form. The faculties of the intellect are allowed so much expansion in French civilisation that no kind of sympathy is felt anywhere for extravagance. Those sensational pilgrimages to Lourdes and Paray-le-Monial which were got up soon after the war by the Ultramontanes caused a reaction against Clericalism in every form. There is a movement in favour of Protestantism of a large, liberal, and rational kind. It has been shown in various ways, but it is not a powerful movement; and if irrational English enthusiasts come over to make a noise, it will stifle the movement. Le XIXème Siècle protests against the Salvation Army tactics, which it calls the insolent negation of the simplicity and spiritualism of the Gospel. A high Protestant authority writes to that journal to say that the Gospel addresses itself to the intellect, and does not base itself upon the germs of insanity in the human mind. He therefore protests against the English propaganda. A student of evangelical divinity hopes the missionaries will be severely judged by the French Protestants who want to reconcile religious faith and modern culture. Protestantism, in France in our opinion, has always been too purely intellectual and dogmatic ever to take strong hold of the French people. Even Liberalism has been too bald and unattractive, and has carefully ignored the emotional and æsthetic side of human nature. What France especially needs is a reformed Catholicism; a simple creed and a stately ceremonial.

THE Revue des Deux Mondes of the 15th Feb. contains a long article by M. Renan on "Ecclesiastes," in which the author develops his well-known views upon the subject of the preacher and his book as a preface to his forthcoming translation. According to M. Renan "Ecclesiastes" was written about 100 B.C., under the Assyrians, and was not translated into Greek till about 130 A.D. The author was "the ideal of what was called a Sadducee, that is to say, of those rich persons, devoid of fanaticism, devoid of belief of any sort in the future, who were attached to the service of the Temple by which they lived, and who, entertaining a lively hatred of fanatics, were always well pleased to see them put to death." Of Greek influence in the book M. Renan sees no trace, and he altogether refuses to accept the elaborate hypothesis of the great Jewish historian, Dr. Graetz, by which "Ecclesiastes" becomes a satire upon Herod the Great, written under the rule of that King. At the end of the article a few brilliant paragraphs are devoted to tracing the type of character revealed in "Ecclesiastes" from antiquity to our own days. The sceptical and worldly preacher represents, we are told, what has always been the other and under side of Jewish nationality. Divided by an immense gulf from the spiritual and ascetic life of Israel, the type of character embodied in Ecclesiastes lives again in the rich commercial and indifferent Jew of modern times.

Two neighbouring Nonconformist ministers have, according to report, lately seceded to the Established Church—the Rev. J. Gamble, Congregationalist, of Hopton, Yorks and the Rev. J. P. Cushing, Baptist, of Mirfield. Mr. Cushing, it is stated, was brought up in the Establishment, and is, therefore, but "returning to the faith of his fathers."

THE Wesleyan Methodist Magazine has called the attention of the Methodist ministry and people to the matter of Preaching on Future Punishment. The question has been raised whether the penal sanctions of law, in particular the doctrine of eternal punishment, have their due place in modern preaching as compared with that of former times. The writer gave it as his personal testimony that, except a solemn sermon from Mr. Moody, and another "from a great preacher from whom many would have least expected it," he does not "remember, for many long years past, to have heard a discourse treating formally and explicitly of this truth." It is claimed that Methodism, as well as early Christianity, and the greatest religious movements of all times, won their triumphs by means of it. The Christian World takes it as assumed by this writer, that even the Methodist ministry—as close bound as any in Christendom—has begun to waver seriously on this doctrine. "Why? Has it ever occurred to this gentleman that these ministers may believe it less than they did? This question suggests many others which cannot be ignored. At any rate, it is now too late to attempt to frighten men into saying they believe a creed about which they cannot help entertaining some grave doubts."

A RECENT letter of Mr. Conway's, in the Index of Boston, U.S., gives the result of a preliminary meeting called in London two or three years ago, for the purpose of organising a large association to promote the spread of free religious ideas. Eminent persons attended, among them Professors Huxley and J. Estlin Carpenter. The result of their deliberations was that "no occasion was found to organise liberal lectures, for London was full of them, nor to publish a new journal or magazine, for there were plenty, such as the Fortnightly, Nineteenth Century, Mind, Westminster, Contemporary, Modern Thought, National Reformer, Secular Review, &c., all anxious to print all that cultured free thinkers could write. Literally, there was no raison d'être for such organisation, simply because London was itself already an association of liberal thinkers, so far as it was thinking at all." We fancy that this ambitious effort was stifled by Dr. Martineau's terse and conclusive aphorism, "Negations form no bond of union."

UNDER the title "A Day at Margate" Miss Margaret Lonsdale, the authoress of the romantic biography of "Sister Dora," describes in Macmillan's Magazine the Hospital for Scrofulous Patients at that watering-place, towards the erection and completion of which, according to the most perfect known methods, Sir Erasmus Wilson has contributed the munificent sum of £25,000. The architect of the remarkable building constructed under these auspices is Mr. Knowles, the editor of the Nineteenth Century.

THE monument which Her Majesty commissioned Mr. R. Belt to prepare as a memorial of the late Lord Beaconsfield has just been completed and erected in Hughenden Church. It is placed immediately above the seat habitually occupied by the late statesman. There is a tablet bearing the following dedication, penned by her Majesty herself:—"To the dear and honoured memory of Benjamin, Earl of Beaconsfield, this memorial is placed by his grateful and affectionate Sovereign and friend Victoria, R.I. 'Kings love him that speaketh right.'—Proverbs xvi. 13. February 27, 1882." Upon this the Pall Mall Gazette remarks:—"The full text of the passage from which these words are selected is as follows:—"It is an abomination to kings to commit wickedness, for the throne is established by righteousness. Righteous lips are the delight of kings, and they love him that speaketh right." Considering the Afghan and Zulu wars every one must admit that in this affectionate tribute to a valued friend good judgment has been shown in omitting the first part of the proverb in question."

It is a commendable sign of the activity of the American Unitarian Association, as well as of the wide circulation of their best books, that at the February meeting of the Committee new editions of the following books were authorised:—The fourteenth edition of the one-volume "Channing's Works"; the eleventh edition of the "Revised Hymn and Tune Book, with Services for Congregational Worship"; the fifteenth edition of "Day unto Day," an edition of Norton's "Statement of Reasons;" of Eliot's "Doctrines of Christianity;" of "Unitarian Affirmations;" of "Memoirs of S. J. May;" of Eliot's "Lectures to Young Men."

Of the three State Universities in the Netherlands that of Leyden is largest in point of attendance, numbering 485 students on its rolls. Utrecht follows with 403, and Groningen comes last, with 202. In the newly-erected University of Amsterdam, which is a provincial and municipal institution, receiving a limited State subsidy, the number of students was 577 in 1879-80, or 92 more than the highest number of students in either State university. The numbers of students in each of the universities were divided among the various faculties as follows:—In Leyden University, in Protestant theology, 29; in law, 224; in medicine, 158; in natural sciences, 35; in philosophy and philology, 39; in all, 485. In Utrecht, pursuing the same order, the numbers were 180, 87, 89, 37, and 10, or in all, 403. In Groningen, 25, 55, 80, 22, 20, total 202, which makes the numbers in all of the universities entirely supported by the State 234 in theology, 366 in law, 327 in medicine, 94 in natural sciences, 69 in philosophy and philology, total 1,090. Now, in the University of Amsterdam, sustained by provincial and municipal contributions, the attendance for the same period was 22, 45, 34, 90, 77, total 577. The grand total was 256, 411, 670, 184, 136; or in all 1,667.

In the House of Lords on Tuesday evening the Earl of Redesdale brought in a Bill, which was read a first time, to prevent the admission of Atheists to Parliament. It applies to both Houses, and requires that every peer and every person elected to the House of Commons shall before taking his seat declare that he "Solemnly, sincerely, and truly believes in Almighty God." This seems to be an eminently ingenious device for promoting a new form of religious hypocrisy. Probably the Lords will pass the Bill. There is no chance of a Bill being brought into either House to prevent the admission of notorious gamblers, profligates, and swindlers. Noble Lords and Honourable gentlemen, in the true spirit of pharisaic Orthodoxy, are much more inveterate against honest doubt and disbelief than against any form of immorality.

BUSBECQ, the Austrian Ambassador to Constantinople (1554-1562), whose letters have been recently translated (1881), was much impressed with the abstemious habits of the Janissaries. He wrote:—"I was at the camp just before their fast, or Lent, as we should call it, and thus was still more struck with the behaviour of the men. In Christian lands at this season, not only camps, but even orderly cities, ring with games and dances, songs and shouts; everywhere are heard the sounds of revelling, drunkenness, and delirium. In short, the world runs mad. It is not improbable that there is some foundation for the story that a Turk, who happened to come to us on a diplomatic mission at one of these seasons, related on his return home that the Christians on certain days go raving mad, and are restored to their senses and their health by a kind of ashes, which are sprinkled on them in their temples. He told his friends that it was quite remarkable to see the beneficial effects of this remedy; the change was so great that one would hardly imagine them to be the same people. He referred, of course, to Ash-Wednesday and Shrove Tuesday. His hearers were the more astonished, because the Turks are acquainted with several drugs which have the power of rendering people insane, while they know of few capable of speedily restoring the reason."—Vol. I., pp. 289, 290.

INSTEAD of the authorised version of Philipians ii. 10, "At the name of Jesus every knee should bow," the revised rendering is—"In the name," &c.—in either case it is "to the glory of God the Father." Busbecq describes how the Turkish soldiers saluted the name of their prophet at the feast of Bairam:—"The men were so motionless that they seemed rooted to the ground on which they stood. There was no coughing, no clearing the throat, and no voice to be heard, and no one looked behind him or moved his head. When the priest pronounced the name of Mahomet all alike bowed their heads to their knees at the same moment; and when he uttered the name of God they fell on their faces in worship, and kissed the ground."—Vol. I., p. 303.

In commemoration of the five hundredth anniversary of Wycliff's death, which will be in the year 1884, a Wycliff Society is in course of formation, to secure the publication of the great Reformer's Latin works, with English translations. Any one willing to help in this work is asked to write to F. J. Furnival, 3, St. George's-square, London, N.W. Professor Montagu Burrows, of Oxford, Mr. Matthew, the editor of the Early English Text Society's "Wycliff's English Works," and other gentlemen have promised to join the committee. It is hoped that the society will finish its work in one or two periods of five years each.

Life, Letters, and Journals of Sir Charles Lyell, Bart., Author of "Principles of Geology," &c. Edited by his Sister-in-Law, Mrs. Lyell. In Two Volumes. With Portraits. London: J. Murray. 1881.

[SECOND NOTICE.]

It was fortunate for science that Mr. Lyell had both the desire and the ability to devote much time to journeys, to verify or correct his opinions. In addition to his frequent visits to the Continent he twice explored Mount Etna and its neighbourhood, twice visited the Scandinavian Peninsula, and twice travelled in North America. In Sweden he was deeply interested in ascertaining the truth in regard to "the great northern phenomenon," as the gradual rise of part of that country has been called. While, wherever he went, he was a missionary of geology, he was continually making original observations and (he says) "above all going to school to the younger geologists, . . . whom I meet everywhere, so far ahead of us old stagers, that they are familiar with branches of the science fast rising into importance which were not thought of when I began." We have copious extracts from his journals and letters home, but he published a fuller report of what he saw in America, viz., "Travels in North America," two vols., 1845, and "A Second Visit to the United States," 1849, besides various papers in the Proceedings of the Geological Society, &c. His first tour of thirteen months commenced in 1841. His account of the "Helderberg War" in New York State is especially interesting in the present crisis in Ireland:—

When old Van Renssaler died, the last nobleman in the United States, his vast landed estate was divided among three sons. A population of about forty thousand inhabited the share which fell to the eldest, who endeavoured to get regular payment of his rent, besides arrears which his indulgent predecessor had allowed to accumulate. Now the payment of rent, being most unusual in the United States where every man farms his own land (or what he calls his own, for it is often deeply mortgaged), was voted quite an abuse of the old feudal times. They thought they had paid long enough, and said with some truth that they had cleared a wilderness and created the property themselves. So they would pay nothing. The laird appealed to the sheriff; but they laughed at law processes, and at constables, till finally the sheriff asked for troops from the governor, who called on the volunteers, who, as with us, proved, however constitutional a force, to be a most unfit one to interfere with temper and discipline. The farmers and peasantry turned out, erected barricades and mounted some brass cannons, and have set the Government for three years at defiance.—Vol. II., pp. 57, 58.

In America he formed some intimate friendships, and some of the most valuable letters in the second volume are addressed to Mr. G. Ticknor, who was a member of Dr. Gannett's congregation. He wrote to him (Vol. II., p. 82), "I abhor the political disaffection created in Ireland, Scotland, and England by the exclusive privileges of Church of England ascendancy. It is really the power which is oppressive here, and not the monarchy or the aristocracy. Perhaps I feel it too sensitively as a scientific man; since our Puseyites have excluded physical science from Oxford. They are wise in their generation." In another letter (of five pages) he says:—

I am much obliged to you for what you told me in your letter about Channing's works and their sale, and Dewey's "History," and we read in consequence with still greater interest Channing's powerful discourse on the occasion of Jared Sparks's ordination. There is nothing which people here so overrate as the relative proportion of Unitarians as compared to the population of all other sects in Boston, and still more in New England; while they equally underrate, I suspect, the influence which the writings of the American Unitarians have exerted, and do exert, both in the United States and in this country. [He refers to a remonstrance of Whewell in the chapter on the "Travels" on Oxford and University Reform.] Public opinion is rapidly strengthening. There is a move now in the right direction; but the clerical influence arrayed against all progressive science, whether physical or literary, is too powerful to be easily overcome. My University chapter has been praised of late, where three years ago it would have acted as an exclusion from society or good fellowship.

[He is not unmindful of his own boyish repugnance to "church."] On our recent fast-day (1847) the charity children, the youngest down to four years old, had to go to church in many parishes three times; service two hours, and an hour and a half. Is there any persecution of the young perpetrated in New England on Sundays, or other days, of this kind?—Vol. II., pp. 126-128.

In America he had, like other travellers, been shown the more attractive side of slavery when visiting benevolent Southerners; he was repelled by the denunciations of the Abolitionists; and seemed not fully to appreciate the inherent crime of this "sum of all villainies," which he regarded as "more injurious to the white man than the negro;" but when the war broke out, and some who had once seemed friends of freedom sided with the South, he was staunch in maintaining the cause of the Union as against "the slave-owning oligarchy;" and considered that general emancipation was worth the "dreadful loss of blood and treasure." His letter on the subject to Mr. Spedding, occupying nine pages (Vol. II., pp. 392-400) is well worth perusal. He considered that "people in good society" had been "Times-riden." Few regular readers of the Times, when told of the suppression (of incidents and documents) of great importance, cared to know the truth, because it was disagreeable to have a chord struck out of harmony with the antipathies which had been excited by their daily reading. They would sometimes tell you that life was not long enough to read more than one paper." He contrasts the mistaken prophecies of the Times with the statements of the Daily News which were verified by the events; and Mr. Cobden would have sympathised with his conviction, of the deplorable effect of the ignorance and prejudices of our ruling classes, "partly owing to the monopoly of influence by one single journal."

We have mentioned the first publication of his "Principles of Geology;" the eleventh edition was published in 1872. The "Elements of Geology" (1838) reached the sixth edition in 1865; and in 1871 he published a "Student's Elements of Geology." The circulation cannot be computed by the number of editions, which were often very large. He was unquestionably the most distinguished geologist of his time; and he set an example of a philosophic spirit—loving the truth far more than the reputation of consistency. There is an interesting reference to Mr. Thom's "Life of Blanco White," in a letter to his father-in-law, Mr. Leonard Horner (1845):—

Blanco White's book keeps up its interest to me, and certainly it should teach every scientific man to modify his opinions, and never to contend for doctrines, because he may have once favoured them, as soon as new discoveries, facts, and reasonings, require their modification or abandonment. The little suffering or annoyance that he or his self-love have to endure is so insignificant in amount, in comparison to the penalty which the theological professor must pay for relinquishing a little of any one of the numerous dogmas or forms of interpreting scripture, which he has pledged himself to adopt for life, that he must feel ashamed, if he hesitates for a moment to recant, after reading the confessions of St. Blanco the Martyr. For the sake of this moral, which I hope many a philosopher will draw from it, I am glad that all his sufferings are given in full length.—Vol. II., p. 92.

He had maintained the successive creation of new species; and had thought it an absurd deduction from Lamarck's system—that man might have come from the Orang-Outangs; but Darwin's "Origin of Species" led him to reconsider the subject, and he finally affirmed Darwin's leading principle in his "Antiquity of Man" (1863). Before it was published there had been a great outcry at the new heresy. He thus refers to the battle at the British Association meeting in Oxford, 1860:—

The Bishop of Oxford (Wilberforce) asked whether Huxley was related by his grandfather's or his grandmother's side to an Ape. Huxley replied (I heard several varying versions of this shindy), "that if he had his choice of an ancestor, whether it should be an ape, or one who, having received a scholastic education, should use his logic to mislead an untutored public, and should treat not with argument, but with ridicule the facts and reasoning adduced to support a grave and philosophical question, he would not hesitate for a moment to prefer the ape." Many blamed Huxley for his irreverent freedom; but still more of those I heard talk of it . . . assure me that the Vice-Chancellor, Jeune (a liberal), declared that the Bishop got no more than he deserved. The Bishop had been much applauded in the section; but before it was over the crowded section (numbers could not get in) were quite turned the other way, especially by Hooker.

He proceeds to mention an incident recently related in the obituary of Mr. C. Moore, of Bath.

Mr. C. Moore interested me much in our section by the result of a collector's feat which I never heard equalled. He carted away from a fissure near Bristol two tons of the detritus of the triassic bone-bed, which had been accumulated in the said upfilled rent. He had it conveyed to his house, twenty miles distant, took two years to examine it, and found in it forty-five thousand teeth of the genus Acrodus, counted by the pint measure innumerable other fish and reptiles' teeth and bones, many shells, and nineteen teeth, besides a few vertebrae of Microtestes, and two other Mammalia genera of triassic age.—Vol. II., pp. 335, 336.

After a time he recognised that he had himself prepared the way, by his advocacy of the law of continuity, "for the reception of Darwin's gradual and insensible evolution of species;" but the hesitation with which he embraced the new theory made him very tolerant of others: when he read a few pages of his "Principles" he was apt to relapse to his old views! He wrote to Darwin (March, 1863):—

I am struck by the number of compliments, both in reviews and in conversation with the half-converted, which I receive, because I have left them to draw their own inferences, and have not told them dogmatically that they must turn round with me. . . I wish I deserved what you say about taking criticism kindly. I often think I should be as touchy as anyone, if the success of my works did not give me a constant opportunity of profiting immediately by every suggestion as to style and moral tone, and, above all, as to facts and logic. Besides the increased responsibility which I incur by the trusting public, who, before they had read a word, induced the trade to bid for 3,850 copies, I have the prospect, if I improve my knowledge and my teaching, of future success in new editions with comparatively little labour.—Vol. II., pp. 364, 365.

In the tenth edition of his "Principles" (1866-68) he formally renounced his old theory, and adopted the new:—

It was justly characterised by Dr. Hooker, in his address to the British Association at Norwich, as a bright example of heroism, that an author could thus abandon "late in life a theory which he had for forty years regarded as one of the foundation-stones of a work that had given him the highest position attainable among contemporary scientific writers;" and it was no less justly observed that the superstructure must be very solid and coherent which could allow the builder thus "to undermine it and substitute a new foundation," and yet, after all, survey his edifice, and behold it, "not only more secure, but more harmonious in its proportions than it was before."—Vol. II., p. 473.

These volumes give us the feeling that Lyell found the ways of wisdom those of pleasantness. He was happy in his temperament, in his circumstances, and in his friendships and affections. His letters to his family show how much sympathy they had with his pursuits. He somewhere remarks that ladies seemed more interested in natural history than young men, which he attributed to the narrowing effect of the education at public schools. He highly appreciated the superior women of his acquaintance, among them the distinguished Mrs. Somerville, who was one of his early friends: and in his wife he found one who was remarkably fitted to be his help-mate. She died nearly two years before him. Towards the close of his life his correspondence becomes scanty (for, from his failing sight, he had to dictate to a secretary), and we read little of the love he bore her:—"I endeavour," he wrote, "by daily work at my favourite science to forget, as far as possible, the dreadful change which this has made in my existence." He wrote to Miss Cobbe:—

* One of Darwin's reviewers put the alternative strongly by asking "whether we are to believe that man is modified mud, or modified monkey." The mud is a great come-down from the "archangel ruined."—Vol. II., p. 376.

† He subscribes himself, in his last letters to Darwin, Ticknor, Heer, &c., "ever affectionately yours."

Your articles on a "Future State" in the Theological Review have interested me much; but they confirm my opinion that we are so much out of our depth when we attempt to treat of this subject, that we gain little but doubt in such speculations. . . . I am told by some that . . . we should do nothing to disturb any man's faith, if it be a delusion which increases his happiness. But I hope and believe that the discovery and propagation of every truth, and the dispelling of every error, tends to improve and better the condition of man; though the act of reforming old opinions and institutions causes so much pain and misery.—Vol. II, p. 452.

A beautiful tribute from Miss Cobbe (p. 462) ends with the statement that "it was his frequent observation that religious sentiment deserved as much confidence as any other faculty of our nature, and in full faith and hope in God and immortality he passed calmly into the dark valley of age and death." He died Feb. 22, 1875, æt. seventy-seven.

The Appendix, which contains tributes to Sir Charles Lyell, also contains a beautiful memorial by Mr. G. S. Hillard, of Boston, U.S., of her who was the constant and cherished companion of her husband for forty years. It is too perfect to be abridged, but too long to be quoted. We copy a briefer notice by Professor Hughes:—

In the companion of his life, sharing his labour, thinking his success her own, Sir Charles had an accomplished linguist who braved with him the dangers and difficulties of travel, no matter how rough; the ever-ready prompter when memory failed, the constant adviser in all cases of difficulty. Had she not been part of him she would herself have been better known to fame. The word of encouragement which he wished to give lost none of its warmth when conveyed by her; the welcome to fellow-workers of foreign lands had a grace added when offered through her: . . . when in the vigour of unimpaired strength he struggled among the foremost in the fight for truth, then she stood by and handed him his spear or threw forward his shield.—Vol. II, p. 474. Mind. A Quarterly Journal of Psychology and Philosophy. Jan. 1882. Williams and Norgate.

It is worth noting in connection with this number of Mind that this journal is becoming less and less the distinctive organ of the psychological views associated with the names of the two Mills and of Dr. Alex. Bain, and is giving at least as much importance to the exposition of the Hegelianism now so active at Glasgow and Oxford as to the Sensational Idealism of Aberdeen and London. This may be the result of an understanding between the Editor and the leaders of English Hegelianism, but it is more probably due to the circumstance that the Editor discerns the signs of the times, sees that Sensational Idealism is no longer a power in the world of thought, and that the present interest of thinkers centres on the coming struggle between the Spencerian Evolutionists who aspire to give a natural history of man as a product of evolution, and the English Hegelians who deny the possibility of any such natural history of mind, on the ground that nature, which is a process of continuous change, could not generate a consciousness of itself, "for this consciousness of change must be equally present to all stages of the change; nor can any consciousness of change, since the whole of it must be present at once, be itself a process of change." This passage is quoted from the opening article of the present number, which forms the first part of an essay in which Professor J. H. Green discusses with great subtlety the question, "Can there be a Natural Science of Man?" Though J. S. Mill honestly confessed that his theory of Mind as a stream of actual and possible sensations, with no abiding spiritual substance, in which such sensations inhere, involved a hopeless paradox in the face of the fact of memory, yet Bain and his followers still with wearisome repetition assure us that it is a satisfactory account of man's intellectual nature to say that he is a stream of successive states of feeling, plus the faculty of retentiveness, and the power of discerning the likeness and unlikeness of sensations. To the irrepressible question which immediately forces itself upon the attention of the thoughtful student, "How can there possibly be the power of recognising the likeness and unlikeness of sensations, unless there be a permanent Self in reference to which the transient sensations come into relation with each other, and so admit of being compared?" Professor Bain vouchsafes no attention, and the young student who has recourse to his "Manual of Mental and Moral Science" is left in a state of helpless bewilderment. If, however, our sensational idealists have hitherto ignored this fundamental and fatal objection which confronts their theory of knowledge, they cannot much longer go on complacently repeating their old unproved assumptions; they will have to reckon with men who are confessedly in the foremost ranks of philosophical thinkers, and in their future "Manuals" they must at least examine and attempt to refute the most formidable array of well-reasoned objections which Professor Green advances against their fundamental doctrine.

Professor Green's paper is also of great significance to the student of the philosophy of religion; for if, as the followers of Spencer generally maintain, there can be "a natural science of man," it seems to follow as a matter of course that a soul which is a mere aggregate of psychical shocks must, like every other thing of which we can give the scientific history, be a mere transient phenomenon, passing through its cycle of growth and decay, and then dissolving into its original elements. One sees already in religious teachers who have come to regard the theory of Evolution as giving an adequate account of human nature a growing disposition to relax their hold on the belief in Immortality. Nor can it well be otherwise, for if the soul be a phenomenon which can be "scientifically" explained it must surely share the transitory nature of all phenomena. It must be admitted, however, that this English Hegelianism, while it is rescuing us from many anti-theological assumptions, engendered by recent theories of mental evolution, has not, in the case at least of Principal Caird and his admirers, strengthened, but has, on the contrary, weakened the faith in personal immortality. This, however, seems to us by no means the necessary consequence of such views as are expounded by Professor Green in the present paper. So far as his essay has gone in the present number, Professor Green has simply made good the thesis that mind, which must itself be essentially unchanging in order to know the changeable, cannot with consistency be regarded as the product of that nature which is essentially a process of incessant change. In his view it would seem that what we call objective nature is but the changing phases of the thought of the eternal thinker God. What, then, is the relation of the human mind to this Eternal Thinker? As we enlarge our knowledge of nature, our subjective thinking becomes more and more at one with God's creative thought. But how about the moral and spiritual relations of the mind of man to the spiritual principle whose thought constitutes the universe? Have we really any causality independent of His, so as to be to some extent really free to choose between obeying and disobeying the monitions of conscience? Hegelianism, both German and English, appears to shrink from attributing to man any real originaive power in the way of moral choice, and hence it becomes a vast system of Determinism. It is this portion of the doctrine, a portion which seems to us to have no necessary logical union with what is said by Professor Green in the present paper, which by undermining the consciousness of personal merit and demerit undermines one of the main foundations of the belief in personal immortality. If English Hegelianism could dissociate itself from this dogma of Determinism, which seems to rest chiefly on a false view of the nature of causation, it would, we think, furnish a lofty and satisfying religious philosophy.

Curiously enough, the next paper, on "Mind and Reality," arrives by a different route at a view of nature very similar to Professor Green's. It is by Professor Josiah Royce, of California, who suggests in place of the Mind-Stuff theory of nature, which the late Professor Clifford promulgated, a view very similar to Berkeley's, though divested as far as possible of theological associations. What we call the external world is supposed to be simply the consciousness of the universal Knowing One, and truth or falsehood is the agreement or disagreement of our personal consciousness with the World-Consciousness. Professor Royce admits that this is an undemonstrable hypothesis, and he adds that the value of such hypotheses lies not at all in themselves as ontological speculations about an Absolute, but only "in their success as expressions of the fundamental postulates and purposes of that source of all truth, Conscious Thought." Hence the concluding half of the paper is devoted to an attempt to show that this hypothesis is in harmony with and satisfies the postulate which he believes to pervade all our ideas of the external world, namely, that "external reality is something like our ideas of its nature."

The third paper is a brief but suggestive essay on "The Localisation of Fallacy," which the student of logic will find worth reading; and this is followed by the first part of a very interesting article by Mr. A. W. Benn on "The Relation of Greek Philosophy to Modern Thought." In this number the influence of Plato, Aristotle, and Democritus respectively on European thinkers up to the time of Descartes is expounded with much clearness, and the concluding portion of the essay will continue the account of Greek influence on modern thought from Hobbes to the present time.

Among the "Notes and Discussions," which are numerous and full, will be found an able paper by Dr. Edmund Montgomery on the question "Are we Cell-Aggregates?" in which he fortifies with fresh arguments the position with which he has already made the readers of Mind familiar, namely, that the animal organism must be regarded as a chemical or physiological unit, and not, as Huxley and the majority of zoologists tell us, as "a cell aggregate brought into harmonious action by a co-ordinative machinery." Dr. Montgomery believes that his view of the animal frame, which he expounds with intense earnestness and enthusiasm, has very important bearings on spiritual philosophy. "It is," he says, "only want of insight that has hitherto prevented spiritualistic reasoners from utilising as a solid basis of operation these inevitable conclusions of our present biological science. I would earnestly recommend to them the serious study of biology. . . . It is in the power of those who believe in a hypervital substance of mind to force upon biologists the consciousness of their shortcomings."

Among the "Critical Notices" is a rather long and fairly appreciative review of the treatise by Dr. Schurman, late Hibbert travelling scholar, on "Kantian Ethics, and the Ethics of Evolution," a book which we hope soon to notice in these columns. The least satisfactory part of this review is in reference to Dr. Schurman's arguments in favour of Free-will. Dr. Schurman, while holding that Kant's peculiar mode of expounding and justifying a belief in moral freedom inevitably leads to Determinism, yet declares his own firm faith in the Free-will doctrine, and maintains that there is no sufficient reason for calling in question this clear deliverance of consciousness. Dr. Schurman's reviewer informs us that "mind may be taken in two senses; it may be the formal element in all knowledge, or it may mean the 'empirical consciousness,' the subject world as distinguished from the object world." The reviewer has no difficulty in showing that in either of these senses mind must be determined, and thinks that he has thus settled the question, forgetting that to Dr. Schurman and to every Libertarian mind means something quite different from either of his alternatives.

It is curious to note the uniformity which prevails among the contributors to Mind on the question of Determinism; they seem to hold to this dogma with a blind persistency akin to that with which orthodox theologians cleave to an article of faith. To believe in Free-will is the one fatal heresy, which excludes the heretic from the sympathy of all "scientific" psychologists. How can we attain to a fully reasoned and "scientific" account of human nature if this disturbing and incalculable element of moral freedom is to be admitted into the problem? The attitude of Dr. F. Pollock in reference to this controversy is characteristic of the general tone of writers in Mind. In reviewing an able essay by M. Henri Marion, "De la Solidarité Morale," Dr. Pollock admits that M. Marion has done full justice to the principle of heredity, and to all the recent discoveries of Science, but to Dr. Pollock's "regret" he finds that M. Marion "makes a certain reservation in favour of free-will." Dr. Pollock's "regret" arises, he tells us, from the fact that this reservation of free-will from the all embracing sweep of the evolution-theory "springs from the assumption that complete philosophical determinism is inconsistent with a practicable ethical system—an assumption which M. Marion appears to think manifestly inevitable." We discover another source of Dr. Pollock's regret in the naïve remark, "it appears very desirable that the data of Ethics should be disengaged as much as possible from metaphysical questions." Such an elimination of metaphysical ideas and convictions would, no doubt, be very convenient for those evolutionists who aim to give a complete account of man and morality on "scientific" principles, but as Professor Green has shown their enterprise is a purely Quixotic one, and metaphysical ideas are too vitally connected with the very essence of our thinking to take themselves off for the sake of accommodating an evolutionist theory of human nature. One would have thought that the fact of a writer, who understands and appreciates all recent teaching in reference to mental evolution, feeling himself still constrained by the clear deliverance of our moral consciousness to uphold the reality of free will, would have caused Dr. Pollock to pause, and to carefully re-consider this favourite article of his philosophical creed, lest possibly in his "scientific" zeal he may have too hastily included the whole of human nature in the grasp of determinism. But no, with thinkers of his type, determinism appears to be a foregone conclusion, and instead of replying to M. Marion, all that Dr. Pollock can do is to refer to the authority of Dr. S. H. Hodgson. This latter writer, following in the steps of Leibnitz and Dr. Henry Travis, fancies that he has removed all the difficulty by pointing out that the action of our own personality counts for something in our moral choices, and that therefore man is not wholly the creature of circumstances. We praise or blame a man for his conduct, say they, not because he could have acted otherwise in a moment of temptation, but because he himself acted as he did, and as he was necessitated to do by his natural constitution and surroundings. Does Dr. Pollock, or any thoughtful man, imagine for an instant that this account of human nature accords with the facts of our moral consciousness? Does not that moral consciousness emphatically declare that man is justly amenable to praise or blame, simply because, in the conviction of those who judge him, his mental action in the crisis of temptation could have been other than it was. We believe that Dr. Pollock, and others of the same school, are labouring under a serious hallucination in thinking that Ethics will ever dissociate itself from Metaphysics. Rather will the lapse of time show, as it has often shown before, that no ethical system can take a strong and permanent hold on the human mind, if it be erected on other foundations than those metaphysical ones which lie at the very centre of our conscious thought.

In the accounts of "New Books" there is a short sketch and a favourable estimate of Mr. T. W. Rhys David's "Hibbert Lectures on Buddhism." Though we differ profoundly from a good deal that is said in this number of Mind, it must be admitted that it contains matter well worthy of the attention of both philosophical and theological students. Literary Notes.

MR. THOMAS HARDY is writing a new novel. The first instalment of it will appear in the Atlantic Monthly for May.

MESSRS. ROUTLEDGE AND SONS are about to issue a complete edition of Mr. W. S. Gilbert's "Bab Ballads," with two hundred and twenty-five illustrations by the author, for sixpence. The subscription for the sixpenny edition of "Tom Brown's School-days" exceeds 150,000 copies.

THE Government of Bengal calculated that it saved over £5,000 last year by the use of Indian-made printing paper. A further saving was effected by the use of brown paper, blotting paper, &c., also made in India.

MESSRS. SMITH AND ELDER have issued Caroline Fox's "Memories of Old Friends" in a new edition of two volumes, which will not fatigue the wrist of the reader, and will fit more conveniently into his shelves. Some fourteen fresh letters of John Stuart Mill are added, written to Mr. Robert Barclay Fox about the time of the publication of his "Logic," and, we may add, just before the beginning of his correspondence with Comte.

We understand that Cassell's "Concise Cyclopædia," the publication of which has just been commenced, is edited by the Rev. William Heaton, assisted in various departments by Messrs. Alfred J. Read, C. H. Bothamley, and Alfred Denny.

MR. WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, the American author, after a brief and somewhat brilliant term in the Massachusetts Legislature, has resolutely refused re-election, and will hereafter devote himself, in his house at Cambridge, to educational affairs, and, it may be hoped, to writing such pleasant books as his "Common Sense about Women," just published.

MESSRS. WARD, LOCK AND CO. announce the publication, in a few days, in the popular quarto sixpenny form, of "Out of the Hurly Burly," with four hundred illustrations; and "Hood's Own," First Series, with the original illustrations. And in preparation, same size and price, "Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress," with one hundred illustrations; "Longfellow's Poetical Works," with illustrations; and "The Arabian Nights' Entertainments," with illustrations by various artists.

COUNT LEO TOLSTOY, who is at present staying at Moscow, is at work on a very interesting Commentary to the New Testament, which, however, owing to difficulties with the censorship, will be printed out of Russia.

In Paris a new paper is to be founded in the interest of the expelled religious orders, called the Ami de la Religion. It will be conducted by the Dominican Father Didoz.

FOR some little time a proposal has been under consideration to establish a high-class quarterly review in Scotland which, while dealing mainly with matters affecting that country, will be open to the treatment of all important questions of a literary, scientific, and especially of a philosophical and theological nature. If the proposal is deemed feasible—as is now almost certain—Mr. Alex. Gardner, the energetic publisher in Paisley, will issue the review.

THE Monthly Notes of the Library Association says:—The free library at Tokio, the capital of Japan, founded in 1873, contained, seven years later, 63,840 volumes of Chinese and Japanese works, 5,162 English books, 6,547 Dutch, and about 2,000 volumes in other European languages. There is a large reading-room, admission is wholly free, and books are sometimes permitted to be borrowed. Another library is said to contain 143,000 volumes, including many ancient books and MSS.; an entrance fee of about one halfpenny is charged here. Many of the leading towns throughout the country are also provided with free libraries. Lending libraries of native and Chinese literature have existed in Japan from very early times, but the Government now provides students with foreign books.

THE Academy says that what promises to be a really valuable History of Shorthand is announced for immediate publication. The author is Mr. Thomas Anderson, parliamentary reporter. The tachygraphy of the Greeks, and the notæ tironianæ of the Romans, will be explained and illustrated by woodcuts. English systems, from the time of Elizabeth, will be compared with one another, and with the principal systems of France and Germany.

THE BISHOP OF NORWICH, having held the see for a quarter of a century, is to be presented by his clergy with an oil painting of himself in commemoration of the event.

DR. JOHN MUIR, of Edinburgh, the well-known Sanscrit scholar, died in that city on Tuesday night, aged seventy-two. He was the author of several works in connection with Sanscrit, and subscribed £5,000 towards the foundation of the Sanscrit chair in the Edinburgh University.

THROAT IRRITATION.—Soreness and dryness, tickling and irritation, inducing cough and affecting the voice. For these symptoms use Epps's Glycerine Jujubes. Glycerine, in these agreeable confections, being in proximity to the glands at the moment they are excited by the act of sucking, becomes actively healing. Sold only in boxes, 7½d. and 1s. 1½d., labelled, "JAMES EPPS AND CO., Homoeopathic Chemists, London." A letter received:—"Gentle men,—It may, perhaps, interest you to know that, after an extended trial, I have found your Glycerine Jujubes of considerable benefit (with or without medical treatment) in almost all forms of throat disease. They soften and clear the voice.—Yours faithfully, GORDON HOLMES, L.R.C.P.E., Senior Physician to the Municipal Throat and Ear Infirmary."

LORD REDESDALE'S RELIGIOUS TEST.

The Pall Mall Gazette writes:—The example of Lord Redesdale is likely to prove infectious. Tomorrow night we may expect to hear that the following notices of motion have been given in the House of Lords:—A Bill to renew the Test and Corporation Act, by Lord Harrowby; a Bill to repeal the Catholic Emancipation Act, by Lord Oranmore; a Bill to revive the Conventicle Act, by Lord Cairns; a Bill re-enacting the provisions of the Statute De heretico comburendo, by Lord Salisbury. Thus it would seem we are in fair way of regaining the orthodoxy and piety of our illustrious ancestors. Nor, perhaps, need we altogether despair of witnessing Mr. Bradlaugh at the stake.

The Sheffield Independent says:—That high-dried Tory, Lord Redesdale, whose ideal of religious liberty is, permission to all other persons to believe as he does, moved the first reading of a Bill declaring it to be expedient that provision should be made against Atheists taking any part in legislation, and making it peremptory upon all members of the Lords and Commons to subscribe the following declaration:—"I do solemnly, sincerely, and truly declare and affirm that I believe in Almighty God." The irreverence and blasphemy of making such a declaration as this as a qualification to fill a political office Lord Redesdale would hardly be able to apprehend. But why does he stop short at Theism? Why not insist, as in some of the Continental Legislatures, upon members subscribing to the whole of the Trinitarian Creed, or even the Apostles' Creed, and the Creed of Athanasius? The social and political injustice inflicted upon British citizens by such proceedings seems to be a matter of no moment in the estimation of Tory Peers; and they are equally oblivious of the logical consequences of their intolerant act. Of course, in common justice they will exempt Atheists from paying rates and taxes, and from obedience to the law. We by no means regret that Lord Redesdale should have brought in his Bill. It will probably awaken the nation to the danger which threatens civil and religious freedom from the recent intolerant action of the Commons and this high-handed proceeding in the Lords.

ENGLISH HUMOUR.

The Spectator, apropos to Mr. Ainger's delightful little book on Charles Lamb, argues that English humour is only in its infancy rather than already in its sere and yellow leaf:—

The truth is, no doubt, that as human competition increases, there is a tendency to refine and subdivide and think more exclusively about a succession of trifles, which is not favourable to the larger humour; but then this very tendency drives men into opposition to it, makes them eager to steep themselves, as Charles Lamb steeped himself, in the dramatic life of a more spontaneous age, and the contrast brings to light ever new forms of that grotesque and conscious inconsistency and incompatibility between human desire and human condition on which the sense of humour feeds. When Charles Lamb called Coleridge "an archangel,—a little damaged," he painted this contrast between human ideals and human experience in its most perfect form. But every new generation is probably richer in suggestions of that kind than all the preceding generations put together, for this, if for no other reason,—that whether we still believe in the ideals of the past or not, as future realities, we never cease to yearn after them, and to yearn after them all the more that they excite less active hope, while the accumulating experience of centuries brings us face to face with the oddest and most grotesque forms of disappointment and disillusion. No contrast could have been more striking, for instance, than that between Coleridge's eloquent expositions of divine philosophy and faith, and his own helpless life, sponging on the hospitality of Good Samaritans, and leaving his family to the generosity of friends. And no condition of the world can be reasonably expected in which contrasts of that pathetic kind will not be multiplied rather than diminished in number, or in which it may not reasonably be expected that the eye to discern and the power to make us feel these contrasts will be multiplied at the same time.

THE HIBBERT LECTURES OF 1881.

The New York Independent writes:—We have heard much recently of a science of religion, and, if some writers on the subject may be trusted, it has already taken its place in the circle of historical sciences. But until there is more general accord as to what religion is, what is its origin, and on what principles its various manifestations should be classified; until we are able to take a broader survey of the facts and penetrate deeper into the spirit of the non-Christian systems, it is safer to say that the science is still in its preliminary stages. It is in just this preparatory work that the Hibbert Lectures are doing good service. The treatment of particular religions by the comparative method, which has produced such excellent results in linguistics, is throwing much light on the origin and development of religious belief in general. On many accounts, the theme of the last series of lectures is, of all the so-called Pagan religions, most deserving of attentive study; and it is fortunate that the person selected to present it not only is fitted by former residence in Buddhist communities to understand the practical working of the system, but stands in an attitude of appreciation, rather than hostility toward it. We have found these lectures full of interesting matter. Their spirit and literary style deserve high praise, and unfamiliar forms of belief have been stated in a manner so clear and attractive that many besides professed scholars will find them entertaining reading. But we have a feeling that they represent Buddhism to us at its best. That it was a boon to India in its early history is, doubtless, true; but when we seek to estimate its adequacy to meet the highest spiritual needs of the millions who have since embraced it we are compelled to count it a failure.

A SUNDAY WITH THE MORMONS

In a dirty, dismal, ill-conditioned street in Pentonville there is a tall old house which makes public announcement of itself as a "dancing academy," and which has painted up over one of its interior doors, "Latter-Day Saints' Meeting Room." Here every Sunday and one night during the week assembles the Mormon population of North London. As may be guessed, the Saints are not a numerous body. On Sunday night, when they were apparently in full force, the congregation numbered about a hundred, among whom females greatly preponderated, about one-third being girls whose ages ranged from ten years to about eighteen. There were, perhaps, about two dozen men present. Six of these, being elders or office-bearers, were seated round a table, which does duty for a pulpit, at the head of the room. The "Saints," both male and female, seemed to belong to the lower working class, and to be such persons as would be likely to find a strong argument for the Mormon religion in the fact that it has an earthly Zion. There was little show of reverential feeling before the commencement of the service. Those who were present laughed and talked with as much ease and freedom as if they were out of doors. There is, however, very little about a Mormon religious service that encourages solemnity of feeling or conveys the idea of worship. On Sunday night the proceedings commenced by the singing of a hymn, to a galloping tune, from a book which has a short preface signed by Brigham Young, Elder Pratt, and John Taylor, the present head of the Mormon Church, and which, among its other very miscellaneous contents, has a lyric commencing, "Deseret, Deseret, the home of the free!" After the hymn there was a minute's pause, and then a stalwart young "elder" from Utah, in a voice which comes "through his nose and his mouth," rose to preach what he spoke of as "the Gospel." In a modest preface he informed his hearers that he had had no special theological education, that he had never been particularly pious, and that until recently he had not even been accustomed to read the Bible; but, having been now "anointed to the work and feeling the assurance that he was chosen, he knew that the Lord would teach him what to say." After this remarkable opening he launched out into a singularly rambling discourse, the object of which, as he deliberately announced, was "to show that all other sects were wrong, and that we only are right." Still, he would not be so uncharitable as to commit himself to the assertion that the other sects were wholly in error. He was good enough to admit that there might be little grains of truth in the doctrines of each of them, but they were none the less devoted to perdition. It was a mistake, he said, to suppose that the Mormons had cast the Bible aside. It was the foundation of their Gospel. They founded their faith upon it. The Book of Mormon was in no sense a Bible, but a record of the history of the ancient Jewish settlers in America. These settlers, it seems, emigrated across the Atlantic in the reign of Zedekiah, and became American Redskins. Some day they would again become white men, and be brought back into the fold. The Bible, indeed, referred plainly to America in those passages where it spoke of the Church of God and the city of Zion, "which the Latter-Day Saints profess to be." No minister of any other denomination could argue with a Mormon from the Scriptures. No other religion accepted the book in its literal sense, like the Mormons. "I know," he continued, "that the Lord will substantiate the claim that I make to be His servant, and will approve of the Gospel that I preach." Towards the end of his discourse he drew a remarkable picture of what the world was coming to:—

"The cup of its iniquity is pretty nearly full. The Lord cannot in common fairness delay His punishments much longer. The world is in a shocking condition, and there are abundant signs of the latter days. The Mormons do not expect to make many more converts in England. The great harvest of this part of the earth is over. We are but looking for the scattered sheep, the gleanings, the last soul that is worthy. After that has been found, the Jews will be gathered together to Jerusalem, the Mormons to their earthly Zion, and the lost tribes to their appointed place, and then the remainder of the inhabitants of the world will be destroyed by wars, earthquakes, plagues, and similar visitations, after which the Saints will inherit the earth, with a fair field and no favour."

Then, after having explained what will happen to those who do not believe, the speaker invoked a blessing on his mission, and sat down. He was succeeded by a dark, wild-eyed, harsh-looking man, "bearded like a pard." This person hesitated for a minute, then raised his voice into a harsh monotone, and delivered "the message that God, in His infinite mercy, has concocted" in a rattle of ill-chosen words, linking his periods together with ands and buts and alsos, and closing each of them with mysterious references to "the meridian of time." The Mormons, he said, are not exclusive, because "the Gospel is open to all the sons of Adam, except the sons of perdition, who shall be judged accordingly thereunto." After this came other speeches, in which the Deity was introduced with the familiar and colloquial "He says, says He." Then followed a very important Mormon ceremony. One of the elders produced a bottle of oil. "It is to be anointed," he said, "for the healing of the sick," and the process of "anointing" was performed at once. Three of the previous speakers each laid a hand on the bottle while a prayer was offered up asking that the Lord would consecrate it to His good-purposes. There was one person present who desired to be healed. He was a light-haired, rosy youth, who apparently suffered from lameness. Seating himself at the table he awaited the miracle. One of the "brethren" poured some oil on him from the newly consecrated bottle, and vigorously rubbed the crown of his head, after which the elders "laid hands upon him," saying, "We, His servants, bearing His holy priesthood, lay our hands on your head, and, praying that any pain may be removed from this time henceforth, command the same to depart from you and trouble you no more." They then assured him that if he had sufficient faith he would be healed. The excitement with which this operation had been followed by the congregation had hardly subsided when the elder with the harsh voice and rattling delivery announced, "We will, therefore, conclude with the singing of the twenty-ninth hymn;" after which a short prayer brought this peculiar service to an end.

Judged merely by its Sunday services Mormonism can scarcely be called a religion. What would be sermons in ordinary places of worship are in the Mormon meeting-houses loose attacks on the various forms of Christianity, and fervent eulogies of Salt Lake City and Joseph Smith. There are no stirring appeals to the emotions of the hearers; no attempt is made to rouse devotion; there is no call to "a better life." Neither the Bible nor the Book of Mormon is read publicly. The services are, indeed, to an outsider utterly flat, stale, and unprofitable. They arouse wonder at the evident earnestness and sincerity of the congregation, and set the mind speculating as to the mental condition of men and women who sit in rapt attention while an illiterate preacher babbles for three-quarters of an hour about nothing in particular, and uses arguments and illustrations which even the most ignorant could recognise as ridiculous. Yet the Mormons not only retain those who have once embraced the faith, but are continually making new converts. There is a thin but constant stream of emigration from London to Utah. A ship which sails in the middle of this month will, for instance, considerably reduce the little congregation in Pentonville. The London emigrants will have for company many new converts from the provinces, to which the apostles and prophets occasionally make flying visits, and where, as has been the case with prophets from time immemorial, they not infrequently get stoned.—Pall Mall Gazette.

"DISSOLVING VIEWS OF ORTHODOXY."

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—I have no wish to be dragged into any controversy on the points at issue between Unitarianism and Orthodoxy. But I crave your permission to say a few words on the two articles which have recently appeared in your columns having special reference to the discourses on the essential truth of the Evangelical doctrines which I am at present delivering to my own congregation in York.

1. I must protest against the insinuation contained in the following sentence:—"Our author's restatement consists first in quietly dropping what have been hitherto some of the most prominent doctrines of the popular theology." Do you think it quite fair to charge me with the want of straightforwardness which is generally indicated by the phrase "quietly dropping"? Unitarians of the militant sort have been by far too ready in circulating suspicions of this kind, as many liberal men in the Orthodox communions know to their cost. The doctrines which you say I have "quietly dropped" (the Devil, &c.) never were the most prominent doctrines in any system of evangelical theology. But how do you know that I have quietly dropped them? They, too, I believe, are "susceptible of interpretations more or less on the side of reason." I am not strong on the Devil, but I know too little about the constitution of the invisible world to deny his existence. But the Devil never was a part of the evangelical creed in the sense in which Christ was and is; his personality is supposed by much that Christ did and taught, and therefore recognised by evangelical teachers. A doctrine believed and defended by such men as F. D. Maurice deserves some better recognition than the sneer with which it is usually greeted by many of our modern "liberal" thinkers.

2. Your articles assume, as Unitarians generally are often inclined to do, that "the rational theology," "the religion of the future," the only possible conciliation between religious faith and the knowledge of to-day, are to be found in Unitarianism. You write about "the pretensions of the Orthodox," but they are evenly balanced by the pretensions of the "heterodox." If Unitarianism is all that you claim it to be, then what is Unitarianism? Where is it to be found? In the writings of Channing, Furness, J. H. Thom, and Dr. Martineau, or in the teachings of lesser lights who shade away into Deism, Positivism, and Agnosticism? The remarkable testimony of the late Dr. Bellows to the truth and value of the supernatural elements in Christianity, which appeared in the Christian World the other week, would not be endorsed, I am persuaded, by the average or ascendant Unitarianism of England or America. I gratefully recognise the good work that Unitarianism has done in calling the attention of Christendom to neglected and forgotten truths or aspects of truth, and believe that the differences between not a few in your communion and the spiritually thoughtful in evangelical bodies are more metaphysical than spiritual; but the current of sympathy with Unitarianism as such in Orthodox Churches is less strong to-day than ever it was, and I fail to observe any signs, on the other hand, that the sceptical thought of the age is finding or will ever find a resting-place in Unitarianism. Do not "the advanced thinkers" shrug their shoulders when your men urge their claims and look on you as less consistent and quite as pretentious as the Orthodox? You have certainly helped the critical process, but what remains? About the "higher" and "better" doctrine which you maintain in your second article to be held so vigorously by Unitarians, all I can say is—it is a pity it is not preached more vigorously.

3. You write about "dogma abating its pretensions;" but what is the closing part of your second article but a statement of Unitarian dogma? Your "higher" and "better" doctrine is as really "dogma" unless, as some among you say, that even it is non-essential.

4. What does the Inquirer mean by the Evangelical creed? The creed of fifty or one hundred years ago? or the present day formulations of evangelical truths? Why this constant endeavour to fasten the orthodox down to the older forms, the less rational interpretations or popular exaggerations of the Evangelical faith? Suppose we were to meet the modern Unitarian in the same way and saddle him with the theories held by Unitarians at the beginning of the present century. He would repudiate them, and yet call himself a Unitarian in essentials. Why may we not discard the old statements of Evangelical doctrine, and yet be Evangelical in essentials. Theologies are constantly changing, and must change, because of the changing knowledge to which the unchanging Christian facts and teachings have to be correlated. The history of Christian doctrine has always been a process of adjustment, called concessions by some, and really so only as to form. As far as Congregationalists are concerned, there never were obligatory "fixed terms." Forms, modes, statements with us are essentially influx.

5. The account you give of the Orthodox view of the Bible is incorrect. No Evangelical theologian has ever maintained, as you affirm, that "God's revelation of Himself begins and ends with the Bible." You cannot bind down those who believe in the living spirit and the living Church to that view of the Bible.

6. Your treatment of my discourse on the Trinity has not left the impression on my mind of perfect fairness. In your anxiety to prove me a Sabellian you seem to have passed by the first and fundamental part of the discourse, that affirmed a Trinity in the Eternal being and essence, and presented God as having relations within His own nature, to the second part, where I dealt with the Trinity on the side of the divine relations to humanity. The representation of the Trinity as three modes of being within, and three modes phenomenally, is not Sabellianism, but sound Trinitarianism. Trinitarian theologians do not use the term person in its modern acceptance.

6. To the Orthodox the Trinity never was "an arithmetical enigma," though Unitarians have always tried to make it out such. You remember the words of your own Roscoe, "The simplicity of the (Unitarian) doctrine of the unity of God is urged in its favour, but I do not know that I always felt this; I am not sure if it is not too simple to be the full truth." The Divine Unity has been as strongly held by the Orthodox as the Threeness of the One.

7. Your article on the Trinity contains one gross misrepresentation. Only one text, you say, and that a spurious one, can be adduced to support the doctrine that "Father, Son, and Holy Spirit are one God." The Trinity, I grant you, as an explicit symbol is not in the Bible, but it is based on a multitude of texts all pointing to one focus; as a vital truth it is an all-pervading influence, determining almost unconsciously the mould of early Christian thought. The references to the Father, to Christ (words, works, claims, &c.) to the Holy Spirit (grieved, interceding, &c.) bring them so near together that the question arises naturally, and arose as soon as controversy concerning Christ's person arose—What is their mutual relation? The doctrine of the Trinity in the theological scientific sense thereof is an ecclesiastical production; but the matter which set the human mind on the making of the doctrine is clearly present in the New Testament.

8. You wonder how much of the old faith will remain after the modifying process has done its work. None of it, of course, if the old faith has no solid and immovable basis of fact on which it rests. But I believe it has such a basis. The modifying process ends for me at certain facts which I cannot dissolve away even if I wanted, at which, therefore, I must stop; and reaching which I cannot but feel that I have reached a foundation on which I do and must stand, and standing on which I feel secure. These facts are—

- (i.) The consciousness of sin.
- (ii.) The Bible as a record of human experiences, inexplicable save from the point of view of the belief in Divine revelations to human souls.
- (iii.) Jesus Christ as an historical personage, and as a real and living presence known by a communion the most immediate and sacred.
- (iv.) Personal spiritual experience.

What the Inquirer calls "the modifying process" is in my view a getting back to the pure constituents of Christianity as laid down nominatively in the Bible and proved and illustrated by the spiritual experience of Christian men.

(9.) If the truth is to be found on the lines laid down by the Inquirer, how is it that Unitarianism has so markedly failed as a spiritual and practical power? Testimonies to its failure in this respect are being constantly borne by Unitarians themselves, and your own columns during the last twelve months could furnish several. In its best form the Unitarian faith seems inadequate to meet and satisfy the deeper needs of the spiritual soul, and if one can read between the lines it is so to some of its own finest men who are satisfied with it intellectually. The spiritual instincts and yearnings of such men as Furness, Bellows and Martineau have made them appear to be more like strangers and pilgrims within your borders than children at home.

Let me say that the object I have in view in delivering the discourses you have criticised is not controversial. I am seeking during the closing months of my ministry in the city of York to say a little better what I have always said, to give to my people my latest and best thoughts concerning the deep things of God, and to bear a personal testimony to the spiritual value of truths which growing experience has made more real, clear and dear.

Allow me to add this is my first and final contribution to the discussion raised in your columns. I have little time and less inclination for controversy.

THE POSITION OF DR. BELLOW'S.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—I presume Mr. Panton Ham is quite unconscious how miserably false is his representation of the position of Dr. Bellows and the case of American Unitarianism. Dr. Bellows always belonged to both wings of the Unitarian body, and some fifteen years ago he told me that, while he was commonly considered only conservative, if he had to choose between the two he was by no means sure that he should choose the conservative. He said this in asking me to let him have for the Christian Examiner an article which I had withdrawn at the time that he became editor. Dr. Hedge had been editor with the Rev. J. H. Allen as assistant editor, and my article had been accepted for publication when Dr. Bellows succeeded Dr. Hedge. I withdrew the article as likely to be very objectionable to Dr. Bellows. When he next met me he asked me to let him have it again, and I sent it to Mr. Allen. Mr. Allen, with whom the actual care of the publication was mostly left, sent the article to Dr. Bellows, and expressly asked him to take the responsibility of it, as it was far more radical or advanced than any they had before published, and to publish it might cost them the loss of some of their subscribers. Dr. Bellows read the article, not at all agreeing with its views, yet replied to Mr. Allen that it should be published if it cost them every subscriber they had. The grand generosity and breadth of Dr. Bellows were as different from the spirit of Mr. Ham as the great congregation in New York from the lean remnant of conservatism for which Mr. Ham speaks. And two facts will show how little truth there is in Mr. Ham's assertion as to Dr. Bellows's insistence on the supernatural lordship of Jesus. First. This was not referred to in Dr. Bellows's original draft of a basis for the National Conference, nor in the original address with which Dr. Bellows had prepared to open the first meeting at which the Conference was formed. It was inserted at the last moment on the demand of two or three leading conservatives, who were alarmed at the breadth of the basis proposed by Dr. Bellows. Second. Dr. Bellows, as time went on, himself adopted the very advanced opinion as to Jesus which my article mentioned above had set forth, an opinion which Kenrick, Martineau, Jowett, Rowland Williams, and other like leaders have drawn from the gospels, viz., that not only was Jesus not supernatural and infallible, but that over even his grace and truth there was a veil of the imperfect consciousness of his age, which he shared with his disciples. I have myself come some years since to the conclusion that Jesus did not share with his disciples in the views in question, but was quite free from them, and that to the apostolic preachers and reporters must we refer these views. I have given up the opinion, therefore, to which Dr. Bellows was so generous when he published my article, while Dr. Bellows came to entertain it, and would not have dreamed of representing the leadership of Christ as supernatural or infallible, or any other than human, providential, spiritual, subordinate. The drift of American Unitarianism is in the same direction, and that clause about the "lordship" of Jesus, which was put into the basis of the National Conference, is quite a dead letter in the sense in which it was originally used, and lives only in the sense of that providential and spiritual leadership to which in both English and American Liberalism in religion the wise lovers of broad faith attach themselves. Dr. Bellows would with his utmost magnificent energy of liberalism repudiate the narrow and acrid insistence on a small supernaturalism which some few English Unitarians are still clinging to, and for which Mr. Ham speaks.

THE OPIUM TRADE.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—It was hardly to be expected that the Opium revenue could be seriously threatened without some attempt being made to defend it. To those who have been endeavouring to awaken the public conscience on this subject nothing has been so discouraging as the calm and cynical indifference with which it has been left to the "common sense" of the nation to defeat the "agitators." Justice and right were urged on the one side and revenue on the other, and the defenders of the traffic seemed quite content to leave the question on that footing, satisfied that the revenue was safe.

But recently public sentiment has begun to declare itself so clearly that the official and unofficial worlds have come to think that after all the "revenue" plea needs support or it may break down under the strain. Where the profits of an iniquity are shared by a whole nation it is obvious that the diffused pressure of interest will produce a champion here and there the moment those profits are seriously threatened, though not till then, and we therefore greet the various apologies which have recently been put forward on behalf of the trade as a sign that our attacks are no longer regarded as harmless.

It is felt at last that the revenue is in serious danger, and that unless something more can be said for it than that it is revenue it cannot be long maintained.

But while fully prepared to see apologists coming forward I confess I was totally unprepared to find Sir Rutherford Alcock in their number. His utterances on this subject had been so numerous and so explicit that he could not in reason be expected to swallow them all. He has done so, however; and his great authority has given weight to his article in the December number of the Nineteenth Century and to his Paper read before the Society of Arts on Jan. 13. As the significance of these utterances rests entirely upon the prestige of Sir Rutherford's character and position it becomes an imperative though a painful duty to expose the reckless manner in which he has been trading upon it—if the investigation results in a declaration of bankruptcy it is not my fault.

I will to-day take a few of the many statements in which Sir Rutherford's recent remarks—intended to enlighten the British public—are at variance with notorious facts, and with his own previous official statements which were not intended for the British public, though happily accessible to all who know how to find a Blue-book in the British Museum. On a future occasion I will, with your permission, say a few words on the important question of the native growth of the poppy in China.

In his article in the Nineteenth Century Sir Rutherford says:—"They have no locus standi on international or political grounds, and no justification for charging the British or Indian Government with having imposed upon them by force, and against their will, a pernicious drug and an injurious trade. They have been consenting parties and participants in the trade and its profits from the first day to the last." Such a statement from such a man almost takes away one's breath. Were they consenting parties and participants in the profits when Lin threw into the sea over two millions worth of confiscated opium, which he might have sold? Were they consenting parties and participants in the profits when for twenty years after the Opium war they refused to recognise opium as an article of commerce, and lay an imperial tax upon it? Were they consenting parties when, according to Sir Rutherford's own despatch of Oct. 28, 1869, "The total prohibition of opium, the restriction of missionaries from inland residence, and the abolition of all extra-territoriality" were "the three cardinal points and chief objects of desire with the Chinese Government"? Or, when, according to the same gentleman's testimony before the Indian Finance Committee (reported in 1871) they would not "hesitate to make a crusade against" the practice of opium smoking were it not that they felt "powerless in the face of the determination of England" to have opium "inserted in the tariff"?

As for the general question of the employment of hostile pressure we may open Sir Rutherford's official correspondence almost at random, and we shall find the fact of this pressure acknowledged—and deplored. "If only means can be found of keeping from them all foreign meddling and attempts at dictation, there is yet ground for hope. . . . Governing under an incessant menace of this interference, wounded in their amour propre, and irritated with a sense of humiliation in their inability to resist. . . . I am thoroughly convinced they would go much faster and better if left alone."—(Sir R. Alcock to Lord Stanley, Nov. 15, 1867.) "Once relieved of the incubus of foreign dictation which has hitherto weighed upon them, I am satisfied from what I now see that they will move forward."—(The same to the same, Jan. 1, 1868.) "Were China strong enough to assert her international rights in defiance of any foreign Power, her Government could, of course, refuse to allow a right conceded to one country, under certain conditions, to be enjoyed by another irrespectively of these. . . . But China is scarcely in a position to assert her rights, in this or any other direction when contested by foreign Powers."—(Sir R. Alcock to the Earl of Clarendon, Oct. 28, 1869.) [These last words were written in reference to the claims advanced against China by France, but the same claims were advanced by England, and the Chambers of Commerce resented the suggestion that they should be abandoned.] "China, for the first time in a position to negotiate as an independent and sovereign State, without preface or coercion."—(Sir R. Alcock to M. de Rehfues, Oct. 20, 1869.) "The fact, so often overlooked, that 'for the first time we are about to negotiate a treaty the basis of which is not to be the right of conquest.' . . . In a word, we are no longer dictating conditions of peace, but negotiating for reciprocal advantages upon an equal footing."—(Sir R. Alcock to Consul Medhurst, April 1, 1869.) [The treaty so negotiated was rejected by the British Government.] We learn then that China, with the incubus of foreign dictation weighing upon her, under the incessant menace of foreign interference, with the only treaties she ever negotiated upon a footing of independence rejected, and not in a position to assert her international rights contested by foreign Powers, nevertheless has no locus standi on international or political grounds, and no justification for charging the British or Indian Government with having imposed upon her an item in her foreign treaties which it is one of her cardinal points and chief objects to get rid of, but to which she submits because she is powerless in the face of the determination of England to enforce it!

With two less important but very significant specimens of Sir Rutherford's candour I will close this letter.

In his paper read before the Society of Arts (Journal of Society of Arts, Jan., 1882, p. 225), Sir Rutherford contrasts opium-smoking with drunkenness, and while admitting that the victim of the pipe may impoverish and ruin his family, says:—"But no one ever heard of an opium-smoker going home from his debauch and brutally assaulting his wife, kicking her to death, or murdering his children." No—but in his evidence before the Indian Finance Committee Sir Rutherford told his questioners what he had heard of. "When a man has impoverished himself and his family, I suppose there is no crime at which he will stop for the sake of supplying himself, rather than undergo the torture that it is to be without it; so that he will sell his wife and children and property, and in the end I suppose will either rob or murder for the sake of it." If Sir Rutherford had said this at the Society of Arts it would, perhaps, have spoilt his point.

Again, in the same paper (p. 209) he says:—"In 1856 a rupture was again brought on in October of that year by a Chinese posse of officials and soldiers in a war-boat, suddenly boarding the lorcha Arrow while lying, with her colours flying, in the river near Canton, and pinioning and carrying away the whole of her crew, after hauling down the English ensign. The alleged reason for this outrage, &c." Sir Rutherford frequently lamented that he was pressed for time in reading this paper. Perhaps that is why he did not state what he knew perfectly well—that the lorcha Arrow was a Chinese ship, was owned by a Chinese subject, was manned by Chinese (with the exception of the master, who was not on board at the time), was not under British protection, and had no right to fly the English colours at all! The English officials admitted this to each other at the time, but it was urged that the vessel had been under British protection a short time before, and that the Chinese officials could not possibly know that she had ceased to be so. Sir Rutherford seems to think that the British public cannot possibly know it either, but he is mistaken. The whole of the shameful story stands in black and white in the Parliamentary papers. Sir Rutherford charges those who oppose him with being ignorant of the facts. I do not retort the charge, though for the sake of Sir Rutherford's character I wish I could.

KIDDERMINSTER: CENTENARY OF THE NEW MEETING HOUSE.

Services to commemorate the centenary of the founding of the New Meeting House were held last week, and were attended by large congregations. In the interesting "Memorials of the Old Meeting House," published by the Rev. Geo. Hunsworth, M.A., an account of the founding of the New Meeting is given. During the ministry of the Rev. B. Fawcett, which extended over a period of thirty-five years, some division of opinion among the congregation began to manifest itself, and upon the Old Meeting pulpit becoming vacant this became more pronounced. By "a large majority," an invitation was given to the Rev. J. Barratt to become the pastor, and on Dec. 19, 1781, he accepted the invitation. "As soon," writes Mr. Hunsworth, "as it became known that he was about to become the pastor, a number of friends unfavourable to his coming, on account of their Arian beliefs, decided to secede. They asked to be allowed to hold their services in the Meeting House, during the intervals of public worship, and were requested in return 'to resign up one of the parsonage houses, for which they were in trust, agreeably to the trust reposed in them by the congregation, at whose expense the said houses had been built.' This they refused to do, and were therefore denied 'the use of the Meeting House by the major portion of the trustees.' They accordingly began to hold their services, Feb. 24, 1782, in a vacant warehouse on the bank of the canal, and there they continued to worship till the New Meeting Chapel was opened Oct. 18, 1782."

The celebration services were commenced on Sunday, the 26th ult., when the Rev. R. A. ARMSTRONG, B.A., of Nottingham, preached two admirable sermons to large congregations, and collections were made in aid of the day schools.

On Tuesday morning, the 28th ult., there was a large and influential congregation present, when the Rev. CHAS. BEARD, B.A., of Liverpool, preached an able and eloquent sermon from the words, "But I was free born" (Acts xxii. 28).

Tracing the history of the Presbyterian Churches, Mr. Beard showed how they had their origin in a love of truth and a willingness to bear witness to it, even at the cost of suffering persecution. This love of truth had been one of their most noted characteristics. They held firmly the doctrines which they had been led to accept as true, but left their descendants free to follow the light which God might send. They held sacred learning as a Divine gift, and did not shrink from reverent criticism and devout research. They had in their humble academies nourished this Divine gift, and had had in their churches men second in culture to no religious body. They had ever borne witness in favour of civil and religious liberty, not only for themselves, but for all. In every movement towards a greater freedom, in every effort for the social uplifting of the people, they had borne an honourable part. And in future they were going to be true to these three great principles. They were not going to bind the freedom of their church by any statement of doctrine or any formulated creed. Christianity did not need these. The voice of Christ calling to the weary and heavy-laden to find rest in Him would always attract and draw to Him the restless ones of earth. The reverence and adoration of men would ever be given Him, and it needed no kind of human device to keep the churches loyal to His spirit. They believed in freedom as firmly as ever they had done—in freedom not only of the highest kind—the freedom which comes from holy and devout living—in freedom not only of every church to worship with such forms as they might see fit—but in freedom to follow truth with perfect loyalty, quite certain that no sincere unbelief could ever open the gates of an everlasting hell, and no insincere belief open the gates of an eternal heaven. They would still be loyal to learning, endeavouring to open their minds to all the great influences of modern thought and research. They would still take their stand by the side of the oppressed and downtrodden ones of earth. He cared little for their progress as a sect, if such they must be. He cared much for the diffusion of their principle, and he looked forward to that day, which might even now come but for the hardness of their hearts, when there might be the worship of one God in one church, the service of one Lord, the holding of one faith, the earnest waiting for the realisation of one great hope.

The ordinary meeting of the ministers in connection with the Midland Christian Union was also held in the chapel.

In the afternoon a public luncheon was held in the Masonic Club Assembly Room, Mill-street, and was largely attended. Mr. W. TALBOT presided, and among the company present were the Revs. C. Beard, B.A., R. A. Armstrong, B.A., H. W. J. Alsop, D. Heap, E. C. Tounie, B.A., B. Wright, G. St. Clair, H. W. Crosskey, J. B. Gardener (Birmingham), A. Lancaster (Whitechurch), W. Carey Walters, W. McKean (Oldbury), W. Agar, A. W. Worthington (Stourbridge), and T. Pipe (The Lye); Mr. and Mrs. S. Hollins (Sion House), Mr. and Mrs. W. Hatton (Hill Grove), Mr. and Mrs. W. Green, J.P. (The Copse), Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Talbot, Mr. and Mrs. C. Hughes, Mr. and Mrs. G. Hopkins, Mr. and Mrs. A. Cowell, Mr. and Mrs. B. Hepworth, Mrs. Talbot (Oakland), Mr. and Mrs. R. Chadwick, Mr. and Mrs. G. T. Isaacs, Mrs. W. Colsey, G. Stansfield, C. Isaacs, J. Arnold, &c.

The members of the Kidderminster Glee Union were in attendance, and sang grace before and after meat.

The CHAIRMAN expressed the pleasure it gave him to take part in the celebration of the Centenary of the New Meeting House. He distinctly remembered several of the original seceders from the Old Meeting who assisted in founding their chapel, and to whom they owed so much. Not only were they indebted to them for the founding of the chapel, but also the schools, and especially to one of the seceders—Nicholas Pearsall, who founded the Grammar School, in which so many celebrated men were educated. Dr. Lant Carpenter received his education there, as did also Mr. W. Mountford, who was educated there, and then went to York College, becoming a celebrated man both as a preacher and writer. Then there were the Sunday and day schools, which were acknowledged for many years to have been the best schools in the town, and where many men who had held high positions both in the town and country received their education. Their spiritual ancestors must have been men of sterling worth and of great courage; for it required much courage in those days to declare oneself an Unitarian, as to do so was to expose oneself to the opprobrium and sarcasm of those around. They revered those who had gone before and who had laid the foundations for the religious liberty which they now enjoyed. He had pleasure in proposing the health of the Queen, who was the greatest and best sovereign who had ever occupied the throne of England.

The Rev. H. W. CROSSKEY proposed the health of the preachers who had officiated on that interesting occasion—Mr. Armstrong, who preached on Sunday, and Mr. Beard, who preached that morning, with Mr. Gardener, who assisted at the service. It was a somewhat unusual thing for a minister to propose the health of his brethren in the ministry; but there was some propriety in his doing so, because it had been his joy to have heard Mr. Beard's first sermon, and that morning he had heard the last he had yet delivered, and during the whole of the long period which had elapsed since his college days he had found in Mr. Beard a firm and faithful friend. Mr. Beard was one of the most distinguished ornaments of the Free Churches of England—(cheers). His sermon that morning contained all those characteristics which had so long distinguished him—a blending together of perfect intellectual freedom, with deep reverence, and a strong faith in what he preached. Then, in Mr. Armstrong, they saw a distinguished representative of a later generation, of which also Mr. Gardener was a member. He asked, on behalf of the clergy, for the generous sympathy and confidence of the laity. They had to speak frankly that which they believed to be true. He did not believe that congregations wished ministers to be merely the echo of their own thoughts; and often there must be a little grating, when, from the pulpit, things were said which were not even palatable to the congregation. But no minister would be worthy of his position if he merely sought for popularity, or had resort to arts for the sake of personal ease or passing success. He was sure that had Mr. Beard followed a more public calling he would have risen to the highest eminence—(hear)—but he preferred to be a humble teacher of the faith of Christ, and to reach and influence men's hearts and lives by setting before them the pure religion taught by their Master. Of course they, as ministers, did not rank along with the lawyers, doctors, manufacturers, and the rest—(a laugh)—but he felt sure that if they had a fair field in the battle of life, with such ecclesiastical personages as bishops and archbishops, such representatives as Mr. Beard and Mr. Armstrong would not have come off ingloriously in the fight—(laughter).

The Revs. J. B. GARDENER and R. A. ARMSTRONG having replied,

The Rev. C. BEARD rose, and was received with loud applause. He thanked his old and valued friend Mr. Crosskey for the extremely affectionate way in which he had proposed his health. When informed that morning that he had to preach before a good number of ministers, his first impulse was to express the hope that many of them would not come, as he had not written his sermon. Although at times he thought an extempore sermon quite good enough for the laity—(laughter)—indeed, he sometimes found that they preferred that method—(applause)—he was not quite sure whether it would meet with the approval of the clergy. He was extremely glad to congratulate the members of the New Meeting congregation on the very prosperous state of the church. He had had the privilege to know their minister before his removal from Whitchurch, and he knew that wherever he went he would be sure to do admirably good work, and, if supported by an energetic and faithful congregation, he would be sure to make a considerable mark in any town where he elected to reside. It was a very happy augury that at the beginning of their second century of Congregational existence they should be headed by a man who, while he had the principles of the past thoroughly enshrined in his heart, had yet his face fixed upon the future. He could not help indulging in a personal reminiscence. They were there as members of the Midland Christian Union, and he should be untrue to the spirit of the occasion if he did not mention one old friend—the Rev. J. Gordon, of Evesham, and afterwards of Kenilworth, who, though he was much older than he (the speaker), honoured him with the privilege of an equal friendship, and loved him as he (Mr. Beard) loved and honoured him, and whose outspoken love of truth, and whose fervent attachment to the principles which bound them together, would long survive among the members of that Union, as they could never be effaced from his own heart. The speaker, in conclusion, expressed the joy it had given him to be present at the services of that day.

Mr. S. HOLLINS proposed "Civil and Religious Liberty all the world over." When they referred to the past and saw what had taken place during the last one hundred years they could look hopefully forward to the future. There was yet much to be done before they obtained perfect civil and religious liberty. As long as they had such sad affairs going on as had lately been done in Austria, or what was being done in the East under the cloak of religion, or sadder still, when they looked close at home, they could not help feeling convinced that much more civil and religious liberty was sorely needed—(applause).

Mr. J. A. KENRICK, J.P., thought it would be a good thing if, before they held meetings of that character, they should always have such a sermon as the one which was preached that morning—(hear, hear). At the present time sermons of that description were badly needed. The English people, under the pretence of a love of civil and religious liberty, acted very much like the Otaheitean cooks were said to do in preparing the food for company—to chew it before they sent it to the table; and we acted in a somewhat similar manner, because wherever they went they thrust their view of liberty down the throats of the people. If they could be brought to believe that liberty could be exercised in a different way to that in which they found its best exponent they would be very much more useful in their intercourse with the rest of the world. It appeared that that phase of the question was just now very well represented by the scenes which they were witnessing in the House of Commons. Civil and religious liberty had hardly as yet obtained the full consent of the whole nation; but, at the same time, they were happy in thinking that they were descended from ancestors who knew the value of both civil and religious liberty, and fought and suffered for it, and did everything they possibly could to promote it. He was sure that encouraged by such sermons as they heard that morning they were not going to be backsliders in any way—(applause)—and from what he knew of Mr. Walters he would advocate that principle in his warmest and most eloquent manner. He felt sure that that spirit would permeate the whole of the congregation, and that the spirit would leaven the whole town. He hoped the prophecy which he was now about to make was not without some foundation; that when the second centenary of the New Meeting House was celebrated full civil and religious liberty would have been obtained, and that it would be no longer necessary to propose such a toast as he now had the honour of responding to—(cheers).

Mr. GEORGE ST. CLAIR proposed the health of the Rev. Carey Walters and the members of his church and congregation, who had so kindly entertained the ministers. They had all thoroughly enjoyed the discourse delivered by Mr. Beard, and all saw the importance of it. All took in the full meaning of it, and henceforth would never be heard saying one word against the doctrine of Evolution, which, as Mr. Beard had said, was a revelation from God, notwithstanding that it came through Mr. Darwin. He ventured to express the hope that when the third jubilee of the chapel was celebrated the ministers of the union would be again invited, and that then they would find Mr. Walters still labouring among a loving and devoted people—(cheers).

The Rev. W. CAREY WALTERS, in rising to reply, was loudly cheered. He thanked the company for their expression of gratitude for the arrangements which had been made, and while they were conscious that there must necessarily be some defects in such arrangements, they had done their best to give a hearty welcome to all. The greatest pleasure he could have was to give pleasure to his brother ministers. The greatest possible kindness had been shown to him ever since he came into the district, for while at first he felt as a stranger he soon became as a child at home. The spiritual atmosphere of the churches had been very helpful to his own spiritual life, and the communion and fellowship which he had enjoyed with brother ministers had helped him greatly in obtaining clearer views of truth and nobler modes of living. As to his congregation, Mr. G. Hopkins, who was the representative of the oldest family, would respond; but he must say that the relations of pastor and people had been relations of almost unmingled happiness and joy to himself, and he would only say, as he answered a correspondent who wanted him very recently to preach on trial, that he would not change his congregation with anyone in the country—(cheers). He hoped at the end of another fifty years he should not be in the ministry, but that he should by that time, if spared, have earned some moderate competence which would enable him to retire into some secluded spot and spend the remainder of his days, but he could desire nothing better than to be surrounded by such warm and loving hearts as he found in the members of his congregation.

Mr. G. HOPKINS presumed that he had been selected to respond on behalf of the congregation, from the fact that he was the grandson of one of the first members of the New Meeting congregation, and the family had from that time been identified with the place. He had tried to the best of his ability to help on the various institutions of the New Meeting. They had reason to congratulate themselves that they lived in happier times than did their forefathers. It was no easy thing to be an Unitarian in the olden days. You had to face the opprobrium and obloquy of the people. A ban was upon such a man both socially, religiously, and politically. Now they could all follow the bent of their consciences, and worship God in their own way. In the early days it was no uncommon thing for a man to be mobbed if he was known to be a Liberal. And they might depend upon it their spiritual ancestors were Liberals. Although they did not sympathise with much which occurred during the French Revolution, they had much sympathy with the efforts of the peasantry. In the days of the French war they set their faces against the abominable way in which the Government of the day spent the lives of many of their fellow-countrymen, and they might depend upon it that in the days of early reform their ancestors were among the leaders of the reform in Kidderminster. To his own knowledge they were among the most strenuous advocates of the repeal of the Corn Laws, and looking to the future he firmly believed that the members of the Free Churches would help forward everything which was good and true in the Liberal party—(hear). He was proud to be a representative of such a congregation, and to see such a large and influential meeting. They had made many improvements during the last few years. The somewhat dull and heavy-looking chapel had been marvellously improved. They had now a brisk and energetic minister, whom they all loved. He had plenty of talent and capacity for work. Indeed, he did not think Mr. Walters knew how to find enough to do, so he went out into the highways and byways and said to the people "You must come in." He would paraphrase something which Emerson had said, and would say they did not look mournfully back into the past, but tried wisely to improve the present, and looked forward into the shadowy future with firm faith and manly hearts, and he hoped all would endeavour to do the best they could to make the future as successful as it could be, as they hoped it might be—(applause).

Mr. A. COWELL proposed "The Visitors from other Free Churches and other Denominations." They hoped that all would find the services of that day a stepping stone in the future, and would obtain something which would help them onward in the path of religious liberty and freedom. When they found a constituency which was prepared to send an avowed Atheist to Parliament it was well that they should let the pure and simple religion of Jesus go forth into the world. He rejoiced to see so many preachers of that Gospel present that day, but there were others there who were not preachers of the Word, but who had on many occasions shown them great kindness. He alluded to such gentlemen as Mr. W. Hatton—(applause)—who, although not connected with their church, had always shown a great readiness to grant them the use of his meadows on the Sunday-school celebration, and the thanks of the congregation were due to such gentlemen.

Mr. W. HATTON was called upon to respond. He remarked that it was a source of great pleasure to him to observe that there were abundant evidences that society was disposed to think more reasonably and more charitably than hitherto upon religious matters. Much exclusiveness still existed, but men were beginning more clearly to believe that the great God looked with equal love and care upon all His dutiful children, and that those would be best fitted to enjoy the happiness of the future life who lived in this life in conformity to His will—(applause). Hundreds of years before the birth of Christ Pagan philosophers taught that purity of life would lead to the enjoyment of the greatest happiness, and when He came He taught all that was beautiful and good in the old philosophy, inaugurating a new system, which would sweep away the false Paganism, with the rites and ceremonies of the Jewish Church, and taught the people how to worship God in simplicity and truth. The more they contemplated the life of Christ the more would they see through the transparency of his pure, simple, and loving nature, the tender, affectionate and loving care of their Heavenly Father. Dogmas and bigotry must necessarily retire before the advancement of education and enlightenment, and if the pure religion of Jesus Christ was constantly set before the people, in time they would be able to emulate that beauty which was in holiness, and strive for that happiness which sprang only from a conscientious desire to do that which was right—(applause). Let them hope the time would come when there would be one church, ample and broad enough to receive into its fold all true Christians, who should be charitable and helpful to each other as pilgrims travelling by many paths to one eternity.

Mr. GROSVENOR TALBOT also responded. He alluded with feelings of unmingled pleasure to the change which had been introduced of late years in theological belief. Now they were beginning to see that heaven was to be gained by righteous living rather than by preaching the doctrine of an everlasting hell. During the last hundred years they had signs of wonderful material as well as religious progress. Steam and electricity had well nigh revolutionised society, while in religion superstition had well nigh died out. They were getting back step by step to the pure and simple religion of Jesus Christ. It was less than one hundred years since Dr. Priestley was thrust out of Birmingham, and now they saw a professed Unitarian not only returned as one of the members for that great town, but a member of her Majesty's Cabinet—(cheers).

The Rev. A. W. WORTHINGTON briefly proposed "The Ladies," to which

Mrs. W. TALBOT responded. They heard much in the present day of the rights and duties of women, and she would remind her hearers that so long as they had such representatives as Miss Carpenter, Miss Martineau, Miss Nightingale, Mrs. Buckton, and many other women of their faith, who had manfully done their duty—(loud laughter)—they were encouraged to claim those rights. She believed that there was a work for woman to do outside the hearth of her own fireside, for while she had a grand and noble mission there in inspiring the young with a love of unselfishness of truth, and of moral courage, yet there was much good work outside that sphere to be done.

The Rev. W. CAREY WALTERS, in eulogistic terms, proposed the health of the Chairman, who bore an honoured name, and who had taken an honoured part in connection with the life of their congregation. He had been faithful to the power of the true religion of Christ, and all hoped that for many generations to come representatives of the family would be identified with the work carried on at the New Meeting.

The CHAIRMAN briefly replied, and the proceedings were brought to a close.

THE SOIRÉE AND PUBLIC MEETING.

A soirée and public meeting was held in the Town-hall, which was largely attended. After tea the chair was occupied by Mr. JOHN SROOKE, who was supported by most of the ministers who were present at the earlier service.

The CHAIRMAN said the occasion which had brought them together was a deeply interesting one. It was just one hundred years since their ancestors banded themselves together for the purpose of founding a church upon broad and liberal principles—a church whose members could meet together and worship God according to their ideas without being required to subscribe to articles of faith or creed of any kind. When they looked at the names of those who formed the first congregation, and whose names were found in the trust deed, they saw that they were men who for the most part occupied high positions in the town, and who had nothing to gain by separating themselves from the religious organisations of the time. He believed he was correct in saying that at that time there were only two churches in the town—the old parish church and the Old Meeting-house. One hundred years ago a minister was appointed to the Old Meeting pulpit whose doctrines and teachings were unacceptable to a considerable number of the congregation. Those men felt themselves to be in an uncomfortable position, and they determined to secede and form a church according to their own ideas. That church had now existed one hundred years, and that day they celebrated the centenary. During that period many changes had taken place. They had among them to-day descendants of the original founders of the chapel, including Mr. G. Hopkins, Mr. W. Talbot, and Mr. Grosvenor Talbot (who had come from Leeds to be present on that occasion). They knew that Mr. Grosvenor Talbot was a worthy son of a worthy father. They all knew how Mr. George Talbot was held in esteem by the congregation. He was not only an active member of the church, but also an active worker in the Sunday-school. The principles upon which the church was founded he believed the congregation had been faithful to up to the present time. Some time ago he saw a remark to the effect that the flag of liberty had been lowered at their church, but he distinctly denied that statement, for he believed that the principle of liberty was as faithfully carried out as ever. Because they had introduced new features into their chapel and services it did not necessarily follow that they were endeavouring to ape the church. It was their duty to consider every point upon its merits. People were not less kindly disposed because they had a light and cheerful chapel. They had done well in stepping out of the old groove and in making things more bright and cheerful—(applause). It was pleasing to find that at the end of one hundred years they found themselves in a prosperous and sound condition. Much of that was due to their worthy minister, but Mr. Walters must admit that they were not without some kind of life when he came to them. They had every confidence in the future, and he believed that their church would increase and prosper in everything that was good and useful. They would very soon have to consider the question of enlarging their chapel, because so long as the church progressed they were justified in making proper provision for their increased numbers—(applause).

The Rev. R. A. ARMSTRONG then addressed the meeting at considerable length. It was extremely gratifying to him to conduct the services on Sunday last, because it was evident that although that church was one hundred years old, it possessed life and vigour and the spirit of youth. Since he had been in Kidderminster he had heard that his little boy, three years old, inquired on Sunday morning where papa had gone to, and was told he had gone to Kidderminster. This seemed to fill the boy with alarm, as he pronounced the word "Kill-a-minister"—(laughter)—and the boy expressed a hope that his papa had taken with him his brother's bow and arrow, so that he might have a shot at the town before he was killed—(renewed laughter). From what he could see of Mr. Walters, the congregation would not seem to be very ferocious, as he seemed to be not only in good health, but was working among a congregation who seconded his efforts and laboured with him in love and sympathy for the good of the town—(applause). Nothing wore out a minister so rapidly as for him to struggle along without the sympathies of his people. Something had been said that day about it requiring courage in the past for men and women to identify themselves with the cause of the Free Churches; but whenever he heard of such things he was reminded of that noble picture which was exhibited at the Royal Academy last year, entitled, "Christ or Diana," in which an Ephesian girl was represented as standing up nobly for the truth. They wanted men to be ready to face whatever consequences might come for that faith which they believed to be true—to face ridicule and loss for the love of truth. And, after all, what were the hardships which we had now to bear compared with those endured by their forefathers. They wanted the Ephesian girl's love and truth, and less love for dogma. They wanted to understand that truth was not the battle of the theologians, that it was not devoted to any creed; if they would only remember that truth was a deeper thing than all the creeds, that truth was God himself, and none other, then there was some hope that man would never be so mean and base as to turn away from that for the sake of some worldly gain—(cheers).

The Rev. CAREY WALTERS said he did not think it would be right if they passed over that evening without their minister having an opportunity of saying a few words about the past, the present, and the future. In searching the records of their church, he did not find anything particularly glorious in the secession from the Old Meeting House, which originated their congregation. When Mr. Beard wrote consenting to preach that day, he asked, "How in the world is it, Mr. Walters, that you are celebrating your centenary, and not your bicentenary? How is it, if you are Baxter's congregation, you did not come out of the Church two hundred years ago?" The fact that they had that precious relic, Baxter's pulpit, which he for one would not part with for £500, had led many ministerial and lay friends to imagine that they were Baxter's congregation. Baxter never had a congregation other than those who worshipped in the Parish Church, and they were simply a body of men who claimed to inherit Baxter's spirit, and who believed if Baxter had lived to-day he would have been one of them. He quite believed that Baxter was so far before his time, two hundred years ago, that had he lived in these days, with the increased light and wider charity they had, he would have cast in his lot with them. He could not find anything but a very prosaic record relating to the early history of their church and congregation. He would like to get up a romance and throw a halo about their history, but it formed itself into the simple fact that there were men at the Old Meeting a hundred years ago who wanted their own way, and could not have it, so they came out to form a congregation of their own. They tried to remain where they were, and they even asked to be allowed to have their own minister, and conduct a service between the hours when the orthodox service was being conducted. That was in 1782; and later on in the same year he found the New Meeting House was built. Having read the names of those who were connected with the establishment of the Church, Mr. Walters said the land for the chapel was bought for £45, by Nicholas Pearsall, from William Wheeler, of Winterfold. On this land was built the chapel which was to be "for the use and benefit of the congregation of Protestant Dissenters, commonly called or known by the name of Presbyterians." It was stated in the trust deed, a year or two later, that the Meeting House had been erected partly on this land, and partly on other land of Nicholas Pearsall, and he sold it with all its appurtenances for the sum of 5s. to the trustees. It was not a profitable bargain for him, but they held his name in everlasting remembrance. The building was to be used for a meeting-house by his Majesty's Protestant subjects, dissenting from the Church of England, commonly called Presbyterians; but so uncertain were the conditions of English liberty at that time, that there was a provision in the deed, that if ever a time came when Protestant Dissenting services should be forbidden by the law of the land, rather than the chapel should go into the hands of the Established Church it should be used for any secular purpose the trustees might agree upon. The Rev. Robert Gentleman was the first minister, and he believed the Rev. W. Severn succeeded. Mr. Severn seemed to be terribly advanced for his day, and the congregation and others were so divided that he had to send in his resignation. Some private letters from Mr. Severn had lately come into his possession, and they revealed a state of things in a Kidderminster congregation which he only hoped would never occur again. It was absolutely impossible, wrote Mr. Severn, for any minister to preach to such a divided congregation. Whatever their divergencies might be now, he did not think that they should ever turn away a minister because he did not preach just exactly what the congregation believed. After Mr. Severn left the other party had a turn, and they got a Mr. Lake, but in three years he had to leave. A letter of that period stated that it was absolutely impossible to give to any minister a unanimous invitation. The division, however, passed away, and an invitation was given to the Rev. Richard Fry. Under his ministry the congregation became united and influential, but in an afternoon he had sometimes but a congregation of three or four besides the chapel keeper—(laughter). Mr. Fry was respected by everybody who knew him, but twice did the congregation reduce his salary. Now he (the speaker) could not forgive them for such an act—(renewed laughter). To knock off £10 a year when a man was getting old, on two successive occasions, was an unpardonable sin—(laughter). Mr. Fry resigned a short time before his death, and expressed a wish to be buried in the old Parish Church, and they knew what happened. A man who called himself a Christian minister, the curate of the Parish Church at the time, wrote a very intolerant letter with regard to the expressed wishes of the deceased. Although they had not advanced to the breadth of charity which he wished to see, no minister in the town would send such a letter now. They had, therefore, made some advance. Mr. Fry died and was buried, and that was the origin of their Nonconformist cemetery. Step by step they had advanced in this matter of Christian liberty, and he trusted they would never go back one single step. Every citizen had a right to burial with such service, or want of service, as he might deem to be fit and proper, however much they might regret the decision to which some of their friends had come. However much he might be grieved at that course, he still maintained the absolute right of every English citizen to burial with such service, or want of service, as he might think proper. This was the simple and natural result of the liberty which was at first denied to Mr. Fry. After Mr. Fry there were one or two ministers at the New Meeting whose ministries did not appear to have been particularly remarkable; but he must now name one absent from them that evening—the Rev. Matthew Gibson, who was respected by everybody who knew him. After Mr. Gibson came Mr. Parry; following him, Mr. Lunn; following him, Mr. Fish, whose ministry, short as it was, was singularly powerful and noble in its influence. Following Mr. Fish they had three years of peace under the ministry of Mr. Mellone. He would not now say a single word about the two happy years he had passed among them. Within recent years they had made changes in the place. The three-decker pulpit had been taken away, the pews removed, in the corners of which there had been very comfortable snoozes—(laughter)—and a chancel, vestry, and organ, built at a cost of £1,000. In the changes which had been made in the services it had been said that they were aping the Church and introducing a weak imitation of episcopal rites, and many other phrases were used about them. They did not care for those things. They had got the prettiest chapel, internally, and the most comfortable place of worship in the whole town. The liturgical service which they had he prized very highly, and they allowed him to alter it when he pleased, and use prayers of his own. If they would allow him to thank them for one thing it was for allowing him to do in a most marvellous measure just what he liked—(applause). He felt that he had a great deal to thank them for. When the services were held in the Town Hall, it was said by a gentleman that he supposed Mr. Walters wanted to have a chapel of his own and have his own way in it. The answer made was, Mr. Walters has got a chapel already, and has just as much of his own way there as was good for him. He did not think they had changed there, though they had changed their doctrine. They had certainly come away from the Arian views held by their ancestors, and had passed through various modifications of opinion. He did not suppose that Mr. Fish preached exactly the same doctrine as Mr. Gibson, or that he preached the same doctrine as Mr. Fish; but notwithstanding divergence of views, he believed there had not been among their ministers any difference of views which hindered their united Christian work. He began by telling them that he did not wish to have dominion over them, but to be partaker of their joy. He did not wish to speak to them as a Pope, but only as a man, telling them what he believed to be true, and leaving them to judge of the truth of what he said. He stood on the firm basis of historical Christianity, believing in a miracle-working, crucified, risen, and ascended Christ, but he did not wish to narrow the Church further than that belief in God which was presupposed by their being a worshipping assembly. While there had doubtless been mistakes in the history of the Church in the past, while there had been periods of its history which none of them wished to recur again, they had much to be thankful to God for. They had done an educational work in the town second to none done by other churches, and they had ever had men in their midst foremost in all matters of progress, freedom, and the upholding of the rights of Englishmen. He asked for their sympathy, their confidence, their affection, their personal, earnest co-operation, believing that if he had these they would as pastor and people go on together till they had not only enlarged their borders, but destroyed the prejudice which existed against them—(applause)—as they gathered men and women into their fold to find there their rest and their peace—(loud cheers).

The rest of the evening was devoted to a well-selected musical programme, in which Misses Badland and the Rev. C. D. Badland, M.A., took part.

A vote of thanks to the vocalists was moved by Mr. G. T. Isaacs, and seconded by Mr. A. Cowell, who congratulated Kidderminster on the possession of such talent.

The vote was carried with loud applause, the audience feeling how deeply indebted they were especially to the members of the Glee Union for their willing and able services.

A vote of thanks to the Chairman, moved by the Rev. W. C. Walters, and seconded by the Rev. C. D. Badland, the hymn, "Abide with me," and the Benediction, closed a most successful and enthusiastic meeting.

ULSTER UNITARIAN CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.

On Saturday evening, the 4th inst., the annual meeting of this Association was held in the Ulster Minor Hall, Belfast. Besides several ladies, the following were present:—The Rev. JOHN A. CROZIER, Newry (in the chair); the Revs. C. J. M'ALESTER, Holywood; Alexander Gordon, Belfast; Alfred Payne, Newcastle-on-Tyne; David Thompson, Dro-more; James Kennedy, Larne; Joseph Pollard, T. Dunkerly, Comber; J. J. Wright, Mountpottinger; R. J. Orr, J. Cooper, T. H. M. Scott, Messrs. F. D. Ward, J.P.; William Spackman, Gawn Orr, M.D.; George R. Smith, John Campbell, Mossley; Drummond Porter, N. Oakman, John Hunter, John Rogers, W. H. Malcolm, John Campbell, Lennox-vale, &c.

The CHAIRMAN said before he asked them to proceed with the work of the annual meeting he thought it was his duty to direct the attention of the meeting to a matter which he had no doubt had thrilled the hearts of all present in connection with those of the people of the realm in which they dwell. It was to express in their name and his own their deep and heartfelt thankfulness to Almighty God who had warded from the life of their beloved Sovereign the bullet of the fanatic would-be assassin—(loud applause).

The Rev. C. J. M'ALESTER (secretary) read the report of the committee. It stated that the depositary had been supplied with the leading works, English and American, which advocated Unitarian Christianity. The revised New Testament supplied new arguments in favour of the Unitarian faith of a positive kind by its better readings and clearer renderings of the sacred text. The report also referred in terms of regret to the death of Mr. Samuel Sharpe and the death of the Rev. Dr. Bellows, New York. It concluded with the following paragraphs:—

"An invitation has been received from the secretaries of the National Conference, to be held in Liverpool in the month of April, with whom your committee are in correspondence, being anxious to ascertain whether the basis of the conference will be distinctively Christian.

"The hope has often been expressed that some efforts of a directly missionary character should be undertaken by this association. Your committee have felt the importance of such a work, but unless wisely undertaken and judiciously carried on it could accomplish no good, and the means at the command of the committee would be quite insufficient. It would seem that in the meantime we must be satisfied with the circulation of books and tracts to build up the faith of the elder and to educate the minds and hearts of the younger members of the denomination."

Mr. J. ROGERS (treasurer) read the financial statement, which showed that there was a balance in hand of £44 14s. 2d.

The CHAIRMAN, in moving the adoption of the report, said it contained matters of no ordinary interest. He thought that in the revision of the New Testament they might congratulate themselves on the performance of what was on the whole a good work. The revised version was largely promotive of their views.

The Rev. DAVID THOMPSON seconded the motion which was agreed to.

The Rev. C. J. M'ALESTER moved—"That we welcome the Rev. Alfred Payne, pastor of the Church of the Divine Unity, Newcastle-on-Tyne, to this annual meeting of our association, founded in support of a Scriptural and authoritative Christianity, having as its cardinal doctrines the Fatherhood of the one God and the Divine mission of Christ, and according the right of private judgment to its members." The controversy which resulted in the formation of that society, and the principles upon which it was established, had been too lately discussed to render it necessary that he should enter into any explanation of the establishment of the association on the principles which it was formed to maintain. On the matter of religion there was in their own day and there always had been a great diversity of opinion. "Many men of many minds" was a truth that was strikingly illustrated in the history of religion; and they would be exceedingly intolerant and narrow-minded if they denied the sincerity of those who thought differently from them—whether in the one direction or the other; whether in Calvinism or farther back in the direction of the Roman Catholic religion, towards what are termed advanced opinions, towards sceptical views, towards deistical opinions, or farther still, towards that form of religion or irreligion which is designated by the name Agnosticism. It was the duty of every man to endeavour to ascertain what was the truth in every department of knowledge to which his education was turned, and especially in the matter of religion. He was right in saying that those who were instrumental in organising that association, and those who generously and zealously gathered around it for its support, held conscientiously the views which were known as Unitarian Christianity—that was, belief in the doctrine of one God, in one Person, and belief, at the same time, in the divine mission and authority of Christ. And they should have been sacrificing principles that were considered especially valuable and ennobling. Led by the distinctive position which they had assumed to cherish no sentiments of intolerance or narrow-mindedness towards others who could not think as they did, and who had the same right to form their own opinions, he could not at all understand that spirit of animosity which was frequently found between those who did not think with one another in religion, a feeling which was usually strongest between those whose views were most nearly alike. He always dissented with considerable diffidence from any opinion expressed by the chair. Their respected chairman had stated that an association like that one was not exactly designed to be missionary in its operations. He (Mr. M'ALESTER) admitted that there was a kind of missionary effort in the circulation of tracts and books. A society of Christians, attaching unspeakable importance to the principles which characterised it, should do something more, and he did not despair of that association yet attaining to a better position than they had yet reached. He did not think that the Non-Subscribing Association was just organising for carrying on missionary efforts in connection with Unitarian Christianity. That association was not Unitarian in its principles, it was strictly Non-Subscribing; and it was just such a society as that one, having a thoroughly Unitarian basis, that should make efforts to spread the views that were believed to be important; but if they did so they were not to be satisfied with subscriptions such as they had received hitherto. He did not think that any man who was thoroughly earnest for the spread of Christianity beyond his own Church would be satisfied with giving half-a-crown a year. They must have larger subscriptions, and perhaps also a larger number of persons subscribing. He was quite sure that they would be heartily sustained by many; he had faith in their people if only a good cause was shown to them. He was glad to know they had there a brother minister from the sister island, from a district in England of remarkable interest as a field of pastoral labour and missionary operation. He had reason to believe that Mr. Payne was not only filling an important position in the North of England, but zealously and successfully carrying out the objects to which he has given his mind. It was not necessary that he should enter into particulars then. He knew that Mr. Payne was a sympathising and faithful pastor, and that he and others with him were making noble efforts for the spread of Unitarian Christianity in their own district. He (Mr. M'ALESTER) remembered when a very young man being present at the first annual meeting of the Belfast Unitarian Society, of which the present society, as the chairman had justly stated, was the legitimate successor; he was at the meeting, not as a member of any denomination at all, for at the time he was not identified with it; he strolled in to hear and see what was going on. There were men there with whom he became well acquainted afterwards, whose forms rose up distinctly before his mind. But, when one or two persons had spoken belonging to the local district, there arose up in a pew in front of the pulpit in the Second Meeting-house a man of noble form and appearance, who, as he had a black neckerchief, appeared to be a layman, and the moment he opened his lips he riveted his (Mr. M'ALESTER's) attention. It was the Rev. George Harris. That distinguished man settled in Newcastle-upon-Tyne, and it was very much through his instrumentality that the church in which Mr. Payne now officiated was erected. He (Mr. M'ALESTER) knew what painful and anxious feelings Mr. Harris had in the contemplation of a form of Unitarianism rising up around him with which he could have no sympathy, because it seemed to throw overboard the Divine authority of revelation.

Mr. F. D. WARD seconded the motion, which was agreed to.

The Rev. A. PAYNE, who was warmly applauded, delivered an interesting address.

The Rev. A. GORDON moved the following:—"That the members of the Ulster Unitarian Christian Association, at their annual meeting assembled, desire to give expression to the deep and sorrowful emotion which has been stirred in them by the death of the Rev. Henry W. Bellows, D.D., of New York, whose labours as a Christian philanthropist have earned the gratitude of mankind, and whose services to the cause of Unitarian Christianity have endeared his name to his fellow-labourers in all lands; and that this resolution be communicated, with the assurance of our respectful sympathy, to the Rev. Russell W. Bellows, as the representative of the family, and the Church bereaved of one so greatly loved, trusted, and revered."

The Rev. THOMAS DUNKERLY seconded the motion, which was passed unanimously.

The meeting concluded with a vote of thanks to the Chairman.

LONDON AUXILIARY SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.—We learn that the half-yearly religious service to the teachers and others will be held on Saturday, the 25th inst., at Little Portland-street Chapel, when the Rev. Dr. James Drummond will preach. At the Conference, in the evening, Miss Anna Swanwick will read a Paper, which will be afterwards discussed.

LITTLE PORTLAND-STREET CHAPEL.—On Sunday evening last the first of a series of lectures on "Unitarian Affirmations" was given in this chapel by the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed, M.A., his subject being "Religion and Theology." There was a good attendance, those present being nearly all members of the working class. The further lectures of this series are to be delivered by the Revs. J. W. Freckleton, J. E. Odgers, M.A., H. E. Dowson, B.A., and H. Carey Walters. At the close of the service last Sunday evening there was a performance of sacred music. Nearly all who were present at the earlier service stayed for this, and their numbers were reinforced by fresh comers, so that there were between three and four hundred persons present. The selection was listened to with quiet attention. MANCHESTER DISTRICT SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.—The annual meeting will be held on Good Friday, April 7, at the Strangeways Free Church, Manchester, when the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, B.A., of Nottingham, will be the preacher at the morning service, and the Rev. Denny Agate, B.A., of Gorton, will read the paper at the evening.

BELPER.—We record with pleasure that at the recent School Board election the Rev. Rees L. Lloyd, who has been a member of the Board since its formation, was again returned; and at the meeting of the new Board, held on Monday last, on the motion of the vicar of Christ Church, seconded by the minister of the Congregational Church, was unanimously appointed Chairman.

PLYMOUTH.—On Sunday evening the Rev. W. Sharman spoke to a large congregation assembled on the religious meaning of the Northampton election. He denied that the election was a victory for Atheism and lawlessness. On the contrary, it was the triumph of righteousness and religion. The people of Northampton were intelligent, law-abiding, and Christian. What slight disorder, and it was very slight, took place was caused by the foul falsehoods uttered for purposes of provocation against the honour of Northampton homes. The election was chiefly conducted by volunteers who were not Secularists, but representatives of many religious denominations, and messages of sympathy came from all the sects. Dr. Greaves, of Durham, spoke for the Church of England; Mr. Percy Bunting, nephew of the celebrated Dr. Jabez Bunting, spoke for the Wesleyans; Mr. Dale and the Rev. Arthur Mursell more than counteracted the mischief done by Mr. S. Morley. The vast majority of the Non-conformist voters were true to principle, and to them was due the rescue of religion from the reproach of serving God by robbery. The contest was marked by many pathetic incidents, which showed how deeply interested the people were in the great struggle to which they were called. Among these was the case of an elector who, at the request of a brother residing near Plymouth, delayed undergoing a surgical operation until he could vote for Mr. Bradlaugh. It was, of course, certain that the action he (Mr. Sharman) had taken would be misrepresented; but he was sure that no religion was worth anything which did not dare to do the right. He had no fear of theoretical Atheism; he had great fear of ungodly conduct.

THE REV. DR. LLEWELYN BEVAN, formerly of Tottenham-court-road Chapel, is about to return to this country from New York, having accepted the pastorate of the new church at Highbury Quadrant, London.

THE LONDON SCHOOL BOARD held its weekly meeting on Thursday, Mr. Buxton in the chair. Before business was commenced a resolution was passed expressing indignation at the recent attempt on the life of the Queen, and of gratitude for her Majesty's providential preservation. The debate on higher elementary education was resumed. The recommendation of the School Management Committee that higher elementary schools should be established in the metropolis was met by "the previous question." At the end of another discussion the amendment was rejected by a large majority, and the further consideration of the question was adjourned.

THE SHAKERS.—Mrs. Girling, the head of the Shaker community—in a letter denying that she has been ill—for the Shakers profess to believe that they will never die—says that some weeks ago she felt "very weak in body and depressed in spirit, even beyond ordinary measure, but the main cause was the hardness of people's hearts and their unwillingness to believe the truth and the light which is come." Proceeding to illustrate what she means by the "truth" she asserts that "notwithstanding all appearances, this mysterious woman, known to the world as Mrs. Girling," is no less a person than the re-incarnation of the Great Father of Love who is come again, making her body the abode of His second appearing, and the "print marks" of the evidence of His former sufferings now appearing upon her body.

THE PERSECUTED JEWS.—Mr. Laurence Oliphant is to be sent by the executive committee of the Mansion House Fund on behalf of the persecuted Jews to Galicia, to classify the refugees, and select for colonisation those who would be serviceable in agricultural settlements. Palestine and Canada West are the first countries to which attention will be directed.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE

ORIGINAL AND ONLY GENUINE.

COUGHS,
COLDs,
ASTHMA,
BRONCHITIS.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE.—This wonderful remedy was discovered by Dr. J. COLLIS BROWNE, and the word CHLORODYNE coined by him expressly to designate it. There never has been a remedy so vastly beneficial to suffering humanity, and it is a subject of deep concern to the public that they should not be imposed upon by having imitations pressed upon them on account of cheapness, and as being the same thing. DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE is a totally distinct thing from the spurious compounds called Chlorodyne, the use of which only ends in disappointment and failure.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE.—Vice Chancellor Sir W. PAGE WOOD, STATED PUBLICLY in Court that Dr. J. COLLIS BROWNE was UNDOUBTEDLY the INVENTOR OF CHLORODYNE, that the whole story of the defendant was deliberately untrue, and he regretted to say it had been sworn to.—See The Times, July 13th, 1864.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE IS A LIQUID MEDICINE WHICH ASSUAGES PAIN OF EVERY KIND, affords a calm, refreshing sleep WITHOUT HEADACHE, and INVIGORATES the NERVOUS SYSTEM when exhausted.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE is the GREAT SPECIFIC FOR CHOLERA, DYSENTERY, DIARRHŒA.

The GENERAL BOARD OF HEALTH, London, REPORT that it ACTS as a CHARM, one dose generally sufficient.

Dr. GIBBON, Army Medical Staff, Calcutta, states: "TWO DOSES COMPLETELY CURED ME OF DIARRHŒA."

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE rapidly cuts short all attacks of EPILEPSY, SPASMS, COLIC, PALPITATION, HYSTERIA.

COUGHS, COLDs, &c.

From W. VESALIUS PETTIGREW, M.D., formerly Lecturer at St. George's Hospital, LONDON.

"I have no hesitation in stating that I have never met with any medicine so efficacious as an Anti-Spasmotic and Sedative. I have used it in Consumption, Asthma, Diarrhœa, and other diseases, and am perfectly satisfied with the results."

From W. C. WILKINSON, Esq. F.R.C.S., Spalding.

"I consider it invaluable in Phthisis and Spasmodic Cough; the benefit is very marked indeed."

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE is the TRUE PALLIATIVE in NEURALGIA, GOUT, CANCER, TOOTHACHE, RHEUMATISM.

From Dr. B. J. BOULTON and Co., Horncastle.

"We have made pretty extensive use of Chlorodyne in our practice lately, and look upon it as an excellent direct Sedative and Anti-Spasmotic. It seems to allay pain and irritation in whatever organ, and from whatever cause. It induces a feeling of comfort and quietude not obtainable by any other remedy, and it seems to possess this great advantage over all other Sedatives, that it leaves no unpleasant after effects."

IMPORTANT CAUTION. The IMMENSE SALE of this REMEDY has given rise to many UNSCRUPULOUS IMITATIONS.

N.B.—EVERY BOTTLE OF GENUINE CHLORODYNE BEARS on the GOVERNMENT STAMP the NAME of the INVENTOR,

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE.

WEALTH, SPIRITUAL AND MATERIAL.

MAN lives in comfort on the earth by constant prevision, and by this alone. The lack of prevision, which is spoken of as improvidence, leads to no small amount of suffering and moral degradation among certain classes of the community, and would, if general, plunge man back into his primitive barbarism. A wise care for the future is one of the most distinct of the lessons of reason, and, therefore, one of the clearest utterances of the voice of GOD. Still there is in some people so strong, so inordinate a desire to accumulate material possessions that it crushes out all their better life. When the desire for gain thus becomes a passion, when from its intensity it is altogether incompatible with the growth of better things in the soul, there is need of an injunction like that ascribed to CHRIST in the Gospels. Those who are the willing slaves of a passion for the wealth which is wholly of the world of material things would do well to ponder over the words of the Master, "What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul"—that is lose all the higher life of the spirit here on earth as well as the moral fitness for the eternal future? Such need to be urged to lay up for themselves treasures in heaven, "where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through and steal." They require to be reminded in solemn tones that he alone is truly rich whose mind is stored with varied kinds of knowledge and alive to noble thoughts, and whose heart is stirred by many sympathies.

These lessons, taught alike by Christianity and by reason, are not seldom disregarded in the present day when the race for wealth is perhaps more absorbing than at any other previous period of history, especially among Englishmen. Hence there is not a little real poverty of mind and heart in the midst of the gilded trappings and luxurious surroundings of modern life, and the occupant of the carriage is more to be pitied in some cases than the chimney-sweep or the costermonger, because he is more destitute of what can alone fill the soul. It is a fact which no one who has seen the world can deny, that the treasures which are indestructible and soul-satisfying are often small in proportion to the magnitude of a man's material possessions. Hence the truth of Lord BEACONSFIELD'S profound remark that there is probably far more suffering in the world from satiety than from poverty and want. It is not necessary, indeed, to despise wealth, as certain of the heathen philosophers did, or to turn beggars like the monks of the Middle Ages to assert that material possessions are but an exceedingly inadequate substitute for the higher and nobler riches of the spirit—the treasures in heaven. And yet it is a good thing for a man to have a balance at his banker's, and to feel that by honest industry or by inheritance he is secured against the evils of poverty. It is only the abuse of wealth and the mistakes made about it which are to be deplored. The rich man has a thousand sources of enjoyment open to him which are closed to his needy neighbour; he has numerous opportunities for doing good, for lightening heavy hearts and brightening the world that the latter does not possess. There is thus no reason in the nature of things why he should remain poor in the midst of his wealth, but just the reverse, since he possesses the golden key which can alone unlock many intellectual and spiritual treasure-chambers. If he is really poor in spite of the riches represented by scrip and bank-notes, if his mind is empty when he has so excellent a means for filling it, and if his soul hungers for food in the midst of the profusion of an unsatisfying material civilisation, it is because he has forgotten the true function of wealth, and has overlooked the moral ends and realities of life. As JEREMY TAYLOR eloquently says :—"The poorest artisan of Rome, walking in CÆSAR'S gardens, had the same pleasures which they ministered to their lord; and although it may be he was put to gather fruits to eat from another place, yet his other senses were delighted equally with CÆSAR'S; the birds made him as good music, the flowers gave him as sweet smells; he there sucked in as good air and delighted in the beauty and order of the place, for the same reason and on the same perception as the prince himself; save only that CÆSAR paid for all that pleasure vast sums of money—the blood and treasure of a province which the poor man had for nothing.

This thought suggests not only the mysterious law of compensation which mercifully runs through the world and tends to equalise the lot of the rich and the poor, but also the essential difference between material and mental or spiritual wealth. The growth of property is co-eval with the existence of civilisation. The principle of reason and progress in man enabled him to conquer the earth and raise himself above the chance of the hour, which is the lot of the irrational and unprogressive creatures. In this great conquest of civilisation he appropriated land, built ships and houses, and surrounded his life by innumerable skilful contrivances, all tending to increase his pleasure and enhance his comfort. And the claims of ownership which thus grew with the development of his capacity for progress have never been disputed except in the case of land. But the more one man has of these destructible and alienable treasures of earth, except in the industrial sense of creative capital, the less there is of them for another. No two persons can have the whole of the same loaf; the one can only have what the other leaves. All material possessions are exclusive just because they are material. They may be divided and subdivided to any extent, but they are necessarily subject to the exclusive principle. Hence the struggles and toils, the privations and the hardships men voluntarily undergo to acquire material things, because they know the race for wealth is one in which all cannot win. Hence the jealousies and the rivalries and the forcible or unlawful dispossession we speak of, as theft, robbery, crime.

But the treasures which are of the spirit are inclusive. Their acquiescence is the result of a race in which all may win. They constitute a kind of property we may bestow upon others illimitably, and gain by our profusion. The mode of holding and enjoying this spiritual wealth is one of universal participation. A thought is none the less one man's because it belongs to another; and a beautiful feeling is immeasurably increased or intensified, in its power to bless, by being communicated to all who are capable of sharing it. In these possessions of reason, imagination, affection, and moral power, the more one person has the more there is for another, or, indeed, for all others. Spiritual space cannot be crowded, and the riches of the soul are absolutely increased by the widest possible communications of them to the world. There can be but here and there a Cræsus or a Rothschild, but there might be untold millions of Homers, Platos, Shakespeares, or Newtons. The more one man knows of mathematical, physical, or moral truth, the more his nature thrills with poetic beauty or swells with moral power, the easier it is for all his fellows to possess and enjoy these imperishable and inalienable riches of the soul. In this divine domain, too, no monopoly or conflict is possible, because the outward moving force of each spirit, which retreats and vanishes before the conquests of experience, is a vacuum to every other spirit or consciousness. They thus overlap and interpenetrate each other, as though they were mutually non-existent, so that the whole domain of intellectual truth becomes the possible possession of each soul. Taking this into account, and seeing, as we do, that the desires of the soul are boundless, that nothing can satisfy its longings but the infinite God-thought; that it would devour the creation, and then hungrily cry for more, we are justified in concluding that over and above all the things for which men struggle with each other in jealous rivalry, there is one thing out of the sphere of struggle which indivisibly belongs to every man, and that one thing the whole Universe. If it be true, therefore, that the material Universe is the complement of the intellect, as Professor TYNDALL has said, the truth must be understood as applying not to the intellect of the race, but to each individual mind, in which all others are mirrored and mystically contained.

It is usually admitted that the more things a man loves the richer he is, and that on the other hand, the fewer the things he cares for the greater his freedom. What we all need is a means of reconciliation between the blessed wealth of love and sympathy and the freedom we crave, which is apt to degenerate into that of the barren rock. It is only by loving the divine and eternal in everything, and giving ourselves no anxiety about the limiting and perishable elements connected therewith that we can find this reconciliation and so become both rich and free. In this way we not only educate and strengthen our spirits, we also emancipate them as the most saintly of the sons of earth have done along the ages. Each man must die to live, and then he finds with GOETHE that the true use of renunciation is larger fulfilment. We have to detach our ardent longings from lower and lesser objects in order to attach them to higher and greater ones. The true education of a human soul only attains completion in its readiness to renounce the lower at the invitation of the nobler. Without foolishly despising any of the good things of life, therefore, as so many have mistakenly done, we are all called upon to estimate them at their true value. It is well to remember indeed that those who have most of this world's goods at their disposal are not necessarily the richest men. Happily, however, there are those who hold their material possessions as stewards in the divine kingdom, and who value them mainly on account of the spiritual wealth they are able to procure. These are the truly rich, since, while they possess all that can minister to the wants of the body, they have discerned that there is a higher spiritual wealth which they must share with their humblest brethren.

OATHS AND OATH-TAKING.

RECENT circumstances of a public and important character have given unusual interest to the subject of oaths and oath-taking. The degree of attention which this question has attracted makes it a suitable opportunity for offering upon it a few words of comment.

There are different points of view from which we can regard it. First, the distinctly Christian point of view. The highest Christian authority on any point of Christian doctrine or practice is CHRIST himself, and on this matter he has spoken in the plainest and most emphatic manner. There can be no doubt that in his discourse called the Sermon on the Mount JESUS forbids swearing altogether. It would be impossible for him to do this in more express terms. The old law allowed the practice of swearing expressly on the condition of swearing truly. What it prohibited was swearing falsely, swearing and not performing—not keeping the oath. Of old time it was said, “Ye shall not swear by my name falsely”—“If a man swear an oath to bind his soul with a bond, he shall not break his word.” When the Psalmist is describing the virtuous man, among other features that characterise him is this:—“He sweareth to his own hurt, and changeth not.” That is, he keeps his oath at any personal pain or loss. He does not break his word solemnly pledged for any advantage, but abides by it through all consequences. In all ages of the world this has appeared a high standard of honour; but JESUS points out one still higher. It is this:—“Speak the truth, and keep your word without any appeal to Heaven. Let your own sense of honour be sufficient sanction without any other. Let the truth be its own authority, independent of all other. Let your communication be yea, yea; or nay, nay; that is, confine yourselves to simple utterances, to speaking the plain truth in plain words—‘for whatsoever is more than this cometh of evil.’ Avoid all extravagance of speech, avoid all appeals to Heaven to witness what you say.” Is not this the better and higher rule?

The injunction which JESUS gives is repeated by the Apostle JAMES in almost identical terms. “But, above all things, my brethren, swear not; neither by Heaven, neither by the earth, neither by any other oath, but let your yea be yea, and your nay nay, lest ye fall into condemnation.” It is somewhat surprising that the practice of taking oaths should have existed and prevailed in the Church, notwithstanding this distinct prohibition by JESUS and his apostle. One body of Christians, as we know, have always abjured the practice of taking oaths, and steadily refused to pledge themselves in this way under any circumstances. In this particular the “Friends” have consistently adhered to the injunction of the Master; and have set an example, worthy of imitation, to other bodies of Christians. On account of their persistence in this view they have for a long time been released from the obligation of taking an oath, and their affirmation has been received instead. And it is not alleged that any inconvenience or difficulty has arisen from their course of action. Their word without the oath has been taken with the same confidence as the word of others with the oath.

Then again there is the moral point of view. Are the interests of morality served by oath-taking? We think not; but decidedly the reverse. The custom of calling God to witness the truth of what one says from time to time is directly calculated to lessen one's reverence, and to produce a certain degree of irreverence, on the same principle that we say familiarity breeds contempt. What reverence is shown as the oath is ordinarily administered in a court of justice? What is it better than a mere form, which is hurried through in the most perfunctory manner possible? A form of words is gabbled over, and the witness gives his assent by pressing the cover of a book to his lips. Would it not be infinitely better for him simply to declare that he would speak the truth, and to hold him responsible for his word? It would be just as easy to do this as to hold him responsible for an oath. True reverent feeling is shocked by the careless indifferent manner in which the name of the Deity is appealed to and dragged into every petty squabble or angry contention in a police-court. A high religious sanction is utterly degraded by such use of it. Religion and morality, too, are brought into contempt by such low familiarity with sacred things. The third Commandment—“Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain, for the Lord will not hold him guiltless that taketh his name in vain”—is broken in spirit every time that an oath is lightly taken.

Again, are the interests of justice promoted by oath-taking? Is not this very doubtful indeed? How often do we notice the most conflicting evidence given by witnesses under oath. What one swears to the other directly contradicts. It is quite evident that one if not both must be swearing falsely. The amount of perjury committed in this way it would be difficult to exaggerate. The conflicting evidence has to be balanced and sifted, every statement has to be received with caution, notwithstanding the oath, and very often there can be no doubt a gross miscarriage of justice is the result after all. Some glaring instances of this have come before the notice of the public lately. Innocent persons have been convicted and ruined, and sent to penal servitude on the false testimony of sworn witnesses. What guarantee, then, is the oath that the truth will be spoken? And the enormity of the case is aggravated by the circumstances that the Almighty has been appealed to in this gross perversion of justice. The fact is the oath is no guarantee that the truth will be spoken by a witness who has a purpose to serve by making certain statements, and is prepared to run the risk of detection. Those who do speak the truth would be just as likely to do so without the oath as with it. An honourable mind is not made more truthful by this means; and one careless or indifferent about veracity will not become truthful under oath. Where, then, is the utility of this form if it is so little to be depended upon? Would not the cause of religion and morality be served by its abolition, and by a simple declaration being substituted for it, by which the witness would be held equally bound? Here, then, is a needed and practical reform which has only been delayed too long.

There is another aspect of the question—Is not the administering of an oath to a person before his testimony is received in a certain sense degrading or humiliating? Is it not tantamount to saying that his bare word is not to be accepted, that it is not sufficient to entitle him to credit? Some sanction more stringent than his own sense of honour must be imposed before he becomes worthy of belief. He must pledge himself by the Almighty that he will speak the truth. He must call Heaven as a witness, or he cannot be believed. All this is exceedingly humiliating. Many a man of sensitive honour has no doubt shrunk from lowering himself in this way. And, of course, it has not added the very smallest degree of validity to the testimony he has given.

Another objectionable use of oaths is when they are employed in a restrictive sense as tests. Thus certain offices can only be filled by persons willing to take certain oaths, or pledge themselves in a certain way. Those who decline to swear or pledge themselves, however well they may be otherwise qualified are declared to be ineligible. The effect of this has been to shut out from offices of honour and emolument men admirably qualified to render most valuable service. They were excluded because they would not pass through the narrow doorway of some objectionable oath or test. How many worthy men have been kept out of Parliament by this cause, and the country has been deprived of their services in consequence. Gradually the form of this oath has been modified, but it still remains a stumbling block in the way of perfect religious equality.

Closely related to oath-taking is the practice of subscribing certain articles of belief before being allowed to fill certain important religious offices; as in the case of the clergy of the Church of England. The object of those who imposed this obligation was to ensure the same teaching everywhere in the Church. But has it accomplished this end? Notoriously it has not. Uniformity has not been secured by all the pledging and signing. There are, it is well known, wide differences of belief among the clergy of the Church. They all pass through the same narrow doorway of subscription; but once within the Church they immediately diverge into different paths. Better in all cases to follow the rule of CHRIST, to whose express injunction all this pledging and oath-taking is opposed. Speech is one of the noblest faculties we have. It is the interpreter of our thought, the ally of our reason, the medium of communication with our fellows. Intelligent speech is one line of separation between man and the lower animal creation. But this great gift is abused the moment we depart from the strict rule of simplicity and veracity. Pledging and oath-taking are inconsistent with that rule. The course we would recommend therefore is the abolition of the practice of oath-taking altogether, and adherence to simple forms of speech as under all circumstances the wisest and best.

THE NEW DEPARTURE OF OUR FAITH.

BY THE REV. EDWARD C. TOWNE, B.A.

ARE Christian faith, fellowship, worship, and communion, on grounds and within lines thoroughly and honestly Christian, still possible; and not only possible but perfectly true to the highest reason, the soundest philosophy, the purest conscience, and the best learning? Or must we for perfect grace and truth, developed by our new learning and liberty, go beyond the Christian ideal and away from the Christian history?

To this question there is wanted an answer which will completely separate all unsound and decaying elements from the historically truest and ideally best form of Christianity, and permit us to judge whether this form is any way unsound or defective. The conclusion which it seems to me the best studies tend towards and are likely to establish is this: That in the single mind of Christ himself, and in his teaching and example, separated absolutely from all additions and alterations made by Paul, by Peter and John, and Apollos, and by other authors of report and opinion about Christ, such as the writers of Gospels, there was a pure humanitarian and moral Theism, which both in method and in matter leaves nothing to be desired; setting forth conscience, and sympathy, and trust,—the love of right, the love of man, and the love of eternal good,—as the foundation, and thereon building, for complete faith, belief in the Divine authority of conscience, the Divine sonship of man, and the Divine personality of Eternal Good; or conscience and reason the word of God; man, the son of God; and God the Father unto eternal life of every soul of man.

Thomas à Kempis (III. ii.) sounded the note of purely spiritual discernment in the following remarkable cry of a God-seeking spirit:—

Let not Moses speak unto me, nor any of the prophets, but rather do thou speak, O Lord God, Inspirer and Enlightener of all the prophets; for thou alone without them canst perfectly instruct me, but they without thee can profit nothing. Let not Moses therefore speak unto me, but Thou, O Lord my God, the Everlasting Truth.

There is a note even deeper than this, that of pure trust in right and in love, as in themselves divine and fundamentally adequate; as so many of the purest and noblest souls of our time have found, when the faith of opinion or belief was in eclipse or suspense or even quite lost, and only conscience and love and trust remained to guide them—a faith working by purity of heart and by pure love. We want at the present time nothing more, for the large and broad settling and enlarging and invigorating of our faith and worship, and fellowship, and communion, than the clear demonstration that these ideally true notes were Christ's, and that the manifold error which has
